

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE BALANCE STRUCK: A NEW YEAR'S SERMON.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do."—ECCLES. II. 11.

OUR Lord pronounced the children of this world wise in their generation; and who can doubt that thousands who are lost would be saved, did they bring the same prudence, and diligence, and energy to their eternal, as they do to their temporal interests? In how many people do we see consummate wisdom joined to the greatest folly! They are wise enough to gain the world, and fools enough to lose their souls.

Convince a man that the only way to save his life is to lose his limb, and he does not hesitate an instant between living with one limb and being buried with two. Borne in, pale, yet resolute, he bares the diseased member to the knife—and how does that bleeding, fainting, groaning sufferer teach us to part with our sins rather than with our Saviour. If a life is better than a limb, how much better is heaven than a sin!

Two years ago a man was called to decide between his life and the gains of his lifetime. He stood on the deck of a ship that, coming from Australian gold fields, had—as some all but reach heaven—all but reached home and her harbour in safety. The exiles had coasted along their native shores; to-morrow, husbands would embrace their wives, children their parents, and not a few would realize their dream of returning to pass the calm evening of their days, envied, and happy amid the loved scenes of their youth. It was never more true, that there is much between the cup and the lip. Night came lowering down; and with the night the storm which wrecked ship, and hopes, and fortunes all together. The dawning light but showed them death staring them in the face. The sea ran mountains high—no boat could live in her. One chance remained. Pale women, weeping children, feeble and timid men, must die; but a stout, brave swimmer, with trust in God, and disencumbered of all impediments, might reach the shore—where hundreds stood ready to dash into the surf, and, seizing, save him. One man was observed to go below. He bound around him a heavy belt, filled with gold, the hard gains of his life, and returned to the deck. One after another, he saw his fellows leap overboard; a brief struggle, and head after head went down—sunk by the gold they had fought hard to gain, and were loath to lose. Slowly he was seen to unbuckle his belt. His hopes had been bound up in it. It was to buy him land; it was the reward of long years of labour and weary exile. What he had endured for it! The sweat of his brow, the hopes of day and the dreams of night, were there. If he parts with it, he is a beggar; but if he keeps it he dies. He poised it in his grasp. Balancing it for a while, his fate trembling in the balance, with one strong desperate effort he flings it into the sea. It sinks with a sullen plunge; and now he follows it—not to sink, but, disencumbered of its weight, to swim, to beat the billows manfully, and, riding on the foaming surge, to reach the shore. Well done! Ay, well done, well chosen; but if a man, as the devil said, who for once spoke God's truth, will give all that he hath for his life, how much more should he give all he hath for his soul. Better to part with gold than with God; to bear a heavy cross than miss a heavenly crown.

Such lessons the children of this world teach the children of the kingdom, and among these, not the least important lesson, the duty of careful self-examination. Was there ever a successful merchant who did not balance his books year by year? I have often noticed, in reading the details of Courts of Bankruptcy, that fortunes are as surely wrecked by carelessness as by wild speculations, or by boundless extravagance. Here is an honest trader bankrupt. Sober, industrious, anxious to pay every one their own, not living in splendour at other men's expense, he should have thriven and yet this honest man has to take a place beside many rogues—he, and others, throwing the blame on fortune, imputing all to the blind goddess, her capricious temper and unsteady wheel. But the examination comes, and the day declares it—as the day of a greater judgment shall declare the true and unsuspected cause that has wrought the ruin of many a soul. The debtor's books are produced. Last year, the year before, for many years, it appears there has been no balance struck. Fancying that all was right, too careless to think of it, too busy to spare time for it, or too indolent to go through the labour of it, from year to year he has put off taking stock and striking balances, till he strikes upon the rock ahead,—the crash comes, and he opens his eyes on ruin, to find that for years he has been driving a losing trade. He is a bankrupt for want of a balance. And the general practice of men of business, the history of almost every successful merchant, in the custom of year by year examining their books to know how they stand, is a lesson of the highest value. Our salvation may turn on it. People go on fancying, dreaming that all is right when all is wrong, and wake to the truth in hell. Who should not avoid the remotest chance of such a calamity? If men will take such care of their earthly fortunes, how much greater our need at such a time as this to see how we stand with God, and to do with our spiritual what every wise merchant does with his earthly interests—review the year that is gone, hold a court of conscience, and, in the words of the text, “Look on all the things that my hands have wrought, and on the labour that I have laboured to do.”

I. In this review we should inquire what we have done for God.

What has God done for us? In the dew drops that top every spike of grass, sow the sward with orient pearl, and hang like pendent diamonds, sparkling in the sun from every quivering leaf, you see the multitude of his mercies. He has crowned the year with his bounty. Other streams summer may have dried, the cold of winter frozen,—that of his mercies never; it has flowed on day by day, night by night, ever flowing, and largely fed of heavenly showers, sometimes overflowing. To this and that one has the past year brought afflictions? Still how few our miseries to our mercies; how far have our mercies exceeded our afflictions! Let us not write the memory of these on water, and of those on the rock. Who has not to sing of mercy as well as judgment, much more of mercy than of judgment? For every blow, how many blessings! If he smote with one hand, did he not hold up with the other? And which of us can deny, who should not be ready to acknowledge, that however sorely tried, we have been afflicted far less than our iniquities deserved? That ought to silence each murmuring thought, and teach us to be dumb, opening not the mouth. Dumb? No. Let the dumb sing. “Count it all joy,” says the apostle, “when ye fall into divers temptations.” Faith sees crowns growing on the top of crosses, and plucks roses from the thorny bush. She holds that in her hand which not only turns water into wine—common into new covenant mercies, but Jericho saltness and Marah's bitterness into sweetest streams. What a healing branch this, plucked from the tree of life, “All things shall work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose;” or this, “Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.”

That is one side of the account current; now look at the other! In the year that is past, what have we done for God? We have had many, daily opportunities of serving him, of speaking for him, working for him, and not sparing ourselves for him who spared not his own Son for us. Yet, how little have we attempted; how much less have we done! In golden harvests the grateful soil gives back to the farmer all it gets; and by the mouths of its ten thousand rivers the earth gives back her lent treasures to the sea, and hence the sea is always full;—but how poor the return we have made to God! There is no moor so barren as our hearts,—they drink up God's blessings as desert sands drink heaven's rain—and it is but here and there our life has a green spot, on whose refreshing verdure the eye can rest with any satisfaction, that calls for the grateful acknowledgment of the apostle, “By grace I am what I am,” by grace I have done what I have done. It is but few days, and few deeds of the year that is past, that will be remembered with any comfort on a death-bed; nor can the best of us review it without feeling that there is no hope out of Christ. We have been unprofitable servants. And if such be the case of those who are not dead to the claims of God, but say, I love the Lord—Bless the Lord, O my soul—I wish, and I have tried to serve him,—what is the case with others? What is the future of a past that has been without God? If the righteous scarcely are saved, where shall the wicked and ungodly appear?

II. In this review we should inquire what we have done for ourselves.

From the summit of his hanging gardens, Nebuchadnezzar swept his eye over the mighty city at his feet, spread out there with its hundred gates of brass, and noble river, and lordly palaces, and busy streets. It kindles at the sight. “Is not this,” he cries, “great Babylon that I have built!” And where is Babylon now? There is a mystic Babylon, against which God seems to be mustering his armies, and ere long the world may hear the cry, “Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen;” but the other has long perished in the wreck of time, and left hardly a wreck behind. “Babylon shall become heaps;” and heaps she is. By the silent river, in the lonely desert, these long clay mounds mark her grave, and remain to give echo to the words, Vanity, vanity, all is vanity!

And if "the harvest is past, and the summer ended, and we are not saved," what other verdict can conscience and truth give on the year that is gone? We have for a text stopped halfway through Solomon's sentence; but in that case we must read it out: "I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do; and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun."

No profit, do you say? I have made large profits this year. My business never paid me better. I have added acres to my lands. I have added hundreds or thousands to my wealth. I have added leaves to my laurel-crown. That is not all, let me say, you have added. You have added difficulties to your salvation; shackles to your limbs; bars to your prison; guilt to your soul; sins to your debt; thorns to your dying pillow. As Samuel Johnson said to Garrick, when the great actor received the great moralist at his country-seat—showing him all its blooming beauties—"Ah, David!" said Johnson solemnly, as he laid a kind hand on the other's shoulder,—"David, these are the things that make a death-bed terrible." Profit! what profit was there to Jonah in his gourd, when its dry leaves strewed the floor of his once green bower, and fell withering at his feet?

They tell how a man who, unable to recall one good thing said or done from morning to noon, from noon to night, exclaimed, "I have lost a day!" But if the year now gone, with all its golden hours, gone never to return, has been spent only on the world and the things of the world,—if "the harvest is past, and the summer is ended, and we are not saved," it is not a day, but a year we have lost.

Not lost, however, by those of us who have made any progress, and still less lost by those who, beginning it in a state of nature, have seen it close in a state of grace. A memorable night that when the ground shook beneath the tramp of millions, and, Moses at her head, Israel took her way out of the land of bondage; a memorable day that when, waking to the voice of Christ, Lazarus left the dusty tomb, its dark silence, and dumb skeletons, for Mary and Martha's arms and the light-some home at Bethany;—more memorable still the year on which a soul passes from death to life, the year that tells the date of a man's second birth.

When Jesus washed my sins away."

Other birth-days cannot be celebrated without conquered feelings. Where are some who once met to wish us years of happiness? We miss familiar faces—this and that place is vacant—and death approaching ourselves, throws his cold shadow on the scene. And, ah, how many celebrate birth-days they shall wish had never been! The lights extinguished—the music silent—the dancers gone—the fair forms of beauty mouldering in the grave,—they shall curse the day they were wont to pass amid joyous scenes, and games, and merry laughter, saying, as they lift their eyes in torment, "Cursed be the day when I was born—oh, that my mother might have been my grave—wherefore came I forth from the womb," Jeremiah says, "that my days should be consumed with shame?"—they shall say, that I should suffer this torment, be gnawed by this worm that never dieth, burn in these flames that are never quenched. God in mercy save us from such an awful doom!

Though the year is lost, the soul is not lost yet. There is time to be saved—but haste, and away. Up to work, the night is falling; to pray, the door is shutting; to escape, the treacherous sea is creeping round and round you. Believe on Christ! Who believes not is damned; who does is saved.

III. In this review we should inquire what we have done for others.

Our Saviour's whole life is told in this one brief sentence, "He went about doing good." For this end he lived, in this work he died. This drew him from the skies—this sustained him through all his sufferings—for this, "the joy set before him," he wore the thorny crown, he bore the heavy cross. And none are his but those that have been baptized with his baptism;—not you, unless the same mind is in you that was in Jesus Christ.

Suppose, then, that our Saviour had reviewed any year of his busy life, and, doing what the time calls us to, had looked on all the works which his hands had wrought,—what a crowd of miracles and mercies there! How many sinners warned! how many mourners comforted! how many friends and neighbours counselled! how many griefs healed! how many sufferers relieved! what busy days, what blessed hours! his presence carrying sunbeams to darkened homes! mercies springing up like flowers at his feet! How might Jesus unchallenged appropriate the words of Job: "When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness of me; because I delivered the poor that cried, the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy." No wonder that a woman, borne away on a tide of wonder, and admiration, and love, cried, as she fixed her swimming eyes on him, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that gave thee suck!" I believe there was more good crowded into one day of Christ's life, than you will find spread over the life-long history of many of us.

Trying it by this test, what testimony does the past year bear to our Christianity? Two strangers once belonging to other spheres alighted on our world; and both have left their footprints behind them. The poles are not so wide asunder as were their purposes. Satan, rising from the pit, came from hell to ruin it: Jesus, descending from the skies, came from heaven to save it. Each had, and each did his mission. We have ours; and which of the two do we most resemble? What have we been doing, what have we done, in the year that is gone? Creeping like a serpent into some happy Eden, have we tempted others to fall; or, Christ-like, have we sought to raise the fallen? The tree is known by its fruits. Judge ye. The Lord have mercy on such as, tempting others to sin, have played the devil's part. "Well done, good and faithful servant," shall reward the pains and prayers that sought to raise the fallen and save the lost.

In conclusion,—

1. This review, God's Spirit blessing it, should awaken careless sinners.

If there was no remedy, if you were past redemption, I would no more seek to waken you than I would one sleeping to-night who is to be hanged to-morrow. Let him sleep on and take his rest; sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. A boat was once seen driving on along the rapid that hurries to the Falls of Niagara. To the horror of some that watched it from the shore, they saw one aboard, and asleep. They ran, they shouted, they cried. The sleeper woke, and at one wild glance took in all his danger. Yet what won't a man do for his life? To seize the oars, to pull her head round to the shore was the work of an instant. With death in the thunders of the cataract roaring loud and louder in his ear, how he pulled! It was cruel to waken him; there was no hope, unless God had sent down the eagle that was sailing overhead to bear him away upon her wings; the wild waters shot him like an arrow to the brink. As near hell as that, you, you may be saved—plucked from the very brink of ruin. Jesus is mighty and is merciful to save. He can save at the uttermost. He waits. How long shall he wait to hear from your lips the cry of Peter, "Save me; I perish?"

2. This review should stir up God's people.

You are not what you should be—you are not what you might have been. How much further on to Zion, had we never slept! How much further advanced in grace, had we improved each lost opportunity! What difference a single year makes on a thriving child!—alas! how little difference the last has made on us! No wonder. We have often slept when we should have watched; rested, when we should have run; fled, when we should have fought; fallen, when we should have stood. The battle went against us—we did not go to it in the power of prayer, and in the strength of the Lord,—and now the days and year are gone, never, never to return. There is a way, however, to redeem lost time as well as lost fortune and estates. The woodman is at it, who with sturdy arm and gleaming axe makes his blows fall thick on the groaning tree—the rider, who spurs his foaming steed to its utmost mettle—the seaman who, flying from the pirates' guns, shakes out all his canvas, and, under bending spars, plunges and ploughs through the seething deep—the smith who, by the glowing forge, and with the sweat standing on his swarthy brow, plies his hammer on the ringing anvil, doing in one hour the work of two. So many years be redeemed—the very past re-called—the shadow on Time's dial turned back. Throw your whole souls into this work—throw yourselves on your knees; and till you are safe in Christ, say, with Nehemiah, to whatever asks you down from prayer, "I have a great work to do, therefore I cannot come down."

THIRSTING FOR GOD.

"Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation."—Ps. li. 12.

O FRAGRANCE of the wine
Crushed from out the Bruised Vine, Come and breathe upon our souls dead and dry!
Oh, rich undying love,
In the heart of God above,
Revive our drooping hearts, or we die.

The world's gold is dross,
And the world's gain is loss;
There is nothing here for human hearts to love;
'Tis sorrow all and sighing,
When the morning hours are flying,
And weariness and sadness when the evening shadows move.

Quenched is all the fire
Of our heavenward desire;
Our strength is waxing weak, our love is but a name:
Our path is dark and dreary,
Our hearts are weak and weary,
But Thou art ever near us, thy power and love the same.

O show to us once more
Thy lasting love and power,
And let us not exhausted thus die beside the way:
Thou hast set us in the road
That leads us home to God,
Thou wilt not, canst not leave us to our enemies a prey.

Yes, we will trust thy grace,
Though we cannot see thy face;
And though thy form be shrouded in the darkness of our night,
Thou wilt return at length,
Renew our failing strength,
And, in thine own good time, restore thy joyful light.

And O, be with us still,
Though thy hand we do not feel,
And keep us from denying thee, and keep us from despair;
Draw all our thoughts above
In the shadow of thy love,
And our dead souls revive with the dews that answer prayer.

A LETTER IN BLACK.*

* * * * *

My poor bereaven friend, I know
 Not how to word it, but would bring
 A little solace for your woe—
 A little love for comforting.
 And yet the best that I can say
 Will only help to sum your loss ;
 I can but lift my look, and pray,
 God help my friend to bear his cross !

I have felt something of your smart,
 And lost the dearest thing e'er wound,
 In love, about a human heart :
 I, too, have life-roots under ground.
 From out my soul hath leapt a cry
 For help, nor God himself could save ;
 And tears still run that nought will dry
 Save death's hand, with the dust o' the grave.

God knows, and we may some day know,
 These hidden secrets of his love ;
 But now the stillness stuns us so,
 Darkly, as in a dream, we move.
 The glad life-pulses come and go ;
 Over our head and at our feet,
 Soft airs are sighing something low—
 The flowers are saying something sweet.

And 'tis a merry world ; the lark
 Is singing over the green corn ;
 Only the house and heart are dark—
 Only the human world forlorn !
 There, in her bridal chamber, lies
 A dear bed-fellow, all in white—
 That purple shadow, under eyes
 Where star-fire swam in liquid night.

Sweet, slippery silver of her talk,
 And music of her laugh so dear,
 Heard in home-ways and wedded walk,
 For many and many a golden year ;
 The singing soul and shining face,
 Daisy-like glad, by roughest road,
 Gone ! with a thousand dearnesses
 That hid themselves for us and glowed.

The waiting angel, patient wife,
 All through the battle at our side—
 That smiled her sweetness on our strife
 For gain, and it was sanctified !
 When waves of trouble beat breast-high,
 And the heart sank, she poured a balm
 That stilled them, and the saddest sky
 Made clear and starry with her calm.

And when the world, with harvest ripe,
 In all its golden fulness lay,
 And God, it seemed, saw fit to wipe,
 Even on earth, our tears away,
 The good, true heart, that, bravely won,
 Must smile up in our face, and fall !
 And all our happy days are done—
 And this the end ! And is this all ?

* * * * *

Dear friend, life beats, though buried 'neath
 Its long black vault of night ; and see
 There trembles through this dark of death
 Starlight of immortality.
 And yet shall dawn the eternal day
 To kiss the eyes of them that sleep ;
 And He shall wipe all tears away
 From tired eyes of them that weep.

'Tis something for the poor bereaven,
 In such a weary world of care,
 To feel that we have friends in heaven :
 Who helped us here may aid us there.
 These yearnings for them set our arc
 Of being widening more and more,
 In circling sweep through outer dark,
 To-day more perfect than before.

So much was left unsaid, the soul
 Must live in other worlds to be ;
 On earth we cannot grasp the whole,
 For that Love has eternity.
 Love deep as death, and rich as rest ;
 Love that was love with all love's might ;
 Level to needs the lowliest,
 Will not be less love at full height.

Though earthly forms be far apart,
 Spirit to spirit may be nigher ;
 The music chord the same at heart,
 Though one should range an octave higher.
 Eyes watch us that we cannot see ;
 Lips warn us which we may not kiss ;
 They wait for us, and starrily
 Lean towards us from heaven's lattices.

We cannot see them face to face ;
 But love is nearness, and they love
 Us yet, nor change with change of place,
 In their more human world above,
 Where love, once leal, hath never ceased,
 And dear eyes never lose their shine,
 And there shall be a marriage feast,
 Where Christ shall once more make the wine.

A CHANGED LIFE.

"AUNT JANET," said Lizzie Bruce, "I heard you say last night, 'That was one of my last scrambling days;' it would be when you were a little girl, I know; but were you not lame then, auntie?"

"No," said the old woman she addressed; "and if you call Tom and sit down quietly here, I will tell you a story about how I became a deformed child, instead of a merry, active one like you, and how I became more happy after that than ever I was before."

"You will remember," she said, when they were seated to listen, "the great city of Liverpool which your father took you to see on your way here. He tells me that the house where he and I were born is still standing, but that the garden and orchard are gone, and it is crushed up into what almost seems the heart of the city, which now extends far beyond what was once our quiet home. My father was a master builder, and had got on well in the world, and my mother being an active, tidy woman, you can scarcely imagine a more comfortable home than we had. I had three brothers,—Robert your father, Tom, and Harry, and being their only sister, I joined in all their occupations and amusements; and, indeed, was in all respects very much allowed to follow my own inclination. Thus, as years added strength to the natural pride and selfishness of my heart, I became more impatient of control; and my mother had often to comfort herself by remarking, that she remembered the time when she, too, had a will of her own. When I first came to live here, nothing struck me more than the sudden twilight in our valley. One moment the setting sun would make everything radiant and bright, and the next he would drop behind the mountain, and leave all in cold and cheerless shadow. It was just thus suddenly that the sun of prosperity deserted the home of my childhood. My father had become a shareholder in a mining company, and lost everything in consequence of its failure. From that day everything was changed to us; and what was worst of all, no one seemed to feel much for us. The neighbours had called us proud. I do not think we were, but Scotch ways were different from English ones. We were sufficient for ourselves and did not need them, and we did not care to consider whether they were needing us, so when the day of our calamities came we found that we had no friends. My father could not think of beginning life anew in Liverpool, and it was soon fixed that we must leave for Australia. About a week before we were to sail, a carrier's waggon stopped at the gate, and greatly to our surprise, our grandmother stepped out of it. Old and feeble as she was, she could not let us go without her blessing, neither would she have trusted to other hands the little treasure which she insisted on my father taking, saying that it was his own, having come from him to her. We thought our grandmother's dress and manners very odd; but in truth she had more real politeness than many far above her in rank, and although she never had much education, she had a quaint and beautiful way of expressing her thoughts, which made her very attractive to children.

"The day before we were to sail, our house had a very dreary look. Everything we had was now in the packing-chests, which stood in the passage. My father was painting our addresses upon them, and my mother labouring at some needlework which had been left to the last, but I was standing listlessly at the window. Now, I had a perverse disposition, which I see common to many self-willed young people. If I offered help myself, I would give it cheerfully and kindly, but I hated to be bid to do anything. I had been noticing how tired my poor mother looked, and was just going to offer to finish the shirt she was working at, when my grandmother said, 'Janet, can you not help your mother?' In a moment all the generosity and pleasure of doing it seemed gone, so I sullenly answered, 'Mother works better than I,' and went out in search of the boys.

"I found them watching the building of a house near ours. The workmen left just then for dinner, and we amused ourselves with a nearer inspection. A long, narrow ladder stood against one of the upper windows. 'Who'll climb that?' said Tom. 'I will,' said I, and began at once to spring lightly up it. It was in vain that they called on me to desist; an obstinate fit was upon me, and higher and higher I went, until I reached the very top. With a shout of triumph I looked down at my brothers, but the glance at the depth, the awful depth below, was too much for me. My head grew dizzy at the sight, and feeling myself falling, I made a desperate, but vain clutch at the wall. The cries of the boys soon brought people to the spot, and I was carried to the hospital, where it was ascertained that I had met with some severe, but not fatal, injury to my spine.

"It was impossible for my parents to remain to watch over me, and they sailed next day with the added burden of this new sorrow. My kind old grandmother was allowed to nurse me in the hospital, and at the end of three months I was able to leave it; but the beauty and strength I had exulted in were gone. I had become a sickly and deformed child.

"There were no railroads in those days, and stage-coaches were too expensive for us, so we returned to my grandmother's Highland home in the same carrier's waggon which had brought her to us. The carrier was a friend of hers, and made us as comfortable as he could among his many boxes and packages. We were more than three weeks on the road, stopping at Glasgow and some of the larger towns. I was too feeble to be much interested in the scenes we were passing through, and often wished that our wanderings were over. When they did end, I had been asleep for some hours; and when, still half dreaming, I opened my eyes upon this lovely valley, I exclaimed, 'Grandmother! is it heaven?' so bright a realization did it seem of the 'everlasting hills,' and the 'green pastures,' and the 'still waters' of the better country which she loved to speak to me of. Had she lived in my early home, perhaps she would have spoken more of the glorious city, with its golden streets, and shining throng, and open gates, for I perceive that wherever Christ's people dwell they can find something to typify their future inheritance. In those days a journey to the south was a rare thing, and, like the wandering kindred of Naomi, the villagers crowded round us with their kind words of welcome and offers of help, for my grandmother had friends. For a time, the sweet quiet of our country life was very refreshing to me; but as I gained strength I became restless and impatient for change, and longed to be able to run about as of old. 'O Grandmother,' I said one day, 'how can you be contented to sit spinning there for ever?'

"It is not for ever, Janet," she answered; 'but the time was when I wanted change as much as you do, and when I would have thought it hard to know that all my life was to be spent in this little village.'

"And have you been all your life here?" I asked.

"Yes," she said, 'until I came to Liverpool for you. There was never much change in my life. I never became rich or great in any way. I only moved from my father's small cottage to my husband's smaller one, and nothing came to pass of all that I used to think must be before I could call myself happy, but I found Jesus, and then all was changed to me, and I learned that happiness is to be at peace with God.'

"Found Jesus.' I had often heard my grandmother use the words before, and never without feeling that what were to me mere vague words were a blessed reality to her. I could tell you many of the sweet home lessons that I learned at that time, and as ice cannot long remain beside fire without being melted by it, even my cold, selfish nature began to give way under the influence of the genial Christianity of my beloved grandmother. In the autumn of that first year of my life with her, our village was thrown into a great excitement by an archery meeting which was held beside us. We did not fail to join the onlookers. There was no end of grand carriages, and gay ladies, and fine gentlemen, and many vain and foolish desires filled my heart as I stood, a poor, deformed little girl among the vulgar crowd.

"There are few things that make us more miserable than such thoughts, and I felt more discontented with my humbled circumstances that evening than I had done for a long time. 'I wonder, grandmother,' I said, 'who was happiest among all these beautiful ladies that we saw?'

"I do not know," she said, 'but you know there was one looking upon the crowd who could have told us.'

"You mean God," I said.

"Yes," she answered; 'and now let us take the Bible and read the description he gives of happy people; and we will find that there might be as many of them standing beside you and me, as among the beautiful ladies you were speaking about,' so she opened the Bible and read,—

"He opened his mouth, and taught them, saying—

"'Blessed are' (not shall be, you see, Janet, but are) —blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"'Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.

"'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.

"'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.

"'Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.

"'Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.

"'Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.

"'Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"'Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.'

She closed the book, but the words remained in my heart. 'It is true,' I thought, 'that all this blessedness is within my reach, and I will not rest till it is mine.'

"Perhaps the earnest desires that filled my heart that night would have passed away as others had done before, if they had not been deepened by the events of the next day. I had just come in from school, and was going to assist in preparing our evening meal, when a noise attracted me to the window. A carriage had broken down close to our cottage-door, and while the horses were being disengaged, a lady stepped into our room, and asked leave to rest until the wheel was repaired. She was very fair to look upon, and I recognised her at once as one of the gay company at the meeting of the day before. She asked many questions about the neighbourhood, and was conversing pleasantly with us, when an old gentleman looked in and said, 'Come along, my dear, I have found a much better place than this for you.'

"Thank you, papa," she said, 'but this is very pleasant, and I will just wait here till the carriage is ready for us,' and I felt glad that he went away without her. She looked round our little room. 'I live in London,' she said, 'and have not often been in so small a cottage, but there is something so bright and comfortable about it that I think you must be quite contented and happy.'

"I would not be contented with this for all, dear lady," said my grandmother, 'but it is only a traveller's tent, and I am journeying to heaven.'

"A bright change passed over our fair young visitor's face, yet a tear stood in her eye, as she answered, 'Then, indeed, you are happy, and what would all that I have to be to me, without the same blessed hope as yours.'

"In a few minutes she was gone, but she had answered some of the questions I had so often asked myself, and I saw that rich and poor are one in Christ, needing the same grace, and sharing the same hope.

"I watched the last glimpse of the carriage as it took the circle of the valley, and then burst into tears. 'O grandmother!' I said 'I wish that I was going to heaven too.'

"Seek Jesus, my child,' she answered, 'and he will lead you there.'

"But how? I do not know how,' I said impatiently.

"Seek him in your heart,' she replied, 'as you have sought many vain things before, with an earnest longing, and he shall satisfy the hungry soul.'

"So from that day I began a pilgrim's journey to the better country, and as lamps are lighted on a dark road before the sun shines forth, so my grandmother and the sweet stranger who had so unexpectedly visited our secluded home were the lights that guided me until the Sun of righteousness arose in my heart, and shone upon my path.

The sun arose,—and this same spot,
So poor and dark before—
This same unvaried, lowly lot,
New brightness wore.

The sun arose,—and all around
Were flowers sweet and fair;
My darkened heart had never found,
Nor sought for there.

The sun arose,—and cast his beams
Around the lonely tomb,
Till resurrection glory seems
To chase its gloom.

The sun arose,—and by his light
Are precious shadows given,
Of better things, still out of sight,
But safe in heaven.

The sun arose,—and sets no more,
Though mists may dim his ray,
But safely guides me to the shore
Of endless day.

STILL THOU ART MINE.

Yes, thou art mine, still mine, my son,
Whoe'er may think thee lost for ever;
But now thou art not mine alone,
Since He, of life the Lord and Giver,
Who hath a stronger right than mine,
Hath called thee hence, and I resign
To Him my own, my darling boy,
The fulness of my earthly joy.

Ah, were the choice but given to me,

No earthly good, no earthly pleasure,
But willingly would I for thee

Give up, my heart's most cherished treasure.

"Yes," I would say, "still with me stay,
Be thou my dwelling's light alway;
And while love warms this heart of mine,
That love, my darling, shall be thine."

So speaks my heart, and means it well,

But God, the Highest, means it better;
My love is more than tongue can tell,

But in His heart is love still greater.

I am a father, that alone,
He, of all fathers, Head and Crown,
Fountain of being, whence have sprung
All loves that link the old and young.

I long full sorely for my son,

God but awhile the gift was lending,
And now He wills that near the throne

He should abide in bliss unending.

"Alas, my light is quenched," I say;
He saith, "Belovèd! come away,
For ever more with Me to dwell,
And taste of joys unspeakable."

O gracious word,—O sweet decree,—

Holy, beyond our dim foreseeing;

In God's abode no ill can be,

No sorrow of this mortal being.

There come no sickness, want, or care,
Sin casts no fleeting shadow there;
And all God loves and watches o'er,
Are safe from evil evermore.

We parents are full oft oppress

With cares about a child's upbringing;

We work, and plan, and take no rest,

To one bright hope for ever clinging,—

To see them thro' our pains and care

Settled in life with prospects fair;

Yet seldom things fall out as we

In our fond dreams had hoped to see.

How many a youth that promised well,

By the world's breath is blighted wholly;

And, yielding to the tempter's spell,

Soon turns aside to paths of folly.

And o'er it darkly gather then

The frown of God, the scorn of men;

The father weeping tears of shame,

For the lost child who blots his name.

Such evil chance can ne'er be his,

Safe in the dwelling of the Father;

He walks in that fair paradise,

Where Christ his happy saints doth gather.

There his is pleasure unexpressed,
From every heartache he hath rest ;
He sees the shining angel band,
Who here, unseen, around us stand.

He hears the song the angels sing,
And with the strain his voice is blending ;
He drinks of wisdom from the spring ;
He speaks of things all thoughts transcending.
Things none of us can see or know
While in this region dim and low,
Which, strive how hard soe'er, the mind
With all its searching cannot find.

Ah, if afar I could but stand,
And, for a moment, catch but faintly
Thy voice, my son, amid the band
Of worshippers, white-robed and saintly,— Hear thee the Holy God adore,
Who makes thee holy evermore ;
Methinks it would my heart so thrill,
That tears of joy mine eyes would fill.

I could but say, "There blest abide,
And I will cease this weak repining."
My son—oh, wert thou by my side!—
Nay, hush, my heart! And come, thou shining
Swift chariot of the prophet, come,
And bear me upwards to the home
Where he and all the blessed dwell,
And speak of things too high to tell.

So let it be,—God's will is best,—
I bow my head in meek submission ;
Thou livest, and art truly blest
In glory's clear and open vision.
In the glad sunshine of His smile Abide for ever. I the while
Will, with our brethren, onwards fare,
And, in God's time, rejoin thee there.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

ON Friday the 13th June we rested in Jerusalem. The expedition to the Dead Sea had tired us much, and in such a country days of absolute rest are as precious as they are necessary. It is delightful to be relieved for a while from the hurry of doing as much as possible, and the responsibility of seeing as much as possible, and just to be quiet, and realize that we are here, in the Holy Land, in Jerusalem, while the fingers are busy drawing or sketching ; to go in and out among the sacred names, and acquire a kind of everyday familiarity with the sacred places by the associations of everyday life ; to cease to be a sight-seer, and become, if only for a few hours, a dweller among the old, familiar hallowed scenes. For in the ordinary occupations of daily life there is nothing incongruous with the associations of our faith. The ties that bind us to our sacred histories are no flimsy gossamer of devotional sentiment, which a breath of morning air may blow away, but heart-ties, which familiarity only strengthens ; and what we want to feel more is, how everyday the world, and the life, and the men of Bible times were—how like our own—how like ourselves. "Count it not strange as though some strange thing happened unto you ;" "Men of like passions with ourselves," is written on every page of that most divine and most human Book, except of One, and of him it is written, "He came eating and drinking," hungering and thirsting, journeying and sleeping, and was in all points tempted as we are, "yet without sin." It is the very familiarity of the scenes and circumstances which detaches into glorious distinctness that spotless character, and yet brings His words and presence home to us with such sustaining power in our own daily life.

Friday being the Mohammedan Sabbath, the gates of Jerusalem were closed at mid-day, whilst the muezzin's call to prayers resounded from the minaret, recalling the long ages of romantic conflict in crusading times, and ringing like a death-knell over the desecrated city, repeating from day to day the doom, "Trodden under foot of the Gentiles."

Yet the city is scarcely as much desecrated now as in the days when scribes and Pharisees, Sadducees and Herodians were its religious men, and Pontius Pilate and Annas the high priest its rulers. We thought of this as we left the city on Saturday evening (June 14th) to remain a day or two on the Mount of Olives. The Mount of Olives and the Sea of Galilee had been always the two places in the Holy Land I had most longed to see. And now we were going out of Jerusalem to pass a night on Olivet.

We went out at the Zion gate and walked round the outside of the Haram, or sacred enclosure, which we had gone over within some days previously. We passed close under the fragment of the walls at the east end of the temple area, which were the ancient fortifications of the city ; the stones are very large, like those from which the arch of the bridge between Moriah and Zion sprang. Of the Temple itself, we know, not one stone was left on another. The way led by the Golden Gate, a gate no longer, but a walled-up gateway, where the old arches rise above the rough masonry which fills them up, a monument of Moslem superstition and of the fears of a religion whose faith is not in itself, but in the swords that defend it.

Not far beyond this, the path from the Zion Gate joins that from the St. Stephen's Gate, and leads down the steep sides of Moriah to the bridge of the Kedron.

Almost every point of the topography of Jerusalem has been, or is, a point of warm debate, especially (as every one knows) the situation of Calvary. Some believe that the spur of Moriah, where the paths from the Zion and St. Stephen's Gate, after uniting, descend to the bed of the Kedron, is Calvary. To us it was always an endeavour whilst on the spot to avoid perplexing ourselves with discussions about uncertain sites. The certain features of the scenes were so many and so absorbing, and the interest of the general landscape so far greater than precise accuracy as to a few yards of ground, that we took care not to confuse our recollections of the whole scene by entering into discussions as to the exact site of particular events. But this spur of Moriah was so often in our sight, we passed over it so frequently in leaving and re-entering the city, and became so familiar with it during our little sojourn opposite it on Olivet, that it may be well briefly to state a few of the reasons which have led some Biblical topographers to fix on it as the scene of the crucifixion rather than the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

In the first place, This point must always have been outside the line of the city walls, which many doubt if the traditional site of the holy sepulchre could ever have been.

Secondly, It is at the same time so close to the city, that priests and Levites standing on the walls of the Temple area, without ceremonially defiling themselves by mingling with a crowd attending an execution, might have seen and heard all that happened.

Thirdly, It is, and always must have been, close to a frequented highway—the road to Bethany, Jericho, and through the Valley of the Kedron in either direction to the south or north. It is difficult to realize that anything went on as usual on that awful day; yet we know that many, perhaps most, men must have been going about their usual pursuits; and that besides “the people that came together to that sight” there were many who “passed by and railed on him, wagging their heads,” as they looked up to the Temple whose destruction he had prophesied, standing close at hand in all its strength and glory, and then to him agonizing on the shameful cross, and so proceeded on their daily errands to Bethany or Siloam just as men of another race do at this day.

Fourthly, All His acquaintance, and the women who followed him from Galilee, could have stood “afar off” across the Kedron valley on the Mount of Olives, quite out of reach of the jeers of that mocking crowd, and yet have “beheld all these things” in every detail.

Fifthly, The place was a Golgotha, the place of a skull, and if the common acceptation given to that term is right, it is equally applicable to this spur of Moriah now. Bones and refuse are scattered about it.

Sixthly, “In the place where He was crucified there was a garden,” and on this spot there is a garden at this day—a garden and tombs.

This point must, no doubt, remain uncertain; but in reading again and again the story of the cross, that spur of Moriah, with its tombs and garden underneath the Temple walls, looking across Gethsemane to the Mount of Olives, with the road to Bethany passing by it, rises naturally before my mind as the scene where the Cross was raised. Its being a part of Moriah, moreover, gives probability to this view on typical grounds, since thus the Moriah where God provided the lamb instead of Isaac would indeed be the very spot where the Lamb of God, without blemish and without spot, gave himself for us.

It is remarkable that the expression, “mount,” so habitually applied to Calvary, and perpetuated by James Montgomery in his touching hymn on the three sacred mountains, occurs nowhere in the New Testament.

Much of this formed the subject of our conversation as we walked down the steep path to the bridge over the Kedron. The bed of the torrent was dry, but the bridge remained to indicate its force and breadth in the rainy season. It was evening.

“And in the day-time he was teaching in the temple, and at night he went out and abode in the mount that is called the Mount of Olives.” How often, just as the shadows were falling as now over us, and all the hill and valley lying dim except the highest point of Olivet, which glowed in the golden light of the sun setting behind the city, had our Saviour's feet trodden that very pathway.

“And every man went unto his own house. Jesus went unto the Mount of Olives,” not, as we were going, to the shelter of a friendly roof, but to pass whole nights in prayer among the solitudes of that olive-clothed valley, “whither he oftentimes resorted.” We were entering the very sanctuary of his earthly life, the place where he prayed to his Father in secret; such prayer as the 17th of John gives us a glimpse into.

About half-way up the Mount of Olives we branched off from the road to Bethany to the tower whose owner had so hospitably offered to receive us. It was a rough, narrow tower, something in the style of one of the small Border fortresses, or like a tower in a vineyard, a lodge in a “garden of cucumbers.” (Cucumbers, or vegetable marrows, eaten raw, form, we were told, a large portion of the food of the peasants during the intervals of the harvest.)

The lower storey was a kitchen and a stable, with a mere loophole to admit light. Outside the door of this a stone staircase led to the first floor where were the bedroom in which we slept and the sitting-room looking toward the city. Above were two small bed-rooms, and then the flat roof, commanding a very fine view. There we were domiciled for two most happy days, richer in recollections to me than any we spent in the Holy Land, except two or three by the Sea of Galilee. It is difficult to convey their impressions to others. It was just being there, and that is much to remember, although little to say.

We took the Sunday literally and conscientiously as a Sabbath—a day of rest—in consideration of fatigues past and future.

In the early morning we saw the first sunbeams from the eastern sky behind us light up the walls and white domes and house-tops of Jerusalem, and creep slowly down the sides of Moriah to the valley of Jehoshaphat. Then, alone, we wandered quietly up to the top of the hill, to look across the wild hills we had travelled over between Jerusalem and Jericho, to the Dead Sea, glittering at the foot of the mountains of Moab. Afterwards we descended Olivet by the foot-path to Bethany, by the bright green wild fig-trees, and the grey olives which shade it here and there, to the valley of the Kedron. There we lingered some time. We saw the Greek Church which is said to contain the tomb of the Virgin, and the white walls of the Latin Garden of Gethsemane, near which the Greeks are establishing another Gethsemane, in order that their pilgrims may have equal advantages with those of the Latin Church. How quickly we passed by these things, which, if possible, would reduce these sacred scenes to the level of Loretto or the Holy Coat of Treves, you can imagine. They were soon lost sight of, and then we were alone again in the quiet valley, in some retreat of which Gethsemane most certainly was, perhaps in the solitary nook where we sate out of sight, though within sound of the city.

There we rested under the shade of the old olives, with their gnarled black trunks and light leaves. Pomegranates, with their scarlet blossoms, and fig-trees, were scattered here and there; and perhaps the garden whose name is so sacred to us was little more than that.

As it was chosen for a retreat—a place of rest and solitude—it seems more probable that it would be in some winding of the valley such as that we were in, out of sight of ordinary passers-by, than at the junction of the roads where the white walls of the Latin traditional Gethsemane rise. But such discussions did not disturb our minds, as we rested there alone on that bright Sunday morning. We were too surely near the place where, “being in an agony, he prayed the more earnestly,” and said, “Not my will, but thine be done,” to think of anything but that.

“Though

Fast as evening sunbeams by the sea,
Thy footsteps all in Slon's deep decay
Were blotted from the holy ground; yet dear
Is every stone of her's, for Thou wert surely here.

There is a spot within this sacred dale
That felt Thee kneeling, touched thy prostrate brow.
One angel knows it. Oh, might prayer avail
To win that knowledge! Sure each holy vow
Less quickly from the unstable soul would fade, Offered where Christ in agony was laid.

Might tear of ours once mingle with the blood
That from His aching brow by moonlight fell,
Over the mournful joy our thoughts would brood,
Till they had framed within a guardian spell
To chase repining fancies, as they rise,
Like birds of evil wing, to mar our sacrifice.

So dreams the heart, self-flattering, fondly dreams;
Else wherefore, when the bitter waves o'erflow,
Miss we the light, Gethsemane, that streams
From thy dear name, where in His page of woe
It shines, a pale, kind star in winter's sky?
Who vainly reads it there, in vain had seen Him die.”

We reascended the hill, across its terraced sides, to our tower, to rest from the heat of the noon-day sun under the shade of its thick stone walls. There we dined alone on the cold meat, bread, and dried fruits we had brought from the city, and had a delicious quiet time, reading in the Psalms and Prophets and the Gospels all we could find about the scenes we were in the midst of, and thinking of all at home. We wrote letters, also, to some schools at home, in which we thought the children would attach a special value to a few words actually written on the Mount of Olives; and as we talked and wrote, or sat in happy silence, Jerusalem rose before us across the valley of the Kedron, whilst beneath us fell the sunny slopes of Olivet, dotted here and there with grey olives, fresh green fig-trees, and bright, blossoming pomegranates, each casting its distinct and individual shadow on the warm brown earth, and silently photographing gospel narratives and parables on our mind.

From the window we watched, also, for some time, a shepherd slowly pacing down across the hill before his flock, with a staff in his hand. It was a mixed flock of sheep and goats, and as they strayed hither and thither, though never far from his footsteps, or lingered to crop the scanty herbage or the lower leaves of the shrubs, from time to time he would call them on, and the “sheep knew his voice and followed him.” It was as if the words of the parables had suddenly become things, and passed in a series of living pictures before us.

In the evening we walked to the heights above Bethany with the rest of our party, who had returned from Jerusalem to see the sunset reflected on the hills of Moab. The point which we reached was a breezy, rocky height, which in England would be a grassy heath, just beyond the summit of the Mount of Olives, out of sight of Jerusalem, and overlooking Bethany, so that many think it peculiarly corresponds to the two facts mentioned to determine the scene of the Ascension: “He led them out as far as to Bethany,” and “then returned they to Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet.” If so, it was here on these quiet, breezy heights that the great miracle was wrought which, as has been said, in its majestic simplicity makes even the pomp of Elijah's fiery chariot poor in comparison:—One in human form, by his inherent power overcoming all the laws of the planetary systems, and rising untouched and unattended into the heaven He left to save man.

Bethany was little to the disciples then. Their eyes were far above its olives and white-roofed houses, strained upwards to pierce the cloud which hid their Master from their sight. The gospel history was finished. No longer were Nazareth, or Bethany, or Jerusalem, or Olivet the abode of Jesus, but heaven. The gospel histories were finished, and the history of the Church was beginning. “Why stand ye gazing up into heaven?” sent the apostles back to Jerusalem to live that foundation and type of all Church history recorded in the Acts of the Apostles.

On our way back to the tower we met a shepherd carrying a sick lamb on his shoulder; and with this second parable our Sunday on the Mount of Olives closed.

Early on Monday morning (June 16th), we went once more alone to that sacred height above Bethany, to see the sun rise behind the hills of Moab, and to sketch. I feel as if I knew Bethany and the heights around it quite well. Beautiful, breezy hills they are, with slabs of rock tufted with herbage, reminding us of English downs. The valley on the slopes of which Bethany stands is really lovely—full of grey olives, among which the few pomegranates and figs which grow here and there, look like the fresh green forest-trees in spring amongst dull firs and evergreens. Beyond surge the desolate hills between Jerusalem and Jericho; and beyond again, like a sapphire wall at that early hour, rose the hills of Moab, with the bright line of the Dead Sea just visible at their feet.

The village is very wretched. The dark, rough, flat-roofed hovels looked little like homes. Dogs barked furiously at us from their roofs when we passed through. They are, however, not more miserable than Connemara cabins, and, at all events, there are no pigs, and there is no mud from rain. But certainly there is not a house one could imagine to have been like Martha and Mary's, or one in which you could fancy they could have made our Lord a supper. Yet here that supper was made, one of the few feasts of welcome our earth had for her Lord, where Martha served, and Lazarus, "which had been dead," sat at meat, and Mary broke the alabaster vase of precious ointment, which perfumes her name and the name of Bethany, to all generations, with the fragrance of gratitude and love, so rarely lavished on Him.

Still the hills, and the quiet valley, and the distant mountain range, and the breezy paths over the rocky slopes of Olivet are the very same. An old ruined castle stands at one entrance of the village, built partly of very large, ancient stones. Perhaps these belonged to some of the houses of the old Jewish village; perhaps even to the house whose sorrows and joys are so familiar to us. In all the Holy Land there cannot be a place of deeper and happier interest; and we may well be content that the stones of the earthly dwelling should be scattered, we who hope one day to see its blessed inmates, and to dwell with Martha and Mary and Lazarus in the city which hath foundations,—in the home of "Him who is the life indeed."

THE HISTORY OF REVIVALS.

A SKETCH.

PART I.

THE great religious movements of the Reformation bore manifestly and emphatically the revival character. Not single individuals only, but masses of men, awoke at once to spiritual life, under common influences, the means being the pure preaching of the gospel, and the agent the Almighty Spirit. To dwell on these would be to enter on a very wide field, and one that has been very often traversed. Besides, the Reformation movements included an element of great importance, additional to those which are at work in revivals, as ordinarily understood. At the Reformation men were won over to a new creed, as well as to a new life. This does not make it at all improper to regard the Reformation as a great revival. But a peculiar and separate character did belong to that great movement, so far at least as to justify us in passing it with this brief notice.

After the first force of the Reformation movement had been exhausted, and the new teaching had become generally accepted in the European nations, a large measure of coldness and worldliness began to be manifest in the Churches. In this position of things revivals were greatly needed, and it is natural to look for them in the record of those times. Accordingly, a few instances have usually been named, and are referred to as the precursors of modern revivals. It is right, however, to say that these represent very inadequately the real state of the case. The line drawn is arbitrary. Both in Great Britain and on the Continent there was a multitude of cases (which occur to every reader of detailed histories of the Churches), in which the success attained by particular labourers, or agencies, was so rapid, decisive, and remarkable, that now-a-days it would certainly be set down as a revival. These cases are spread over the whole seventeenth century. This remark applies particularly to the labours of many men, both of the Church and of the Nonconformists in England, whose success is generally noticed, but not particularly described. It applies also to the labours of the Pietists in Germany. What are now commonly singled out as the revivals of those days, were really homogenous parts of a great mass of work, all of which was due to the same influences, bore the same intrinsic character, and produced on society substantially similar effects. When, for instance, we read of the effect of the labours of those preachers, who, about 1650, were sent into Wales by the Parliament; when we read of the change they produced in the moral aspect of the Principality, and of the hundreds or thousands of conversions, it is obvious that this was a revival, and a very important one. But work so substantially similar was doing in many places, and with various degrees of rapidity, that no very special record of the circumstances and details has been preserved.

It is with this explanation that one is to take the references to some particular cases, as the revival movements of those days. Such a movement there was, for instance, in Ayrshire, during the first quarter of the seventeenth century, under the ministry of Welsh at Ayr, and afterwards of Dickson at Irvine, and others. Some nervous affections, probably similar to those of which we have lately heard so much as occurring in Ireland, attended this movement, particularly in Stewarton, and was thence called the Stewarton sickness.* After this came the great awakening at Kirk of Shotts, brought about by a single sermon of Livingstone's in 1630. With regard to this revival, we have the testimony of Fleming (who became minister in the neighbourhood about twenty years after), that "near five hundred had at that time a discernible change wrought in them," most of whom stood the test of time. Other movements similar, but less important, took place about the same time in Scotland. A little before the Kirk of Shotts' revival, Ireland became the scene of an awakening perhaps more remarkable. It dates from about 1624, and took place in the county of Antrim, under the ministry of Blair, Cunningham, and other ministers, principally Scotch, then settled in that district. The result seems to have been a decided change in the whole character of the population. During the progress of the work an attempt was made to introduce hysterical and convulsive movements during public worship. These were repressed without much difficulty, and apparently did not re-appear.

Although active evangelistic work was carried on in all the countries of the Reformation during the sixteenth century, still the division and conflict which characterized it were not favourable to religion, and, especially, not favourable to any form of religious influence which depends on communities being tolerably excited in doctrine, and not vehemently agitated about external arrangements. Abroad it early became manifest that the defective arrangements of most continental Churches, in regard to purity, discipline, and government, were injuring the spirituality of religion, and hiding from men the real distinction between Church and world, between faith and unbelief. In the British Churches, after the noble efforts of the first half of the century, and amid the changes, contentions, persecutions, and recriminations of the second half, there grew up a generation that seemed to long only to get away from the atmosphere of their father's interests and conflicts altogether. Accordingly, at the close of the century, the Churches seem to have sunk gradually into a state of worldliness and indifference; and the eighteenth century is proverbial for the secular and unbelieving tone which prevailed during the greater part of it. Without any active discussion of creeds, there came a general disposition to wear them very loosely; and a decidedly glacial period of Church history set in. Abroad, the Pietists in the Evangelical Church and the Moravian brethren (with whatever defects of their own) made head actively against the torpor of the age, and the measure of success given to them approximated sometimes, more or less, to what is distinctively called the "revival" type. In Great Britain many faithful ministers and people laboured hard,† but still the general course was downward. This was not a state of things favourable to religious life; but if in such a state of things awakening influences are experienced, one may expect the reaction to be of a marked kind. Accordingly, a little before the middle of the century, great revivals occurred both in Great Britain and America.

In England the history of this revival is simply the early history of the Methodists. The movement, indeed, included the labours and triumphs of men who spent all their days within the Church of England (such as Berridge and Grimshaw), and who were led more or less independently to the course they took. Still it was one movement, and the main stream of it is to be traced to one source. It arose from Whitfield, and Wesley, and their coadjutors, preaching with great power and faithfulness the genuine doctrines of the Church of England, in their application to the consciences of men. Whatever peculiarities of procedure or of doctrine are to be ascribed to either of these evangelists, their work was in the main nothing but a hearty republication of the Reformation doctrine, with great faith and expectation, and with a success, which they believed, and most justly believed, to be given them from Heaven. A cordial belief in the main doctrines of the Reformation regained possession of a large part of the English mind, and became spirit and life in the case of many individuals. And this revolution had all the characters of what are more peculiarly called revivals; such as immense emotion propagated through large assemblies, sudden and poignant conviction of sin, professed conversions equally sudden, and, frequently, peculiar nervous affections associated with religious feeling. This great revival has left very great results. It was the reawakening of evangelical life in England; and its consequences are by no means to be sought for in the existing Methodists alone. The evangelical body within the Church of England, and all its activities, may be fairly affiliated to the same movement. Those despised preachers of a hundred years ago, gave, as instruments, the impulse which is still felt in so many parishes and congregations of the Church. In these, no doubt, it displays itself in a more tranquil manner. Yet equally in those who adhere to Methodist peculiarities, and in those who prefer the calmer atmosphere of the Establishment, we see the children of that great revival.

About the same time, that is, from 1740, or a few years earlier, Wales was shaken from end to end under the ministry of Howel Harris, Griffith Jones (of the Established Church), Daniel Rowlands (father of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists), and other vigorous and devoted labourers. As far as can be gathered from the scattered notices to which we have access, Wales has not since that time been long without some revival movements, more or less important and extensive—not so long, for instance, as either the British or the American Churches afterwards were.

Before this awakening had gone far in England, that is, about 1742, a similar awakening appeared in various parts of Scotland. The places where it was most notable were Cambuslang and Kilcuth, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow. In these parishes, especially the former, a considerable amount of seriousness had arisen under the ordinary instruction of their ministers, and societies for prayer which had been for some years in existence, had begun to be better attended. After this a deep and sudden concern fell upon the minds of many persons, usually during divine service; sometimes reaching to such a paroxysm of distress, as to cause weeping and crying out. Great pains were taken to instruct those who were thus affected, and to enable them to distinguish between mere emotion and a genuine submission to the truth and will of God. The result was, that several hundred persons gave every reason to believe that this revival had been a turning point in their spiritual history. Others, of course, after some impression and excitement cooled down again to their former temperament; the greater part of these were at no time regarded as converts. It may be proper to say, as the case has often been misrepresented, that nine years after this movement very particular inquiries were instituted, extending over a large district of country, to ascertain how far the persons supposed to be converted still gave evidence of being consistent Christians. The result, as we have stated it above, is as amply testified as a thing of the kind can be supposed to be. The movement was not confined to these two parishes. Many went from other parishes to see and hear what was taking place, and were themselves affected. But besides this, a considerable awakening, more decided in some places than in others, seems to have occurred in many of the midland districts of Scotland, and both in Edinburgh and Glasgow there was a marked increase of religious feeling, especially among the young. About the same time, and afterwards, a revival took place in several parishes in Ross-shire and Sutherlandshire. It is noteworthy that in these, while the moral and spiritual results were as decided as any one could wish, there were no outcries nor any bodily manifestations. Serious deportment and quiet shedding of tears seem to have been the only outward symptoms. During the remainder of the century any spiritual work done in Scotland did not assume the revival form.

THE CALLING OF CHILDHOOD.

A PICTURE most touching in its tender grace and purity is that of the child Samuel growing up in the shadows of the tabernacle. One that must have thrilled to the heart of many a mother in Israel as she brought her first-born to the altar of God, and that stood singular in its loveliness till the day when a young mother from the old grey town of Bethlehem stood in the Temple courts with her infant son, and dedicated him to God to grow up in fairer promise, not within the sacred cloister, but amid the hills of Galilee.

From his birth, Samuel had been marked out as a child of grace. Given in answer to prayer, consecrated to God by his pious mother in fulfilment of a vow, employed from earliest childhood in the service of the tabernacle, under the care of the aged high priest, he might be called the nursing of the sanctuary. As he stood at the altar ministering before the Lord, "girded with a linen ephod," his little hands swinging the censers, his fresh clear voice joining in the holy hymn, men could read in that innocent face the signs of an illustrious future, and see that God was training the young Levite for a lifetime of faithful service, for a career of usefulness that would leave a vivid and luminous track behind it. In one sense, the calling of Samuel was an event by itself. It was miraculous, and being so, we have no reason to believe that it will be repeated. Yet we are entitled to regard this calling of the Hebrew child long ago as symbolic of a great spiritual fact, one that holds true in regard to the kingdom of Christ—that there is a calling of God to each of us individually, and especially to the young. These are memorable words, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me."

GOD MAY CALL A CHILD.—If the fact be so, surely it should be deeply impressed on the heart of Christian parents, and said as simply and lovingly as may be to all the children who are found in the house of God, to the very youngest, that they have come to listen to the voice of God speaking to them. I think parents are in danger of forgetting this. There is no doubt that in the great majority of cases, the great spiritual awakening of the soul, that change which we term "conversion to God," comes with a riper age and wider experience; that it is generally attended with such emotions of contrition and self-abasement, such unaccustomed prayerfulness, such a kindling up of ardour, and love, and self-consecration, under the new impulse that has entered into one's life, as seem to have no place in the narrow circle of a child's experience. These solemn glooms and piercing lights seem not in any wise to belong to the little world in which the child lives and breathes from day to day. Strong spiritual convictions which heave, and rend, and shatter, may seem as much out of place there, as volcanic forces and shocks of earthquake in some quiet pastoral vale of our native land.

It is difficult to guard against limiting the methods in which the Spirit of grace and power may work in awakening any one soul to newness of life, even amongst those who have come to full age. I believe that much harm is done unconsciously by fettering His movements, and confining His sovereign operations within straight and rigid lines of theory. Every morning has some new miracle of sunrise; it is the same sun, the same atmosphere, the same earth; yet out of these old materials what everlasting freshness and changefulness do we see in each day's birth and revival! The dawn is always new: no two sunsets are the same; and God divides the light from the darkness in human spirits in diverse ways. So while, speaking generally, it is not till the mind has grown to some strength and maturity that the decisive change is wrought, it is important to remember that God, in ways we cannot tell, and while we think not of it, may work the blessed work of His grace in the heart of a little child. There are cases in which the young disciple seems to have been baptized of the Spirit from his birth, to have received as an infant the benediction of the lip and hand of Christ. The simple innocence of childhood may be refined and spiritualized into a grave and gentle piety, with its roots in the fear of God and the love of Jesus; the mind in its growth opening to the truth as silently,—we had almost said as naturally, as the flowercup opens to the light. Not only is this the case with those in whom we see a thoughtfulness and saintliness beyond their years, because they are to be early taken home, but in others (for all the good children do not die) who come to serve the will of Heaven in their generation,—who, as they go forth to the cares, and toils, and trials of life, take pure and blessed memories with them, that are a treasure and a safeguard, and keep their early Eden companionship with God and his angels to the last. To such as these we may fitly adapt the words that have been applied to childhood in general,—

"Thou liest in Abraham's bosom all the year;
And worshipping'st at the Temple's inner shrine
God being with thee when we know it not."

Once and again this has been seen in the case of the children of many prayers, early dedicated by devout and godly parents to the service of Him who gave them. And surely it would be seen oftener if the spirit of this mother in Israel were seen oftener in the Christian household,—if it were the heart's desire and prayer of parents for their offspring that Christ might be formed in them,—if the command were more regarded, as all the divine commands ought to be, in the light of a promise, "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." And therefore we need not be surprised to find in the word of God not only the calling of peasants to be judges, and shepherds to be kings, and husbandmen and vinedressers to be prophets, and fishermen to be apostles; but the calling of children to be servants of the Most High, that in them, as living epistles, may be visibly written the words, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Of them, also, is the election of grace,—a godly seed to maintain the unbroken succession of heirs of promise, to bear their part in the perpetual "Hosanna" which rises from the Christian temple, that "out of the mouth of babes and sucklings He may perfect praise."

BE NOT OVERCOME OF EVIL.

A CHRISTIAN man, in prosecuting some good work with humble earnestness and zeal, comes suddenly into somewhat difficult circumstances. His conduct, if he is to go on, will be liable to very great misrepresentation. The interests and views of others are so mixed up in it that he is almost sure to be attacked and if possible crushed. He sees all this dimly, but not being a man of much ability or resource, he does not know what to do. He goes straight on, and it all falls out. Able and unscrupulous adversaries arise, and transfix him with their sarcasm, or overwhelm him with denunciation. He tries to explain, but fails. He uses false illustrations and weak arguments in his honest endeavour to state the real case, and he is then met by relentless exposure and crushing retort. Even good men are shy of befriending him, and he has no weapons except his own sincerity before God. So he goes on, quietly and humbly; and whatever may be the state of the case in his private dealings with God, outwardly, and in the eyes of his fellow-men, he is overcome.

Another Christian man finds himself, in the work which he is called to do, in somewhat similar circumstances. The adversaries of the good cause take a favourable occasion to attack him, and to try to impede it. He sees clearly the advantage which they seem to have, and he sees too that it is only a seeming and superficial one. So he sets himself to unfold this, and prove it to all men. But he is determined not to do this in a half sort of way. He will not merely defend the right; he will vindicate himself, and crush his adversaries. They have been the aggressors, and they richly deserve exposure. So he buckles himself to the work, and brings in all the resources of logic, and satire, and retort. He exposes their arguments, unveils their motives, ridicules their false illustrations, tramples on their whole attack, and rides triumphantly over the field, scattering shafts of sarcasm all around.

Which of these two was "overcome of evil?" s.

THAT YOUR PRAYERS BE NOT HINDERED.

ALL is well with the Christian while his communion with his God and Saviour is not interrupted. And nothing can go well with him when there is interference here. All this life, therefore, should be shaped for maintaining an open way in his heart to the mercy-seat. Whatsoever, either by the word of God, by the general principles of religion, or by actual experience, we know to be unfavourable to the spirit, and unfitting for the exercise of prayer, should be carefully avoided: whatsoever is found to be promotive of them, as sedulously followed. This rule will be found of widest application. The spirit of prayer is affected by the whole range of the daily life. Business and pleasure, society and home-life, all bear upon it; but most of all, the intercourse of home. If our usual temper and deportment at home unfit us for communion with God in prayer, sad is our case. Husband and wife have much to do with each other's growth in grace. Theirs is the inmost circle of earthly relationship, lying next that sacred centre which the Holy Spirit makes his temple in the soul. The heart when it goeth up to the temple to pray, must pass through this "court of the women." The scenes there witnessed leave the last impression on the mind. The spirit and conduct there prevailing are the prelude to devotion. What if it should be the scene of wrangling, tempting the soul to anger or unkindness? Husband and wife, by spirit of their mutual converse, are wielding the strongest of earthly influence on self and one another. In the world of self-culture and home, life has most to do, and the ruling influence in home-life is the marriage relation. If grace rule there, it will rule everywhere. If that inner court be kept holy, the mercy-seat within the veil is less likely to be defiled. Other influences on the soul are occasional. Those of home are continuous. Others are the scenes through which we pass in walks abroad. These are the atmosphere of the dwelling wherein we abide. If, as the two who walked to Emmaus, husband and wife, in their earthly pilgrimage, do have Jesus as their companion, their mutual influence will indeed be blessed. If they do habitually regard and treat each other "as heirs together of the grace of life," they will separate at the door of their closets in the very "spirit of grace and supplication." But who can pass from domestic strife or unkindness into the presence of the God of peace and love? or how can the gentle dove of heaven brood in the heart amidst bitterness and storms?—Dr. Tyng.

QUIETNESS.

CULTIVATE quietness. Many people seem to cultivate the very reverse. They are always in a hurry—always bustling—always rushing about hither and thither, as if they meant to exemplify in their own proper persons the theory of perpetual motion. And then, if everything does not go quite straight, if there is some little hitch which prevents the wheels of daily life from running smoothly, they fuss, and fume, and fret, till they make matters ten times worse. Now, this is a very bad plan. You will rarely find that these people accomplish much. What they build up with one hand, they pull down with the other. They forget that in "quietness and confidence is their strength;" and, moreover, that there is no inherent power in noisy excitement. Far better is it to keep calm, and take things quietly as they come. Do what you can, and what you cannot do leave to God. And when troubles come, leave them to God too. Bend down and let the cloud sweep over you; and when it has passed, look up to the blue heaven beyond it, and thank God that it remains there still. But you will not make the cloud one whit the less dark by being restless and impatient under it.

"Our cross and trial do but press
The heavier for our bitterness."

Rather lie still before God, and let him do with you as seemeth him good; not in the stillness of indifference or stoicism, but the stillness of childlike submission, which leaves One to choose for it who will surely choose for the best. "Study," then, "to be quiet," alike in doing and in suffering. Pray that God may "calm, and keep you calm," resting in his love, and dwelling in the secret of his presence.—Christian Daily Life.

BRINGING OUR SHEAVES WITH US.

THE time for toil has passed; the night has come,

The last and saddest of the harvest eves;
Worn out with labour long and wearisome,
Drooping and faint the reapers hasten home,
Each laden with his sheaves.

Last of the labourers, thy feet I gain,

Lord of the harvest! and my spirit grieves
That I am burdened, not so much with grain
As with a heaviness of heart and brain;
Master, behold my sheaves!

Few, light, and worthless—yet their weight

Through all my frame a weary aching leaves;
For long I struggled with my hapless fate,
And stayed and toiled till it was dark and late;
Yet these are all my sheaves.

Full well I know I have more tares than wheat;

Brambles and flowers, dry stalks and withered leaves,
Wherefore I blush and weep, as at thy feet
I kneel down reverently, and repeat,
"Master, behold my sheaves!"

Yet do I gather strength and hope anew;

For well I know thy patient love perceives
Not what I did, but what I strove to do—
And though the full ripe ears be sadly few,
Thou wilt accept my sheaves.

SPIRITUAL PRIDE.

THIS is a common vice with us all—to wish to grow independent. We get a little stock of grace on hand, and we think we will spend our pocket money before we will go again to our Father's treasury. We have a little faith, our Master honours us with enjoyment of his presence; and we grow so great that we cry, "My mountain standeth firm; I shall never be moved." Ah! there is always a trial near at hand. Do we not make most of our trials through our boasting, and do we not kindle our own furnace with the fuel of our pride? If we were more childlike, resting more simply on the Spirit's power, should we not be more happy? Does not God our Father hide his face, because to see his face too much might make us exalted above measure? Does not that thorn tear our flesh, because otherwise we should lie upon the bed of carnal security and sleep all day long? Oh, we might be always on the mountain-top if we had not such dizzy heads and such slippery feet!—C. H. Spurgeon.

THE INCUMBENT OF HAWORTH.*

PART FIRST.

A RECENT celebrity, and of a widely different character from that of the devoted, apostolic, and somewhat eccentric incumbent of Haworth during the middle of the last century, has rendered that locality one of great present attraction to English tourists and travellers. John Newton, with his friend the incumbent in his mind, wrote, more than sixty years ago, "Haworth is one of those obscure places which (like the fishing towns of Galilee, favoured with our Lord's presence) owe all their celebrity to the gospel. Its name would scarcely be known at a distance, were it not connected with the name of Grimshaw." Another source of interest has recently been gathering around it, lords and ladies of high degree, the lovers of literature, the admirers of genius, the curious in details of the life and manners of such as have sprung out of obscurity into a sudden and commanding place in public attention, all eyes have been attracted towards it as the spot where the authoress of "Jane Eyre" penned her bold and original fictions, and where she and her sisters spent their strange sad life, deepened in its sufferings by the sensibility of their genius. It is to its first, and we shall venture to say, higher fame, that the writer of the Life of William Grimshaw takes us back. We welcome this fresh rehearsal of a life too precious to be forgotten, and which has never before been told over with such minuteness of detail, and fulness of appreciation, as in the Memoir which has just appeared by Mr. Spence Hardy. His volume rolls back the years of a century, and brings us once more into contact with the men and the times of John and Charles Wesley, when they blew the gospel trumpet over the length and breadth of England, and when to hunt a Methodist was no unusual English village sport, curate and rector turning out in full cry in pursuit of the game. We shall endeavour to give our readers some conception of those times, by following the narrative of events traced out in the biography of Grimshaw, recommending the entire volume for the insight it gives into a most important epoch in the religious history of England; and the light it throws upon the labours and life of a man who was in labours abundant, and for the great end that "he might save some."

William Grimshaw was born 3d September 1708, in the village of Brindle, a quiet agricultural village lying between the manufacturing towns of Preston and Blackburn. Of his boyhood we have little further account, than that he was educated at the Grammar School of

Blackburn and Heskin, both in the immediate neighbourhood of his native village. While yet in early life, he had serious thoughts of death, judgment, the sufferings of Christ, the glories of heaven, and the torments of hell! Referring to that period in his after life, he remarks, "That it concerns all people, to take notice that the Holy Ghost begins with us in our infancy, to draw us by his convictive influences towards conversion. This I can bear witness to, and I am persuaded, that if any man will but carefully recollect himself, he can date, as far back as his infancy, the remembrance of many sharp rebukes and upbraidings, checks and terrors of conscience, for having done amiss. He can very well remember several awful and heart-affecting thoughts about a God and judgment, death and eternity, in these tender years." Ripening years did not, at least in appearance, develop these early seeds in the heart of Grimshaw. The good impressions of his youth yielded to the influence of thoughtless companions while a student of Christ's College, Cambridge. It is said, that during that time, though his college attendance was with a view to preparation for the ministry, he became a proficient in wickedness, and that falling into bad company, he learned to drink and swear. On being ordained deacon in 1731, the solemn thoughts of his childhood again returned in their original force, when he was called upon to declare, in the presence of the people, that he regarded himself as "inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon himself this office and ministration." It does not appear, however, that these revived impressions were permanent. In his first curacy, at Todmorden, the young curate was more of a pleasant companion than a serious, earnest minister of the word. His delight was in hunting, fishing, and playing cards. He was careful in the observation of outward professional propriety. If his companions swore, he did not; if they drank to excess, he shrank from the vulgarity of intemperance. On Sabbath, his duties as a clergyman were regularly performed; the prayers were read with seriousness, and a sermon was preached. The voice of conscience was thus hushed, and he probably thanked God, as his biographer observes, that he was not as other men, nor even as the too earnest publicans, who were known to be praying in many spots around the parish. The death of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, happening during his curacy at Todmorden, re-awakened his conscience. His convictions became so deep and solemn, that they could no longer be set aside. He began in earnestness to seek for power over sin and purity of heart in the methods employed by those who know not the scriptural doctrine of the forgiveness of sin. He at once gave up the sports and amusements in which he had formerly indulged, and avoided every form of outward transgression. He formed good resolutions, kept two diaries to record the sins of the day, made vows, observed fasts, offered his supplications, and became devotedly attentive to all the duties of the pastorate, yet without peace or rest of mind. It seemed to him to be hard, that when he was doing all he could to please God, the divine favour was still withheld. He feared him as his Master; he had not attained to love him as his Father and his friend.

But the day of his deliverance was at hand. On visiting one of his friends, he met with a book which he opened. As was the custom in those times, in respectable houses a range of pewter dishes adorned the walls. As they shone in their unspotted lustre, they flashed upon a book to which his eye on the instant was drawn. It was Owen on Justification. He took it home, and studied it with diligence and prayer; and was led thereby to see that, however long his present course might be continued, it must be unavailing for his deliverance. He became henceforth willing to renounce himself; every degree of fancied merit and ability, and to embrace Christ only for his all in all. "Oh, what light and comfort," he exclaims, "did I now enjoy in my own soul, and what a taste of the pardoning love of God!" The Bible became a new book to him. Before he knew it only in the letter, but now in its spiritual power; and he afterwards told a friend who visited him, "that had God drawn up his Bible to heaven, and sent him down another, it could not have been newer to him!"

About the period of this great change, Grimshaw was removed from Todmorden, and inducted (May 1742) into the living of Haworth. The village of Haworth is situated upon a declivity that shelves down towards a ravine, along which flows the Worth. It is a long narrow village, says the biographer of Grimshaw, substantially built with brown stone, its appearance in excellent keeping with the bold character of the surrounding scenery. There is one extended street, paved with wrought stones, on which the wooden clogs of the children, rimmed with iron, fall with startling noise as the wild young northerners come to gaze upon the stranger. The street rises with a steepness, that in some places would be supposed to render the higher parts of the village inaccessible to wheeled carriages. Indeed, the neighbouring villages have a legend, such as the country folk of rural localities love to tell, that when the first carriage came to Haworth, not many centuries ago, the astonished people brought out grass and other provender wherewith to feed it, under the supposition that it was some strange animal. To catch the nobler features of this now far-famed spot, the traveller must surmount the hill upon which it stands, and then look around from the elevation thus gained. Before him is a glorious expanse of moor and mountain, stretching onward for miles and miles, with scarcely a dwelling to break the sense of solitude. The blue heather mantles the plain, darkened here and there by the heaps of turf, or peat, that the lone labourer has prepared for his winter's fuel, and presenting occasional fissures made by the rain-streams, with boulders in their bed.

That the manners of the inhabitants partook of the rugged features of their locality, may be inferred from an incident connected with the patronage of Haworth, which took place at a somewhat later period. The incident affords a good illustration of the rude and rough, but determined expedients by which the north of England men assert their rights. It shows the value they attach to the power of nominating their own minister. It was not unfrequent, the biographer of Grimshaw tells us, for the people in that neighbourhood to oppose the entrance into the church of the minister appointed by the patron of the living; and in some instances, the fury of the mob had only been overcome by the assistance of a party of dragoons. On the occasion of the death of the last incumbent of Haworth, one of the most memorable of these ecclesiastical battles was fought. The vestrymen and people of Haworth maintained that the appointment to the living was conjointly vested in the vicar of Bradford and a number of trustees. The vicar appointed, on his sole authority, the Rev. Samuel Redhead, a clergyman of great respectability and worth. In consequence, on the first Sunday of his attendance "to read himself in," the whole congregation left the church as the second lesson was read, and he and the clerk were left to conclude the service alone. The next Sunday a man rode into the church upon an ass, with a number of old hats piled upon his head. On the third Sunday a chimney sweeper ascended the pulpit steps, and with solemn mockery seemed to nod assent to the sentences of the sermon. On emerging from the church, Mr. Redhead was thrown into a heap of soot prepared for the purpose; and it was with difficulty he made his escape from their rage. This was his last attempt; the mob had conquered; and the Rev. Patrick Brontë was appointed in his stead.

On his entrance into his new charge at Haworth, Grimshaw found that the Methodists had been at work in his parish before him. At first he was little disposed to welcome their assistance. The report having reached him of the proposed visit to Haworth of John Nelson, a stone mason, whose name afterwards became great in the sight of thousands, he charged his people not to go near him, as he understood that, wherever the Methodists went, they turned everything upside down. It being shortly afterwards reported that William Darney, a Scotchman, was to preach near Haworth, he resolved to appear at the place appointed, and by publicly confuting his arguments, prevent his parishioners from being thereby led astray. Justification by faith was the subject of Darney's discourse. The peace and consolation to troubled souls from that doctrine was forcibly brought home to the incumbent's mind by the Methodist preacher. He sought further interviews with him, and not far from the parsonage, in a stone quarry, held frequent communings with the Scotchman. The effect of these interviews was soon apparent. His views of Methodism had entirely changed. He had himself received fresh light into the fulness of the privileges of the believer in a free justification. On an early occasion he gave out the hymns when Darney preached, and soon after took a more decided part, by praying in public at one of the services held by the northern evangelist. The shout of the foe was soon heard, "Mad Grimshaw is turned Scotch Will's clerk, and Scotch Will guides and leads mad Grimshaw." But over the convinced, thoroughly awakened, and aroused spirit of Grimshaw, ridicule had no power. He poured forth his full, earnest heart amongst his astonished parishioners; his doctrine that of the early reformers, his energy and power of labour inspired and sustained from the same source. Speedily the church of Haworth was filled to overflowing, multitudes congregating from all the hamlets whence it was possible to reach it. Not satisfied with the usual public ministrations, he commenced a Sabbath evening lecture for the poor and ill-clad—the ragged classes—who would not worship in the presence of their richer neighbours; and to take away from the careless every excuse for not coming to listen to the word of God, he adopted the plan of preaching in the houses of the people, making his monthly circuit among four hamlets under his care, preaching in each three times in the month. As in the course of these cottage ministrations he often came to the very verge of his own bounds, the cottagers of the contiguous parish could not understand why he should not step over the boundary and speak to them, who equally needed to hear the blast of the faithful watchman's trumpet. From numerous farmsteads and hamlets, the cry was heard, "Come over and help us." He could not withstand the appeal. The limit once passed, it was only home duty that prescribed the extent of his future preaching range. From that time he established "two rounds," in which alternately he spent the six days of the week, with the crag for his pulpit, the glen for his oratory, the market-place for his church, and the roused rabble for his auditors. Twelve or fourteen sermons, and sometimes as many as thirty were preached in a week, when he was in full work. He regarded it as an idle week when the tale did not amount to more than a dozen. To preserve those in their profession who had received the truth, he established meetings for private monition and prayer, appointing a leader over each company, who was to give an account to him of the growth or decay of each individual, that he might speak a suitable word to them.

On entering upon the charge of Haworth, he found little attention paid to the observance of the Lord's day. The church was situated at the extremity of the parish, and it was thought the people from the remoter districts would not come so great a distance to worship, unless they had the further inducement of being able to purchase such stores for their families as were not to be procured nearer their own dwellings. Sabbath had become a busy marketing day. To check this desecration, he adopted the most vigorous means. It was the custom in that locality for the church-wardens to leave their pew in the course of the morning service, and visit the public houses, and the usual places of resort for the village idlers, to ascertain whether idlers might be there lurking. Not content with requiring these officers to do their duty, the incumbent was accustomed to leave the church himself when the Psalm before the sermon was sung, and if any were found wandering in the streets, or lounging in the church-yard, they were driven before him into the house of God. It has been said that in this service the horse whip was used, and that on some occasions he told the clerk to give out the 119th Psalm, that he might have the longer time in which to prosecute his search. But this is probably a myth or exaggeration. John Newton relates, that as a friend of his was passing a public house in Haworth, on the Lord's-day, his attention was attracted towards a number of persons who were making their escape from it—some by jumping out of the lower windows, and others by climbing over a wall. At first he supposed from the hurry of their flight that the house must be on fire; but on inquiring the reason of the sudden rush, he found that it all arose from their having discovered the near approach of the parson. At another time, a man was passing the village on his way to call the doctor, when his horse lost a shoe. On applying to the blacksmith to have his loss repaired, the reply was that unless the minister granted leave it could not be done. Grimshaw learning that the case required haste, consented that the horse should be shod.

Horse racing, which had prevailed in his parish, became a principal object of his indignant remonstrance, but apparently to no effect. Notwithstanding his exhortations, when the day came the horses were entered in the list, and the expecting multitude began to gather. But they were doomed to disappointment. An agency was at work on the power of which they had not reckoned. Grimshaw was on his knees in earnest prayer; and—

"God's hands or bound or open are,
As Moses or Elijah prays."

A storm arose as the crowds were seen hastening along the various pathways that led from valley or village; rain came down in torrents, the race-course was forsaken, and the horse and his rider were alike unable to appear in the field. On the next day the tempest was still in the sky, and when the third day came its dark aspect was unchanged—the rain descended as if the windows of heaven had been opened. The narrator of this incident simply, but significantly remarks, "There have been no races in the neighbourhood of Haworth, from that time till the present day." A ministry of such energy, ceaseless labour, and prayer, was not without the most marked and memorable fruits. It was accompanied with a signal revival, the features of which we shall notice in a continuation of this paper.

ANCIENT ATTESTATIONS TO THE TRUTH OF REVELATION.

IN a late number of the Edinburgh Review, is an able article on what are technically called the graffiti of Pompeii. In plain English, these are the writings upon the street corners and places of public resort, which are now disclosed to the world, and throw great light upon the habits, tastes, and manners of those who formed the populace in this old Roman city. Then, as now, men would write their names, accompanied sometimes with favourite sentiments, upon the elegant columns of the temples and forum, or sometimes whilst lounging upon the sides of the houses at the corners of the streets. Every literary man is acquainted with the ancient inhabitants of Italy, as portrayed by their celebrated poets, historians, and philosophers, and no one can have failed to have remarked, in his intercourse with these celebrated men of antiquity, how the dark taint of heathenism had spread itself over their inner natures, and corrupted their very souls. There may be civilization and refinement without the gospel, but its characteristics are spurious; for man without the light of revelation gropes his way in darkness, and revels in sins which only become the more hideous when contrasted with the elegance and luxury of his outward circumstances.

If the learned and cultivated were so gross and sensuous, what must the rabble have been? We can easily imagine their depth of degradation, and these street writings are indicative of it. Whilst many of them are curious, showing the propensity of men in all ages to deface the most beautiful edifices by pencilling upon them the records of their visits, the scraps of verses and sentiments affixed give insight into the very recesses of their hearts. Whilst many are harmless, many more reveal a depth of depravity scarcely to be conceived, so that in the words of the reviewer—

"It were well if these were the only evidences of the licentious manners of Pompeii which the graffiti supply; but there are others of a far more revolting character. Into these, of course, P. Garrucci does not enter; but there can be no doubt that many of the street scribblings fully confirm, if indeed they do not darken, the hateful impressions regarding Pompeian morality which were produced by the pictures, images, and other relics of the city brought to light by earlier explorations.

"The very worst of these revelations, it must be confessed, are borne out by the graffiti. We can only understand their presence in a public place by supposing the whole tone of the public mind to be sunk to those lowest depths of hideous and unnatural depravity, of which so awful a picture is drawn in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans."

But whilst the truthfulness of the picture of heathenism, as exhibited in the New Testament, is thus affirmed, another extract from the same article relative to a street writing recently discovered at Rome, opens to our view another striking corroboration of the realities of our holy religion. The worship of the crucified One was then, as it is now, the great object of the Christian faith, and whilst it excited pagan animosity, and drew forth the contempt and ridicule of the worshippers of their false gods, it indicates how deeply seated in the minds of the followers of the Lord Jesus were then the realities of his death and passion, and how firmly they were convinced of the truthfulness of that which they could easily have scrutinized, and which, if an imposture, they could have readily detected.

"Mention has been made more than once of graffiti lately discovered in other localities, and especially at Rome. Of these, the most important have been found in the substruction of the palaces of the Cæsars, recently excavated. It would carry us entirely beyond our allotted limits to describe these in detail. Some of them, indeed, were discovered several years since, and are embodied in P. Garrucci's general collection. But there is one so exceedingly remarkable, and indeed of so deep and peculiar an interest, that it would be unpardonable to pass it over.

"The apartment in which it was found is one of several (now subterranean) chambers on the Palatine, which, in the course of the many alterations and extensions of plan during the progress of the building of the palace, were dismantled and filled up in order to form substructions for a new edifice to be erected on a higher level. The light and air being effectually excluded by this process, the walls have remained to this day in a state of preservation little inferior to that of the buildings of Pompeii. The particular apartment in question having been opened in December 1856, some traces of Greek characters were observed upon the wall; and, on a fuller examination by P. Garrucci, who was attracted to the spot by the news of the discovery, these characters proved to be an explanatory legend written beneath a rude sketch upon the wall, in which P. Garrucci at once recognised a pagan caricature of the crucifixion of our Lord, and of the Christians' worship of their crucified God. This blasphemous sketch represents a figure with arm uplifted and outstretched (as if in the act of kissing the hand, a recognised attitude of worship or adoration*), turned towards a cross, upon which is suspended a human figure with the head of a horse, or perhaps of an onager, or wild ass.

"If any doubt can be entertained as to the purport of this sketch, it would be dispelled by the legend underneath:—

'ALEXAMENUS WORSHIPS GOD.'

Who this Alexamenus may have been, and what may have been the special occasion (if, indeed, there were any) of this rude caricature, it is of course impossible now to conjecture. From the name it may be inferred that, like a large proportion of the Christians of Rome in the early centuries, he was a Greek, and perhaps a slave. But whatever may be said as to the individual on whom it was meant to be a satire, the singular graffito, thus unexpectedly brought to light after so many centuries, is at once a most interesting illustration of the struggle between the Christianity of that early age and its yet powerful and contemptuous rival, and a literal verification of one of the most striking passages in the 'Apology' of Tertullian. It is impossible to doubt that this blasphemous caricature is, in one of its forms, the actual reality to which Tertullian alludes. It is not alone that this father defends himself and his fellow-Christians from the general charge of having an ass's head as their God, and that he retorts upon the pagans themselves their charge against the Christians of "being superstitious respecting the cross," by showing that the pagans also worshipped the cross when they erected trophies, or took the military oaths upon their standards; he describes something closely resembling the very picture which we have here before us in this rude graffito, as a caricature of the Christian worship which was then popular among the pagan calumniators.

* See Job xxxi. 27; 1 Kings xix. 18; also Juvenal's—

"We forbear to touch the higher associations which this strange discovery presses upon the mind. But even as a purely historical monument, the most unimaginative reader will regard it with the deepest interest. It opens to us, with a distinctness which no written record could supply, a glimpse into those dark days of the infant Church, while her divine founder was still 'a folly to the Gentile,' and while it was still possible to present him to the popular mind of paganism under that hideous type of folly which is here depicted in all its revolting coarseness. If the graffito of the palace of the Cæsars reveals much of this, it suggests yet much more; and its unlooked-for discovery seems to afford reason to hope that, from quarters which are least suspected, light may yet be cast upon a period whose social history has hitherto been all but a blank, or, at least, has only been known in dim and shadowy outline."

THE HISTORY OF REVIVALS.

A SKETCH.

PART II.

BEFORE these movements in Great Britain took place, the great series of American revivals had begun. In no country was there a state of things which one might more naturally expect to prepare the way for extensive movements of this kind. Originally peopled by Puritan settlers, New England contained a population scarcely at all divided in religious belief; trained, perhaps, to higher views than any other people on the earth of the nature and requirements of true religion; and yet, owing to various causes, decidedly and consciously degenerate from the religious fervour and consistency of their fathers. This people, including no great variety of classes, of parties, or of interests, could readily participate in common movements of mind. Moreover, then as now, America was distinguished from all Christian countries, by the extent to which persons who fully shared the common faith, and attended public worship, still abstained from the communion; forbearing to profess themselves members of Christ, as long as they felt that they had not resolved to follow him. In spite of some theories then recently started to countenance an opposite practice, it was, and still is, more the case in America than anywhere else, that men who believe in Christianity, but cannot bring themselves to be Christians, practically confess or own their position. This state of things may be regarded as on the whole advantageous or disadvantageous; but at all events it enables the preacher to close with the consciences of a large part of his audience without ceremony; while their honesty is a perpetual admonition to any members of the Church who are living in formalism or hypocrisy. Though degenerate from the spirit and practice of their fathers, there was still in the country a large amount of genuine religion, to hand down the image as well as the tradition of a more fervent age. And before the middle of the eighteenth century several able and fervent preachers arose, of that order of men whose devotedness at least is not denied even by those who abuse them most. In these circumstances, after various local awakenings, came the notable revival at Northampton in 1735; notable because it had Jonathan Edwards for its guide, its historian, its apologist, and its critic; notable for the power with which it laid hold of almost the whole population of the place, while many neighbouring places were also extraordinarily moved; notable, lastly, for the purity and brilliancy of its moral and spiritual results. This proved to be the preliminary to a much more extensive movement, which began about the year 1740, partly under the influence of the Tennents and other American ministers, but in a great measure, perhaps chiefly, under the preaching of Whitefield. It extended through all the colonies as far south as Virginia; and till within the last two years it might fairly be regarded as the greatest awakening of human consciences under Protestant preaching that has taken place in any equal space of time since the Reformation. It was remarkable equally for the awakening of persons previously careless, and for the extraordinary impulse given to the religious dispositions of the devout. As to the manifestation of emotion, it varied in different places, very much, apparently, according to the influence exerted by the guiding persons in congregations. In some places there were outcries and faintings during public worship. In other places the movement was not less deep, but more self-control was shown. An immense number of persons were regarded as the "fruits" of this revival, which lasted for nearly two years. Unfortunately, towards the end of this period a devout man of the name of Davenport, who had been regarded as useful in the work, began to urge various devices of irregular zeal, and particularly to lay down fanatical principles as to the mode of judging who were and who were not converted. Churches, which had hitherto accepted thankfully the profession of faith and penitence, made with apparent seriousness and intelligence, and accompanied with corresponding behaviour, referring further trial to the Judge of all, now became torn with dissension about signs of conversion, especially in reference to the conversion of their ministers. This, of course, gave a new direction to men's minds. The confusion was indeed kept from spreading by vigorous and judicious efforts; but the work had been arrested; and in those places where Davenport's principles had found access, the evil could not be cured. Davenport himself, with a candour rare in men of his disposition, became convinced of his mistakes, made the most ample confession of the spiritual pride which had misled him, and laboured to undo his own work, but in vain. Two generations afterwards, Nettleton found it hopeless to work in some places* where this unhappy spirit had made its home, so inveterate was the influence which had perverted the views and feelings of the Churches in these districts.

After this no very important movement of a similar kind took place till the year 1792, when the modern series of American revivals may be said to have begun. From that period to the present a continuous chain of revivals has marked the history of the American Churches, appearing now in one part of that great country, and now in another, sometimes with quieter and sometimes with more stirring accompaniments. The earliest years of the century, the year 1821 and those which followed, and about the year 1831, may be noticed as particularly signalized by such movements. Their character may be summed up by saying, 1st, That some of the more enthusiastic sects have brought discredit on American revivals by absurdities which have been very unjustly charged upon the whole; 2d, That in newly peopled districts where the ministry was feeble in proportion to the numbers of the inhabitants, and neither religious nor secular education had gone far, revivals which began well have occasionally run out into extravagance, of course with an ultimately unhappy effect on religion. This was the case, for instance, in Kentucky, 1800-1803, where some very curious nervous affections were also developed.† 3d, That all along, the principles applied, whether to awaken consciences, or to guide them when awakened, or to enable men to test their own spiritual condition, were generally speaking the very same in which all true divines of the Reformation concur, applied, of course, with more or less skill in different cases. 4th, That many most important revivals were carried through with great quietness and solemnity, without the least symptom of tumult and disorder; but, 5th, That from about the year 1826 a popular preacher of the name of Finney began to introduce measures tending to produce excitement, and indicating a disposition to rely on the results of mere excitement. These measures for a few years found considerable acceptance in various quarters; were from the first opposed by many leading men of the American Churches, including those who had been most instrumental in previous revivals; and after causing a great deal of bitterness and division, gradually manifested their bad effects and lost what repute they had. It is a fair subject for consideration whether the American Churches may not have shown a disposition to rely too exclusively and lean too strongly to the revival form of spiritual work. But at all events, their long and continuous experience has led to important results. It has enabled the American Church, generally speaking, to arrive at guiding principles as to the best way of dealing with awakenings of this kind; and it has formed a public opinion among intelligent Christians, which has enabled them to eliminate from their revivals, at least in the principal religious bodies, unseemly excitement and contagious nervous affections. Thus the genuine nature of revival movements has become clear, and prejudices once naturally entertained have to a large extent given way. Those who desire to see the views of intelligent American Christians on this subject may consult Sprague's Lectures on Revivals, republished in this country by Collins many years ago. This volume contains a most valuable appendix of letters by American ministers of all denominations. For an interesting view of the best methods of American revivalism, with some views in the background of those which are less to be applauded, the reader cannot do better than consult the life of Nettleton, republished lately under the editorship of Mr. Bonar.

The course of our sketch has led us to omit till now any notice of the Welsh revival under Charles of Bala. Itinerant schools in this case prepared the way. Remarkable the great disadvantage under which the people were placed for want of ability to read the Bible, Mr. Charles, about 1785, started a system of itinerant teaching. The teachers remained three-quarters of a year in one place, and the classes were attended by adults as well as children. These schools were examined by Mr. Charles, often in the open air before immense numbers of people, generally on their Biblical knowledge. Great interest was awakened; and at length, in 1791, a very great awakening took place. Mr. Charles died in 1814, and to the close of his life a remarkable blessing rested on his labours.*

We do not think it necessary to dwell on more recent revivals in our own country and elsewhere during the present century. It is known that during the first three decades of it revivals occurred in Perthshire and various other parts of the Highlands of Scotland of an eminently satisfactory kind. Afterwards Lowland towns and districts became, here and there, scenes of similar work. At present there are in Great Britain more extensive tokens of religious movement than for very many years. May it prove as deep, spiritual, and lasting as it is extensive, and may it spread and deepen more and more!

Many remarks might be made in regard to the events now sketched. One occurs which has not been sufficiently adverted to; it refers to the results of the more local revivals. It has become very common in some quarters to speak of these results as very evanescent. The impression depends usually on an oversight. It must appear as though the results were evanescent by the very nature of the case. Thus, let there be at a given date in any town, village, or circumscribed district, a considerably larger proportion of any denomination than corresponds to the number of that denomination in the country generally. Whatever be the prosperity of that denomination in the country generally, it will seem to go back in the particular district, because the numbers who leave it will not be replaced in the same proportion from the surrounding districts. So also when a local revival has formed in any place a disproportionate number of lively Christians. These may remain earnest and devoted, but they will not remain there. They will gradually remove, die, &c.; they will be replaced by persons of whom the Christians may only be in the proportion which obtains over the country generally. And an observer coming to the place twenty years after will very readily be led to give his testimony in this shape: "I have been at —, and inquired; the revival there has left no fruit at all." It is a testimony founded on a mere blunder.

A LIFE-PARABLE.

POOR Heinrich Müller was a weary boy when he laid down his knapsack and sat to rest under a linden-tree.

The smoke of the city of Hanover rose like a mist in the horizon, but in spite of the extreme flatness of the country, the city itself was still too distant to be seen. That blue mist brought many hopes and fears to the little orphan's heart. Could it be that he would really find a home there in his uncle's house, or would he need to lead still the same, dreary, wandering life that he had done since his mother's death? Heinrich was too tired to be very hopeful, and tears rolled down his cheeks while he ate the dry, black bread that remained in his knapsack. "I will read my parable again," he said to himself, "mother was so fond of it;" and taking from his pocket some stray leaves of a book, he read—

A LIFE-PARABLE.

"Two young travellers stood together, prepared for a journey. They were bound for the same country, and were going on the same road, but it was unlike any that I had seen before. It was intersected by many distinct pathways, and I could see that each traveller had his own appointed one. Some were long and some short, yet each led to the same neighbouring land. All were more or less difficult, but some had so much sunshine that the dazzled eye could not see the toils of the way, while others seemed to lie altogether in the shade.

"The two young travellers still stood hand in hand, but they were soon to part company. One, 'fairer than the sons of men,' had come to guide them on the way, and I wondered when I saw that he placed Lionel on a sunny path, and Gotthold—little, timid Gotthold—he carried to one in deepest shade. I thought that I would have put the little trembler in the sunshine, and, if need be, have sent his stronger comrade to that gloomy pathway, but their heavenly Guide answered me, 'My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways.'

"Now, I saw that while he was never far from either of them, yet his tenderest care was given to my favourite Gotthold. Also, I saw that the child, who at first had cast wistful looks towards the sunny side of the road, was now satisfied, and went along in quiet trust, and I marvelled, until I saw that as the guiding pillar of fire lit up the Israelites' night, so there was a brightness in the shining One by his side that lightened up each successive step of the way he went.

"Poor child, he needed such a Guide, for Want and Sickness, two dreaded foes, kept close beside him, trying to make him halt or fall. After a while he encountered a great storm, and a thick mist of Temptation so darkened the air that I could no longer behold him, but when it cleared away the little traveller was safe. His heavenly Guide was very near to him then, and such a look of holy joy shone upon the child's face that he seemed to have forgotten that Want and Sickness were still tracking his footsteps. As he hastened on, he sang the old pilgrim's hymn with a clear, untroubled voice—

"'Fulness to such a burden is
As go on pilgrimage;
Here little, and hereafter bliss,
Is best from age to age.'

"'Surely,' I thought, 'this is enough, and the sun will now shine on my little Gotthold's path!' But he did not need so poor a light.

"He had journeyed only a little further when a cloud of thick darkness began to close around him, but ere it hid him from my view, I saw him clinging closer to his beloved Friend, while he cried aloud, 'I will fear no evil, for thou art with me.'

"Then I saw him no more, for another suffering child had gone to that land whose inhabitants shall no more say, 'I am sick,' and I heard the echoes of his welcome home. Then my heart said, 'Behold, we count them happy which endure.'

"All this time Lionel had been basking in the sunshine, till I wondered if so different a journey could lead to the same glorious end, so I turned to observe this other traveller Zionwards.

"The remembrance of that wondrous joy I had sometimes seen in Gotthold, made me expect a radiant look in every face I met upon the sunny side of the road. But it was not so; and least of all, was there any trace of it on Lionel's? Poor child, he had made quite a heavy burden to himself of various glittering baubles he had met with on his journey, for he fancied they were precious stones, while they were but tinsel scattered by an enemy's hand.

"Also, Flattery and Luxury were close beside him—two false-hearted followers they were, but he had mistaken them for friends, and had gladly entered into fellowship with them; and when I saw this I trembled more for him than I had ever done for Gotthold in his darkest days. In a little while the path he was treading took an abrupt turn till it became involved in the same gloom that had darkened all Gotthold's journey. A fierce storm arose; and on one ominous cloud that came riding across the sky, I read, 'Riches make themselves wings and fly away,' and Lionel trembled as he went into the cloud. When I saw him again, the treasures he had prized were gone, but Flattery and Luxury were also far behind, and I thought that it was a light price at which to have bought off such treacherous foes. The glorious Guide of the travellers was near him now, and he had caught something of Gotthold's look of quiet trust.

"It was not long before the sun rose again upon him more brightly than before. Then Flattery and Luxury once more drew near, but Lionel would not now treat them as friends, and a hard battle he had to fight with them all the rest of the way. A long and toilsome journey he had; and as he marched steadily on, bearing the heat and burden of the day, he must have sometimes wished for the quiet of a shadier path, but his course never turned that way again. As he drew near to the end, this traveller on the sunny side was indeed satisfied with length of days, and was ready to exclaim, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.' So, when his work was done, he, too, found an entrance unto the courts above, and I saw him no more.

"This life-parable was closed, and I said, 'He led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation.'"

Heinrich had read his parable and learned its lesson. "I need not fear the shady side any more than Gotthold did," he thought, "for I, too, have Jesus for my Friend and Guide." So he re-adjusted his knapsack, and as he trudged along the dusty highway he wept no more, but began to sing, as Gotthold had done—

A PILGRIM SONG.

I journey along,
On a cloudy day,
Apart from the throng
Of the glad and gay.
But Jesus is near,
More perfectly known,
When we may appear
To travel alone.
Those passing along
With skies ever bright,
Have lost the sweet song
He gives in the night.

THE MISSIONARY MARTYR OF DELHI.*

THE martyr roll of the late Indian Mutiny is not yet completed. One after another of the European and native Christians who endured that great fight of afflic-tion are becoming known to us. Their names and testimonies are being rescued from oblivion, and added to the great company who have not counted their lives dear unto them. In a brief, unpretending, but truly interesting memoir, under the title of "The Missionary Martyr of Delhi," we are presented with a sketch of another of the sufferers of that period, whose missionary life was cut short after two years' service in the Indian field.

In the premature close of the career of John Mackay, the Baptist mission lost a young missionary of highest promise, whose calm, brave, faithful, meek, yet self-reliant spirit indicated a future of great results. Like other eminent men who have gone forth to the heathen, Mackay was of humble origin. Carey was a cobbler, Livingstone a factory-boy, Hunt a Lincolnshire farm-servant: yet what three men can be named who have more indelibly printed on India, on Africa, and the barbarous islands of the Fiji, their names and their works?

Born and brought up in St. Andrews by his parents, who belonged to the working classes, John Mackay was destined to follow in their steps. After some indecision in his choice, working at one time as a weaver, and then indicating a strong inclination to the more adventurous life of a sailor, he settled to the occupation of a stone-mason, yet not till he had received a good English education in the Madras College, and shown a decided liking to his books, and such a proficiency in scholarship as to carry off the highest prizes in all his classes. Even at this period the wish to attend college, and to gratify his thirst for knowledge, had taken possession of his mind, but his spirit was too independent to suffer him to burden his parents, or to admit of his soliciting assistance from any quarter. He resolved, like other minds of natural force and manly strength, to work his own way to the accomplishment of his purpose. In future years, and after knowing the severity of the struggle, he was wont to say that he deliberately preferred the course he had pursued to the seemingly more advantageous one open to young men who possessed the resources of their parents to draw upon. This opinion at least shows the native energy of his character, and that with John Mackay a difficulty was something to be conquered.

For the rough hard life of a stone-mason he was not well adapted. He was a slender, ruddy lad, his biographer tells us, with auburn hair and dark brown eyes; quiet, gentle, and intelligent; silent when glad, with just a shade of pensiveness in his look; his arm and hand liker those of a lady than of a stone-mason. But he liked his employment, took to it, became a cunning user of his chisel, and wrought skilfully and diligently at his trade during the summer and autumn months, that he might pursue his favourite studies during the winter at college. While working at an early period of his apprenticeship in a "squad" of forty or fifty men and boys at the last wing of the United College, within which he sat as a student a few years after, he gained the friendship of a young fellow-workman of kindred literary tastes, who has since risen to distinction at the Scottish bar. In a letter of this early friend of Mackay's referring to that period, an admirable sketch is given of his young friend, and no little insight afforded into the habits and character of Scottish workmen of the time. "There were twelve or more young men," he says, "in the same position as he and myself at that building, and twice as many journeymen, perhaps; upon the whole a very rough, drunken, and unintellectual set of men. With the exception of Mackay, not one of them that I remember cared to talk about a book, or anything of that sort, though there was abundance of shrewdness among them, and an amazing fertility in practical jokes and coarse wit. Mackay, having no blackguard faculty, was generally reckoned soft; and I am afraid I lay under the same imputation. Having come from the country I was obliged to fight eight or more pitched battles before I could reduce my town comrades to civility; but Mackay quarrelled with no human creature, and there was something in his quiet gentleness that secured him from being made the subject of pranks. We were often together, and at meal hours used to talk about many things. To me his knowledge was wonderful: he spent his leisure hours at Latin and Greek. I regarded him with a sort of veneration then, which has always continued, though its character has altered."

* The Missionary Martyr of Delhi. A Memoir of the Rev. John Mackay, Baptist missionary, who was killed at Delhi, May 1857. By James Culross, A.M., author of Lazarus Revived. London: J. Heaton and Son, 21 Warwick Lane.

A brief and most instructive biography, with its great lesson of self-culture to youth; and setting forth a character of native strength and Christian decision that would have been better known in the mission-field but for the events that prematurely closed the life of its subject.

We know of few more encouraging examples to young men struggling under like difficulties in their aspirations after a higher education, than that presented in the life of John Mackay during these years of hard labour, yet of indefatigable, cheerful study. Coming home after his ten hours' hard work, he would get washed and dressed, and have tea or supper; and the rest of the evening, often deep on into the night, was given to his beloved books. He devoured everything that fell in his way excepting works of fiction, which he avoided from principle, and lest his time should be lost for the acquisition of substantial knowledge, not from any deficiency of the imaginative faculty. The love of knowledge was a passion with him. It was to him at that time the summum bonum of life. Dr. Livingstone tells us that he found a place for his book on the machinery of the mill where he wrought, "glancing off sentence after sentence as he passed too and fro to unloop or break the spinning threads." To the stonemason no such device was possible. The time devoted by John Mackay to his books was borrowed from his hours of relaxation—ofttimes from his hours of needful repose, his wakeful mother finding him frequently far into the night still at his studies, or asleep by the fire with a book in his hand. In this way, without foreign aid, snatching scanty leisure from toil, he taught himself to read Virgil and Cicero with tolerable ease, and the Greek Testament with a little difficulty; acquiring also a considerable amount of general knowledge, besides some acquaintance with the French, German, and Italian languages. His recollection of these years, even in his Indian home, haunted him like a sweet dream. His life, in spite of his severe toil, was happy—happy as a life can be which is still without the highest source even of earthly felicity,—peace with God. He was a cheerful workman, a keen, impassioned student, had intense pleasure in his studies, and tasted the joy of having a sympathizing friend.

But as yet he knew not the Friend the sinner needs. It was whilst in Edinburgh, about the beginning of the year 1847, whither he had gone to work at the Free Church College, that the tone of his letters underwent a great change, corresponding to a profound and happy change that had passed within his own bosom. A new element then breathed through his letters. He had passed consciously into the enjoyment of peace with God, felt himself standing beneath the awful yet joyful shadow of the cross, and visited by the shining ones as Christian in the Pilgrim's Progress. These letters being destroyed, renders it difficult to trace his religious history. One who knew him well states that he does not think that Mackay could have pointed out the precise time of his conversion, or even traced very certainly the general course by which he had been led; and adds:—"God-taught he undoubtedly was, but in that gradual manner that few understand." From the time of this visit to Edinburgh he yielded his whole soul to the Redeemer, and entered into the enjoyment of settled peace with God. The unexpected death of a brother occurring about the same time helped greatly to deepen his religious life. His own account of the change is this: "From the time I attended Sabbath school to my residence in Edinburgh, I had occasionally been under deep religious impressions; but these speedily subsided, and I was the more easily enabled to pacify my conscience, and sometimes even to persuade myself that I had found peace with God, that my life was free from immorality; and I was even considered by my fellow-workmen as somewhat of a religious turn. But about this time—the time of my residence in Edinburgh—I began gradually to give way to company; everything of a religious nature now vanished from my mind; and even my studies, in which I had formerly so much delighted, began to be neglected and resumed by fits and starts. At last my conscience became thoroughly alarmed. I found enough in my character to prove that I could not be a follower of Christ, and that if I continued in the course I was then pursuing, I must inevitably be eternally ruined. Through the grace of God I was at length enabled to extricate myself from the dangerous company in which I had become entangled, and, I trust, to enter upon a new life." Shortly after this he became a member of the Baptist Church, under the pastoral care of the Revs. Dr. Innes and Mr. Jonathan Watson.

The decisive change that had taken place in Mackay's spiritual character did not abate his passion for study.

It imparted to it a new spirit, and bent it into a single channel. Henceforth he felt he was no longer at liberty to have any other aim but the glory of God. On rare occasions, when he spoke of his inmost thoughts, he confessed it was still his besetting sin that he was prone to value learning for its own sake. But against the temptations of a merely literary enthusiasm he now strove and prayed. His one ambition was to labour and learn for the sake of a greater result. Studies in which he had delighted, but which had only a remote bearing, or none at all, on the ministerial vocation, he laid aside. It was in vain as he passed through college that his friends once and again urged him to work for a degree. Whether right or wrong in his opinion, he regarded the impulses that might have led him to covet such a distinction as among the things which he had left behind when he chose a nobler aim. In this decision he probably judged wisely. He knew himself; and what he believed he ought to do, at whatever sacrifice he did, as a matter of course. From the time of his decided change, the desire of becoming a missionary took possession of his mind. It was not a mere impulse of conversion. It grew with his Christian strength into a settled purpose; but with the reticence that marked his strength, he said nothing about it. The only thing his friends recollect indicative of his purpose of offering himself as a missionary, was his admiration of the apostolic labours and self-denial of Dr. Judson in Burmah. It was not, however, till the autumn of 1854, while supplying the Baptist Church at Arnsby, that he offered himself to the Committee of the Baptist Missionary Society for service in any field they might appoint for him. His earlier purpose seems to have been revived by the associations of the neighbourhood where Fuller and Carey had resided. Hitherto he had been restrained from a final decision by a fear that his feelings in reference to missionary work were of too romantic a nature, and that they might not be sustained by his more mature judgment. How thoroughly his Christian reason approved of his resolution, may be gathered from a letter of this period, in which he writes: "Of late, when the difficulty of getting missionaries has been spoken of in my presence, I have frequently been ashamed that thousands should be ready at any time to hazard their lives in pursuit of vile riches, while so few are willing to do as much for the sake of Christ. I feel I should be doing violence to my conscience by occupying a sphere at home, while the pressing demand for missionaries still remained unanswered." In writing to his mother from Arnsby, he thus vindicates his decision with an earnestness and truth that may lead others to a like act of self-dedication. "So far," he says, "from choosing to become a missionary because I foresaw that I should not be successful at home, the more successful as a preacher I have the prospect of being, only makes the duty of consecrating myself to the missionary cause the more imperative. It appears to me that we have plenty of preachers at home, and more than plenty. A few could be spared, not only without any loss to religion at home, but with very great benefit, provided they were sent where their services were more required. It would make those who are left behind more devoted; and it is not numbers, but devotedness, that must convert the souls of men. Besides, Christ has expressly commanded his Church to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. It is the duty, therefore, of some to go into all the world. But you will perhaps ask, Why should you go? If you can be useful at home, why should you leave your native country, your relatives and friends, and go to live in a distant land, where you may be exposed to many hardships and dangers? My dear parents, you can easily perceive that, if every one were to reason in this way, none would go to the heathen, and the command of Christ would remain unfulfilled. It is true that I am no more bound to go than others, unless it be that I believe it my duty, while others may not; and then, as the Scriptures say, 'To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.' But we have nothing to do how others act, when we wish to find out how we should act ourselves; neither is it our duty to remain where we are simply useful, and shrink from engaging in a more important enterprise, because it will subject us to some sacrifice. This is not duty at all; it is selfishness. Our duty is to do what we believe will most promote God's glory. 'For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.' The apostle does not say that none ought to live to himself; but he considers it as a matter perfectly well understood that no Christian does live to himself. I do not know how others may feel, but I could not regard myself as a Christian, were I persuaded that I was living to myself." It was with thoughts like these, but intensified by the ardour, and glowing into eloquence from the imagination of the writer, that Francis Xavier vindicated his mission to the East, when his friends opposed the perils of the Eastern Archipelago to his enterprise. "If these islands," was his eloquent reply, "had scented woods and mines of gold, Christians would have courage enough to go thither, nor would all the perils of the world prevent them. They are dastardly and alarmed because there are only souls of men to be gained. And shall Love be less hardy and less generous than Avarice? They will destroy me, you say, by poison;—it is an honour to which such a sinner as I may not aspire; but this I dare to say, that whatever form of torture or of death awaits me, I am ready to suffer it ten thousand times for the salvation of a single soul."

After finishing his theological education at Horton College, one of the institutions of the Baptists, he received his appointment for India, and sailed from Liverpool in the William Carey, arriving in Calcutta on the Lord's day, 15th July. His first months in India were spent in Agra, and were devoted to the diligent study of the Hindi, and the careful observation of the different methods of mission operation. Referring to this subject in a subsequent letter, he offers the following remarks, without venturing to pronounce in favour of any particular mode of mission action. "It would be premature," he says, "in me to express any opinion regarding the state of the mission, and the different plans pursued by missionaries for promoting the cause of the gospel, which things, I perceive from the report of the last May Meetings, are exciting considerable attention. My impressions both of men and of things have changed considerably since I came to India, and are still changing. One conviction, however, has never changed; but all that I have observed has only tended to confirm it, namely, that the true secret of a missionary's success is his self-devotion. I agree for the most part with what Mr. Brock has said in reference to the preaching of the gospel; but I believe, if other missionaries have not succeeded as well as Dr. Judson did, the difference of their success is not to be attributed so much to the difference in the kind of their labours, as to the difference of spirit which they manifest. Send out a self-devoted, self-denying, self-sacrificing man,—a man who is willing to submit to any inconvenience, to endure any bodily suffering and bodily labour, provided he can bring souls to Christ, and you don't need to tell such a man what course he ought to pursue. He will soon find that out for himself, as Judson did, and better than any one else can."

It was at Delhi, a city which recent terrible events have made as familiar to us as one of our home capitals, that Mackay was finally stationed. When he passed within its grey granite walls towards the close of the year 1855, no symptom of the tempest appeared that was on the eve of bursting over the heads of its European inhabitants; no trumpet note had sounded of the gathering, the battle, and the siege, that were so imminent. It reposed with its population of more than one hundred and fifty thousand under the peaceful shadow of British rule,—a city of the gorgeous East, rich in the historic glories of the past, and bearing the traces of its ancient grandeur in a palace of unrivalled magnitude and splendour. With a noble native convert, Walayat Ali, who shortly afterwards perished, bearing a testimony for the truth that ranks him in faith and fortitude amongst the primitive confessors, he began his labours in that city. From the very first he liked his work and his field of labour, and had entire faith in the triumph of the gospel throughout India, though he saw the progress was to be slow; and thought that he marked tendencies in the native mind, even after being brought under the influences of the gospel, which would flow away into monstrous errors and absurdities rivalling those of the Greek and Romish Churches. Whilst rapidly proceeding with the acquisition of the Urdu and Hindi, that he might at once address himself to the Mohammedan and Hindu population of Delhi, his labours and his life were cut short by the outbreak that involved our Indian empire in peril, and clothed so many of our English families in mourning. With characteristic caution, and modest estimation of his own labours, he had written in his last letter, "I have not yet been cheered with any conversions. Many have come professedly as religious inquirers, some as candidates for baptism; but I have generally found that the true object of their inquiry was, how to better their worldly condition. Consequently, when they find no worldly hopes are held out to them, they generally cease to visit us, but we never think of despairing. With a noble cause to advocate, with millions of minds to operate upon, and above all, with the imperishable promises of divine assistance, we cannot but feel that, if we do not ultimately and speedily triumph, the blame must rest with the unfaithful workman." With these words scarcely dry from his pen, "the Missionary Martyr of Delhi" was called to seal his testimony with his blood. Under what precise circumstances he perished is unknown. For some time there was no certain information respecting him. It was known that he had gone down under the first wave of the mutineers that swept Delhi, though it was still hoped he might reappear. But the fact of his death was put beyond doubt, it being ascertained that, with a number of others, he perished in the ruins of a house assailed by the mob and the soldiery.

Though thus early removed from the field, his life was not in vain. The spirit of self-sacrifice never dies. It is transmitted from soul to soul. It passes from the expiring missionary, who, if he has done nothing else, bequeaths an example that perpetuates the race of apostolic men, through whom the world shall finally be subdued.

"LET THE DEAD BURY THEIR DEAD."

Mother. What does the Lord mean by the "dead burying their dead?"

Pastor. You saw a funeral pass on the other day to the church-yard. The mourners were all affected with a certain decent sympathy. They followed their neighbour's dust to its kindred dust, and wrapped it up in a winding sheet of dust. One of these felt that, though he might look back to the past with a certain pleasing melancholy pain, his relations to the dead were for ever at an end. These relations had never extended beyond the life that is lived in the body; and they were necessarily ended now that the body and its life were gone. In other words, in his case, a dead spirit followed a dead body to the grave. Now look at this man in his home. He has but a dead spirit. He can form no relation that is spiritual, eternal. He loves his little daughter truly, tenderly, passionately. But he loves her only with a natural affection—with a love that cannot follow her beyond the present life. All his tenderness to her, therefore, can effect no more than a "dead burying the dead;" his life and hers is but a long funeral procession through life to death. With all his kindness and attentions he does but strew with flowers the path that leads from her cradle to her grave. Now, the Saviour says to the man that would follow him, "You would pay to the remains of your father a tribute of natural affection. Good! Go. But remember, as you go, that you are no longer as the mass of men who have no affection but that which is natural and evanescent. They are dead; they bury their dead; they are done with them; that is all. But you,—your relation to men is not exhausted by the natural affection, however laudable. You are not to rest contented merely with following dead men from the cradle to the grave. As a follower of mine, it is your office to raise dead men to life by the preaching of my gospel of the kingdom of God. Speak to them the words of that kingdom, by your words and your deeds, that they may live for ever, and that you and they may be united by an affection that can never end. Enter into a new and spiritual relation of sonship to God, so that, when you follow their dust to the dust, you may know that the spirit which you loved has gone before you, in immortal life, to a building of God, 'an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'"

Mother. Now I begin to understand what Simeon said to Mary.

Pastor. What do you mean?

Mother. When our baby was born, I read of the dedication of Jesus in the Temple; and I was terrified by what the prophet said to the blessed mother of the Lord, "A sword shall pierce through thy own soul also." I knew that the sword must pierce through the soul of the son; I felt that it must pierce the heart of his mother. But why, I asked of myself, should it pierce through her soul? Why should it utterly kill her? She was not crucified for us.

Pastor. Well, I daresay you are wiser, on a mother's text, than John Calvin. Tell me what you have learned from your heart about this piercing. What was this piercing,—this piercing through?

Mother. Ah, I felt it as soon as I had read the word, with my baby on my lap. The piercing was the wounding, the piercing through was the death, not of the woman, but of the mother in her heart. Even when she heard the prediction of the suffering of her son, she felt a pain like the shadow of death. When, at twelve years of age, he said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" her soul was pierced by the sharp sword of the word; she felt that there was a sense in which he was not her son, and she was not his mother. When she came to him in Cana, with a mother's doting pride, and was answered, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" the sword went deeper still. When, in the madness of her blindness she declared that he was mad, her soul was continually cut and torn by the sword of God's truth against a mother's pride. It was almost pierced through by his renouncing her, declaring, "Who is my mother? . . . He or she that doeth the will of my Father." But still she clung to her mother's pride. The sword that had pierced her had not pierced her through, until she saw him bleeding on Calvary. And then the mother died in her heart, as she looked on her son dead on the cross. Oh sir, I know it! I have felt it. You have watched with me while I saw my child pass away in darkness and terror from the earth.

Pastor. True. But how does this bear upon "the dead burying the dead?"

Mother. I see that you know what I mean. But, since you have asked me, I will tell you. Mary, even in nursing the Saviour, was more or less a dead mother burying a dead son. The natural affection overlaid, and killed, and buried the spiritual. She thought of him as her own more than as God's. You tell us, in your sermons, that every child belongs to God; that every child born into the visible Church belongs to Christ more than to its parents; that its parents, while enjoying the blessedness of the natural affection to their own child, are to hold it in subordination to a spiritual affection to the child as devoted to Christ, and committed to them, to train him up for Christ, as the ministers of God. Well, I feel that Mary must have thought of Jesus more as her own son than as God's; that the human love of the mother of Jesus threatened to supplant in her heart the divine love of the daughter of God; and that for this cause the sword was sent to pierce her through, that she might cease to love her human son, and learn to love her divine Saviour. A human son was given to her in the apostle John. A divine Saviour was fully revealed to her in that hour, when the mother was crucified on the cross that slew the son for her sins. The cross that slew him for her justification—oh, what a heavy one!—killed her for her sanctification,—oh, what a light one! And I think that from that hour the sword never passed through her soul, unless she look down from heaven, and feel a painless sorrow at the sight of idolaters who worship the mother of Jesus as a goddess, instead of blessing as a sister the daughter of God.

Pastor. Well?

Mother. Well, you know what I mean. When my eldest son fell away into open infidelity, you bade me search my past life, whether I had not trained him more for myself than for God. When my youngest daughter was taken away in infancy, you asked me whether it might not have been necessary to take this lamb before me to the fold, in order that I, poor foolish sheep, might give my heart more willingly to God. And now, as often as I look on the lambs that remain, I guard myself against allowing my natural affection to kill and bury the spiritual; I love them more dearly as a mother, because I have learned, by the discipline of the sword, to love them, not only with a natural affection as their mother, but with a spiritual affection as a minister of God.

Pastor. Thank you. You have preached me a sermon which I will not soon forget. M.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

ANDREW FULLER.

PART FIRST.

THE name of ANDREW FULLER is associated in my mind with the commencement of a very definite era in my existence. His Letters on Socinianism was the first book, professing to be a theological treatise, which I ever read; and those who are acquainted with that volume will understand me when I say, that I then came to know, what I had up till that moment (strange, perhaps, to say) hardly conceived to be possible, that a work containing a scientific discussion of points in divinity could be made readable, and interesting, and even engrossing in its attractiveness to a boy. We have since learned to value Fuller for many other things. We think with satisfaction of his services in exposing the evil character and tendency of the hyper-Calvinism in the midst of which he was brought up. We remember with no less interest the intimate connection which he had with the founding and early support of the Serampore Mission. But our first impression of his writings has never lost its freshness—and we still continue to think of him chiefly as the clearest and most interesting theological writer we have ever yet met with.

His life supplies a remarkable illustration of what a single mind may do almost entirely unassisted. And yet, it is impossible to read it without a feeling of intense regret, that one so capable was permitted to enjoy so few advantages. If Andrew Fuller had had education and learning equal to his vigorous understanding, his strong common sense, and his powers of discrimination, there would have been few greater names connected with the sacred literature of England.

He was born February 6, 1754, at Wicken, near Ely, in Cambridgeshire. His parents were in comparatively humble life; and until he was seventeen years of age it seems to have been taken for granted that he was either to follow the occupation of his ancestors, which was that of farming apparently, or go to London or some other city to engage in trade. But in November 1771 an incident occurred which gave a new direction to his thoughts. He had, previously to this, undergone "the great change," joined the Baptist Church at Soham, and spent much of his time in the study of the Bible and of other religious books; and the society of which he was a member being exceedingly small, his talents and acquirements necessarily became known very soon to those who formed it. When, therefore, on a particular Sabbath morning in the month referred to, the Church which had a short while before lost its pastor, and had been depending in the interval for the conduct of its services on one of the deacons, met for public worship, and no one was forthcoming to give a word of exhortation, an application was made to the boy Fuller to meet the emergency. It so happened that on the previous day his mind had been specially directed to one particular passage of Scripture. He had thought much upon it. His reflections in reference to it had arranged themselves into a train; and he recollected that at the time he imagined he could have discoursed from it. As then the case seemed urgent, and he himself was in a manner prepared, he did with much fear and trembling respond to the appeal. "I rose," says he, "and spoke from Psalm xxx. 5 for about half an hour, with considerable freedom." "After this," he goes on to tell us, "I was again invited to speak, and I did so; but, not enjoying that liberty which I did the first time, I was discouraged, and, though frequently asked, declined all such exercises for more than a year. But early in 1773, I think it was, brother Diver was absent again through an affliction, and I was invited once more to take his place. Being induced to renew the attempt, I spake from these words of the Lord, 'The Son of man came to seek and save that which is lost.' On this occasion, I not only felt greater freedom than I had ever found before, but the attention of the people was fixed, and several young persons in the congregation were impressed with the subject, and afterwards joined the church. From this time the brethren seemed to entertain an idea of my engaging in the ministry." And not to linger here over the details, this idea was in a short while realized. The young evangelist, who, so far as his theology, at least, was concerned, was, in the strictest sense of the term, self-educated, who had never been within the walls of an institute or college, and had never sat even for the shortest time at the feet of any teacher of divinity, was ordained, in the spring of 1775, pastor of the Church at Soham, which for several years he had helped to edify. Although he received little or no formal training for the ministry, however, it need scarcely be said that he had his own most efficient "schools and schoolmasters." Such standard theological works as he could lay his hands upon were studied with a care and an independence of thought which speedily placed him on a higher level of knowledge than that which was occupied by many around him who had enjoyed greater advantages, and, in the various controversies into which he was soon led to engage, there was manifested a fulness of information and a ripeness of judgment which must have exceedingly surprised those who were acquainted with his antecedents.

His position as pastor of the Soham Church did not turn out to be very satisfactory. The members of it were high and dry hyper-Calvinists, who entirely disapproved of any appeal being made to the unconverted, while in his mind, even before his ordination, there had appeared the germs of those thoughts to which he afterwards gave expression in his "Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation." A want of hearty sympathy, therefore, between minister and people soon began to show itself. Besides, he had married. Children were growing up around him. His stipend was, at the highest, thirteen pounds a-year! and though he tried to supplement this princely allowance, first by keeping a small shop, next by opening a school, neither effort was so successful as to protect him from the pressure of many difficulties. A friend (the father of the famous Robert Hall) saw his distress, and, rightly judging that he was fitted for a very much higher sphere, turned the attention to him of a vacant congregation in Kettering, Northamptonshire. A call was sent to him, accordingly, from this place; and, after much hesitation and long delays (for he clung to Soham with a tenacity of affection which was equally affecting and extraordinary), he made up his mind to accept it. In October 1782 he went to labour for a year on probation, and in the following October he was settled as the regular pastor.

It was some time after he had commenced his ministry in Kettering that Mr. Fuller began to be known to a wider world than that in which hitherto he had been content to move. His upbringing among hyper-Calvinists, and the suspicions which were early awakened in his mind that their treatment of the unconverted was derogatory to the gospel, led him to give much of his time to the study of the nature of faith, and, having arrived at what he conceived to be a satisfactory conclusion in regard to it, he published a treatise showing the universal obligation of the principle. The work called forth several answers, and he was launched, in consequence, into the troubled sea of controversy. It cannot, however, be said of his controversial writings, as must be said of most of the class, that they have chiefly a local and temporary interest. They are eminently practical in their cast, and the vein of controversy which runs through them in many cases serves even a good purpose—that of giving a liveliness and a precision to the statements which they might not otherwise possess.

Ten years after his settlement at Kettering we find Mr. Fuller engaged in another sort of work—a work which gave him more pleasure in the retrospect than any other he had ever taken a part in. This was maturing plans for the formation of the "Baptist Missionary Society."

In the Northamptonshire Association of Ministers to which he belonged, the duty of sending the gospel to the heathen had been often discussed, and prayer offered that a way might be opened for the discharge of it. At length matters were brought to a point. A meeting was held on the 2d of October 1792, at Kettering, for the formation of a society, and the now powerful organization which we have named was there launched into existence with a capital of £13, 2s. 6d. Dr. Carey, as is well known, was the first agent of this body, and the lustre of his name will for ever rest upon it as a glory. "My heart," says Fuller, of this new undertaking,—"my heart has been greatly interested in it. Surely I never felt more genuine love to God and to his cause in my life. I bless God that this work has been a means of reviving my soul, if nothing else comes of it; and many more have obtained a spiritual advantage."

For the twenty years which followed his time was chiefly occupied with the affairs of the mission. He travelled on its behalf through England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and it was doubtless due to his laborious and unremitting exertions that the work prospered as it did. While thus engaged, however, he felt deeply the injury that was done to his own congregation by his frequent absences; and fain would he have given up the journeys, at least, and remained quietly at home. But this difficulty constantly presented itself. "Our undertaking to India," said he, "really appeared to me on its commencement to be somewhat like a few men, who were deliberating about the importance of penetrating into a deep mine which had never before been explored. We had no one to guide us; and while we were thus deliberating, Carey, as it were, said, 'Well, I will go down if you will hold the rope.' But before he went down, he, as it seemed to me, took an oath from each of us at the mouth of the pit, to this effect, that while we lived we should never let go the rope. You understand me. There was great responsibility attached to us who began the business." Necessity was thus, as he thought, laid upon him, and though he often took a very gloomy view of his engrossing and multifarious engagements, he held on by the rope to the very last.

Much of the interest of this part of his life is connected with the tours which he made on behalf of the society. He was, for example, no fewer than five times in Scotland, and during these visits he was brought into intimate and friendly relations with many of the good men there who, at that time, were also bestirring themselves on the subject of missions. Some of the incidents which occurred in the course of his travels we may have an opportunity of noticing in our next number. Meanwhile, as it is the design of this part merely to give an outline sketch of his external life, all that remains for us to say now, is, that after doing many and great services in the cause of truth and the propagation of the gospel, Andrew Fuller entered into his rest, on May 7, 1815.

He was, says Robert Hall, "a man whose sagacity enabled him to penetrate to the depths of every subject he explored; whose conceptions were so powerful and luminous, that what was recondite and original appeared familiar; what was intricate, easy and perspicuous in his hand; equally successful in enforcing the practical, in stating the theoretical, and discussing the polemical branches of theology; without the advantages of early education he rose to high distinction among the religious writers of the day, and in the midst of a most active and laborious life left monuments of his piety and genius which will survive to distant posterity."

THE WIFE'S DREAM.

I HAD been reading an old story of romance. The valiant knight advanced to a lofty tree, surrounded by the spell of some nameless sorrow. With his puissant arm be swung his mighty battle-axe, and cleft the tree open with the blow. From the cleft tree there came forth a beautiful princess, his lady love, who had been shut up in that strange prison by an envious malignant fairy.

I fell asleep, and as I slept, I dreamed. In my dream I saw a stately tree with wide-spreading branches. I and my children dwell beneath its shadow, shielded from the winter's storm and summer's heat. But while thankful for the shelter, and proud of the tree that sheltered me and mine, I felt a great want in my heart, the want of the love of my youth. My husband had reared that shelter, but he himself was imprisoned in the tree; and if I had had a strong arm and sharp axe, I would have cleft it open, though at the cost of its death. I would have joyfully given up its shelter in return for the husband of my youth restored to me, heart to heart, as in the days of old.

When I awoke and thought of my dream, I found the interpretation. The whole universe is such a tree. It is full of God. But though he be seen near to us, yet by nature we have no free intercourse with him, of heart answering to heart, love answering to love. There is between us an "enmity," a "wall of partition," an invisible but impassable barrier, the work of sin. But Jehovah himself has removed that barrier wall. First, the rod of the law smote the Rock of Ages, and there gushed forth the fulness of God's redeeming love. Then, the rod of the gospel smites the rocky heart of man, cleaves it open to admit the love of God, and to be filled with a responding love, which in due time will "spring up" as the living waters from a full fountain. So there is realized a free and blissful communion of sinful men with God the Father in the Lord Jesus Christ.

But by the same sin there was a "wall of partition" between man and man. Not only did Jew and Gentile reciprocally hate and despise one another—nation was against nation, family against family, brother against brother. Even where there was a natural affection, there was no spiritual affection—the free flow and interflow of the love of spirit to spirit, of child of God to child of God. Above all, was this dismal solitude of the spirit felt by us poor women. For the most part we were regarded and treated as slaves; nowhere were we regarded, and honoured, and loved as sister-spirits, the image of the same Father in heaven, the heirs of the same heavenly inheritance, with our brother-men. While they built us a house, and sheltered us and our children, they themselves, alas! and their love were shut up in the tree by a cruel pride of sex. But the gospel has restored the first estate in its blissful glory. While the husband, as head of the house, is "the image and glory of God," yet he is to the wife what Christ is to his Church—a bridegroom, delighting in his bride, not only protecting her and providing for her and her children, but, as the most precious provision of all, continually giving himself, in the free communion of spirit with spirit, of love answering to love, walking through life by her side, aiding and cheering her, as inhabited by the same spirit, journeying to the same endless home. Such is the constitution of the Christian family.

But I often sadly feel the want of this communion. My husband is a truly Christian man. He loves me as sincerely as when he first led me to his house. And his life is spent in providing for me and mine; he cannot rest while we want a material comfort. But he is so absorbed in providing for our bodies, that he neglects due provision for our souls. I do not mean that he does not pray with us and for us, that he does not give due heed to the godly instruction of the children; but he neglects to give us himself. He shuts himself up in his office through the day, as he must do. But when he comes home at night I often see that he is shut up in his office still; and I sometimes notice a cloud on his brow. I know that he has a brooding care which he conceals from me, thinking to spare me pain. Ah, cruel kindness! that defrauds me of the privilege of bearing the half of his burden, and comforting him so that the other half shall not be felt. I do not want to know his business secrets. But I do long to be admitted to my wife's portion of the cares that oppress his heart. And if that were once given, the rest would follow; I would have the confidence, the confiding love, the spiritual communion, which is my due as a Christian wife. I do not wish to be fondled, and petted, and protected at the expense of a husband's trustful love. He ought to know that, with the kindest intentions, he is treating me, not like a Christian wife, his equal and yoke-fellow, but as a child or a slave. He ought to know that I would far rather wander in poverty with his heart, than wallow in luxury without it. And am I not without his heart, does he not compel my heart to starve for lack of a husband's love, so long as, in his cruel kindness, he keeps himself shut up in the tree?

Tell Christian husbands, to take care that they do not, like heathens, shut themselves up in the tree; and to remember that they are bound to be to their wives, not only the image of God, in ruling and providing, but also the image of Christ, in the intimate fellowship, the free intercourse of love.

And oh! beseech husbands who are not Christians, to consider how they will answer to God for having lived as no Christians with their wives; hindering their growth in grace if they be Christians; and if they be not, necessarily, with all the might of a husband's place and power, dragging down the wife—whither?

THOUGHTS FROM AN OLD NOTE-BOOK.

"As long as I am in this my tabernacle. . . . Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle."—2 PET. IV. 13, 14.

"This my tabernacle!"—what a depth of meaning in the simple yet mysterious expression! This body,—my dwelling, my home, something which belongs to me, but only an appendage or property distinct from myself. Not my dwelling-house, but tabernacle,—a slight, perishable abode, intended only for temporary use, and soon to be dispensed with, or exchanged for a more lasting residence. What varied thoughts arise as I dwell upon that mysterious subject, the union of soul and body, spirit and clay; the strange union now, the strange separation so soon to take place!

Strange union now,—how unlikely, how inconsistent, in some views how unsuitable! This body,—wonderfully constructed indeed, a masterpiece of divine skill and wisdom,—still so frail, so perishable, so liable to accident, suffering, weakness, fatigue, so slow and cumbersome in its movements, so soon to become the prey of corruption—altogether such a clog, and confinement, and hindrance to its spiritual tenant and companion. Then this soul, how passing strange and wonderful a thing,—its properties so various, its powers so great!—even while thus encumbered by flesh and defiled by sin, yet possessing memory to travel over the past, and imagination to grasp the future, with reason, conscience, love, all the faculties and affections which deal with present joys or sorrows. The “thoughts which wander through eternity,”—the intellect which gives birth to new ideas, or feasts upon those of more gifted spirits,—the mental vision, which can in a moment transport me far away to scenes and friends from which oceans may now divide, or from whom death may long have separated me,—all this, and much more, how incomprehensible! Yes, it is a strange union now, which confines this subtle, restless, spiritual being within a cottage of clay, ready to be “crushed before the moth.” But in one respect the frail body has the advantage. It has not sin to answer for; it may be the agent, but not the prompter: the cause, the spring, the root of moral evil, all lie within. Ah, how surely is sin interwoven with my spiritual self! What cause have I to exclaim, “Who shall deliver me?”

Strange separation also, at last inevitable, and already perhaps near at hand. The union now is so intimate, and has lasted so long, that at times I feel quite unable to contemplate the idea of its dissolution. The thought of being und clothed, of entering a purely spiritual world, is overwhelming. Yet how calmly the apostle Peter here speaks of the transition! And perhaps, after all, as Isaac Taylor so beautifully argues, the change to the believer may not be so great or overpowering as he supposes. How often I have found a few days make me feel quite at home in a new locality, where I never was before, which very recently I knew nothing of. My occupations, my duties, and the scenery around, may be different, but I find myself the same. I shall be myself still, whether “in this tabernacle,” or having “put it off.” Oh, for that faith which can anticipate the hour with joy, rather than alarm, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better.

“For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.” The reunion yet in prospect between the redeemed soul “made perfect” and the resurrection body—who can conceive its glory, its blessedness!

“AND being let go, they went to their own company.” This simple statement presents a beautiful example of the instincts and tendencies of the human nature. We always find that when a man is released from some special engagement—set free from some special demand upon him—in a word, when he is “let go,” he will, most probably, seek the company of those who are most congenial to his tastes. When parade is over, the soldiers betake themselves to their various associates and pursuits. When a school breaks up, the pupils do the same. When the warehouse or counting-house is closed, the young men betake themselves, some to the religious assembly, some to the reading-room, some, alas! to the tavern, the theatre, or the gambling-house. “Being let go,” they are almost sure to go to “their own company.” It is when a man is fully at leisure that you see what his bent and tendencies really are. When he gets free from present claims, you will be able to judge of the pursuits and companions of his heart’s selection. Two men may be seen standing behind the same counter, from eight in the morning till six in the evening; but mark them when the clock strikes six—observe them when “let go”—and you will find one making his way to the tap-room, and the other homewards or to some place of instruction. Thus it is always. “Being let go,” we soon find out “our own company.”

Reader, how do you act when “let go?” What company do you seek? Do you betake yourself to those who, like the assembly in Acts iv., occupy themselves in holy worship, prayer, and praise? Or do you own as your companions the giddy and the thoughtless, the profane and the immoral, the scoffer and the sceptic? Search and see. Just ask yourself, when next you take your seat in the midst of your own company, “Would I, at this moment, like to hear ‘the voice of the archangel and the trump of God?’” Where, in such a case, would your “own company” be?—Anon.

TO a man of Christian heart and deep religious feeling, there are few things more painful than the reading of biographies. Part of a life—a particular enterprise, or study, or episode—even in the history of a thoroughly worldly man, we may read and enjoy. But a biography, in the nature of it, professes to be a whole; and when we take up most of the biographies of distinguished men, and find them so miserably, and irreparably, and eternally incomplete, so far short of the “whole of man,” even in that lowest sense in which every saved sinner is redeemed in Christ from hopeless imperfection, there settles down upon us a profounder sense of melancholy than is produced by almost any other kind of reading. Who has not felt this, for example, in closing the delightful Life of Sydney Smith, so full of lavish wit, and wisdom, and kindness, and geniality, all through; and then, when the end comes, nothing better—nothing higher! After all, disguise it as we may in our graceful modern religionism, death is the test of life. “Call no man happy till after his death,” said an old heathen—how truly! For only then can the life be summed up and the balance struck—on the side of mere vanity and loss, or on that of absolute and surest gain. Is there in all literature anything more touching than the last words of that great and noble astronomer, Tycho Brahe,—“Ne frustra vivisse videar!” (Lest I seem to have lived in vain.) His biographers record the broken and muttered words of the stout-hearted old man with a protest: “How could he be said to have lived in vain who hath made such solid and grand additions to the sublimest of the sciences?” Alas! those dim and failing eyes saw into a higher region than the sublimest of the sciences could lead him, or than his biographers had courage to follow. May we also not “seem” to have lived in vain, when life for us shall be a thing passing and gone!

Most readers remember Dr. Scoresby in connection with the scaling of icebergs in the North Sea and the measurement of Atlantic waves. But many will remember, too, that he was a devoted clergyman of the Church of England, and not ashamed of the gospel of Christ amid the pursuits and honours of science. On such a life, therefore, we may love to linger, sure that any earthly deficiencies are temporary and partial, and hoping to glean some lessons from its pages for those who remain behind.

WILLIAM SCORESBY was a whaler, and the son of a whaler, his father being a native of the east of Yorkshire.

“Physically, he was tall, weak, and delicate in constitution; mentally, he was timid, anxious, and scrupulously conscientious.” His conscientiousness was doubtless imbibed from his mother, who is said to have been of eminent piety. When ten years of age the child smuggled himself on board his father’s ship, bound for Greenland, which, in a few days after, had the narrowest escape from being captured by a privateer, getting off by the ingenious device of bearing down boldly upon the enemy, and suddenly running out a few guns, so as to induce the belief that she herself was a war-ship in disguise. For some six years after this he attended school at Whitby, then commenced whaling with or for his father, and, at the age of seventeen, had a session at the University of Edinburgh. In 1807 he went with some gun-boats to Copenhagen, in the expedition to capture the fleet there, meeting with many adventures, which he tells with sailor-like simplicity. About this time he began to exhibit that talent for scientific observation which afterwards distinguished him, and made the acquaintance of Sir Joseph Banks and Professors Jameson and Playfair. In 1811 he married, and this appears to have been the occasion of a considerable advance in those pious tendencies and aspirations which from his childhood had not wholly left him. These feelings, somewhat hindered by the life of continual adventure which he now led in the north seas, were very much deepened by the ministrations and society of the Rev. Dr. Holloway of Whitby; but Dr. Scoresby, in his autobiography, still considers himself to have been not yet within the kingdom of heaven. But in 1817, after a very unsuccessful voyage, a more important crisis in his mental history was reached.

“On my passage home, the most complete surrender of heart to God, and the most perfect abandonment of reserved sin that I had ever made occurred. It was on Sunday, the 13th of July, and was the effect, I believe, of reading to the sailors, with more than ordinary attention, a sermon of Mr. Burder, from the text,—‘And Elijah came unto all the people and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him, but if Baal, then follow him’ (1 Kings xviii. 21). It was in walking the deck, after divine service, that the application of the subject came forcibly to my conscience. I read it with interest; but God now first applied it to my benefit. And the train of thought, being remarkable, deserves to be mentioned.

“I was now nearly approaching home. The view of the English coast, along which we were sailing, produced a train of reflections on expected happiness, checked by the recollection of our scanty cargo, that was productive of much mortification and disappointment to my desire of soon gaining a comfortable independence. Methought God was working against me. My labours for three years had been increasingly unprofitable. They now hardly promised to me the supply of my necessary wants. 'I will leave off the sea,' thought I; 'the little property I have acquired will produce £120 or £150 a year, and on this, with any accidental acquisition from finding out other employment, I may live, in an economical manner at least, entirely on shore. I shall then be no longer exposed to the freaks of fortune, but shall defy all casualties and mortification of unsuccessful voyages, and may have the continued enjoyment of domestic intercourse and blessings of the land.' But my conscience smote me; it suggested, it was not owing to the freaks of fortune that I was no longer prosperous; it was the hand of God; and although I should retire from the sea, that hand could reach me there, reduce me to beggary, and blast all my schemes of happiness, formed independent of my Maker.

"It was now that the sermon of Burder was fully applied to my conscience. I found I was one of those halting between two opinions; I was maintaining a reserve of sin, or refusing the complete surrender of myself to God. My irresolution was manifest to me. I was one of the persons described under the first head of the discourse; being irresolute and undetermined whether to be religious or not. To the question suggested by the text—'If the Lord be God,'—my heart and experience answered, 'The Lord he is God—the Lord he is God.' And the command—'Then follow him'—was impressed on me with such force, by the Spirit of God, I doubt not, that for the first time in my life I felt disposed to make a total surrender of myself, and give myself up unto God."

A year or two after, he writes from Edinburgh (where he remained for some time writing his book on the Arctic regions) to his sister, strongly urging upon her the giving up of all for the rich reward of a new heart given by Christ, concluding thus,—“What I have written is the effect of experience. I have been much indebted for the reading of God's providences to my esteemed friend, Dr. H.; he first led me to discover that every occurrence of life had some particular design, and that all things work together for good to them that fear God. I can truly say that I have found the ways of religion are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. I was never half so happy before I came to this knowledge, and never enjoyed so much of life. Pleasures or enjoyments which are sinful have no temptation for me; but I have yet many rational enjoyments and pleasures,—domestic pleasures, social pleasures, and pleasures afforded by intercourse with great and good men, and, above all, the pleasure derived from a sense of the favour of God, and from a sweet experience of the love of God in the heart, which, indeed, passeth all understanding. I used to fancy that I must give up all enjoyments if I became religious; but now I find that things I used to call pleasures would now disgust me, whilst a multitude of new enjoyments have burst upon me."

It was in the year 1820 that he introduced on board of his ship the regulation as to no fishing on the Sabbath, to the successful working of which he long after published an emphatic testimony. He always kept up the habit of reading prayers and sermons on board ship, and one of his own prayers, offered in name of the whole ship's company, on setting out on a voyage, has been preserved in his biography, and is singularly rich, and humble, and full of uncton. We may notice that, during his stay in Edinburgh, on one occasion, he made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, and, being invited to meet a party at his house on the Sabbath-day, wrote in reply—"I fear I cannot have the honour of waiting upon you on Sunday at dinner, agreeably to the arrangement you were so kind and polite as to propose. For some years, indeed, I have declined visiting on that day of the week; though I readily and honestly acknowledge that in this instance the privation is greater than on any occasion that ever before occurred."

The chief outward transition in Dr. Scoresby's life was now to be made. In 1823 he left the sea, and studied at Cambridge with a view to the Church. On obtaining orders, he first acted for some time as curate at Bessingby, and was then appointed to the Floating Church at Liverpool, the trustees wisely choosing a man who knew something of a sea life himself. "All," says Dr. Scoresby, "who intimately know sailors, are aware that there is an idiom, not only in their conversation, which is peculiar, forcible, and striking, but likewise in the ordering of their thoughts. Not that this would require sea-phrases so much as nautical illustrations—than which, to a sailor, nothing could be so intelligible or expressive. Yet no landsman can attain the force of that illustration; and, in proof of this, I would venture to say that no landsman can imitate a chapter of the 'Naval Sketch-book.' A simple illustration would expose him to a sailor's ears as certainly as the Ephraimites by their Sibboleth." After spending about five years here, he removed to Bedford Chapel, Exeter; where he worked for several years, which were sadly chequered by the death of his two sons at short intervals. From Exeter, upon receiving his degree in divinity from his university after a ten years' probationary course, he was transferred to the position of Vicar of Bradford, where he wrought for some time amid great difficulties and opposition. But on his leaving the town, in June 1847, the chairman of a farewell meeting could enumerate as follows some of his successful exertions:—

"Four schools have been built by the efforts of that gentleman, at a cost of about £4000, and, with one exception, entirely on his own responsibility as to the funds. When Dr. Scoresby came to Bradford, there was not a single child under daily education in connection with the parish church, now about 1500 children were receiving daily instruction, exclusive of some 1200 Sunday scholars. Besides the erection of these schools, Dr. Scoresby had also undertaken the entire pecuniary responsibility of carrying on all the day, and some of the Sunday-schools, relying only on the children's pence, the annual collections, and, for two or three years, a small contribution by the National Society. Their expenses exceeded the sum of £4000. They were also indebted to Dr. Scoresby for the establishment of the Church Institution, for the expenses of which he was for two or three years solely responsible, besides giving his valuable assistance in lectures, &c. He might also refer to the subdivision of the parish, now in progress; the raising of funds for district churches, as at Ecclehill; and to the introduction of so efficient a body of clergymen into the town."

The remainder of his life Dr. Scoresby spent in Torquay, voluntarily acting as assistant to the Rev. Mr. Wolfe of Upton. In 1856, this was broken in upon by a voyage to Australia, undertaken with the view of making certain verifications of his theory of magnetism in iron ships, the vessel being the ill-fated Royal Charter, one of the most magnificent and strongest vessels ever built, but afterwards dashed to pieces on the coast of Wales in a terrific hurricane. In both the outward and homeward voyage Dr. Scoresby acted as chaplain, having, as he said, "a compact parish of four or five hundred souls." After his return home, he went north to Scotland, to lecture to the Philosophical Institution of Edinburgh, and on this visit experienced the first symptoms of his last illness. He returned, however, to Torquay, and in his beautiful villa in that beautiful but fatal spot, wore up under the distressing symptoms of valvular heart-complaint, till the 21st of March 1857. Mr. Wolfe, his pastor or colleague, gives an interesting account of his last visits to the old seaman, sailor, and soldier of Christ:—"He said he was quite resigned to the will of his heavenly Father, and was most happy in the thought of death; that he knew Him in whom he believed, and was sure he was able to keep that, even his soul, which he committed to him, safe against the great day. After some further conversation, he broke forth into the most earnest exposition of his own feelings upon the subject of those doctrines and principles which he had inculcated on others. 'My dear friend,' he said, 'I would that all should know the satisfaction and comfort I myself can now derive from those doctrines which I have ever maintained and preached. I thank God I can now feel the truth in my own heart as I have declared it to others. I thank God I feel those doctrines now to be the truth as it is in Jesus. I have preached Christian practice and conduct as well as faith, and I now see and feel the force of it. I have ever condemned, and I now repeat my condemnation, of the mere sentimentalism of religion,—'Faith without works is dead.' He went on in this strain until he was almost exhausted." On the same occasion he declared emphatically,—"Under the solemn feeling that I am a dying man, under the weakness and oppression of bodily suffering, the Prayers of the Church, in the Book of Common Prayer, are to me most expressive of my wants and feelings—are most comforting and consoling; and come most appropriately home to me in my sickness and weakness." On his monument in Upton Church are sculptured a ship and anchor, a mariner's compass, and an open Bible; while the remainder of the funds subscribed for a monument were applied to the perpetual endowment of a bed in Torbay Infirmary, to be called THE SCORESBY BED, and to be kept for the use of sick sailors.

Dr. Scoresby belongs to that class of men for whom England is famous—keen, practical workers, unsentimental, but indefatigable. His passion for adventure and travel was extraordinary, and his power of observation marvellous. Nor was his activity in another direction less remarkable. His published works amount to ninety-one, nearly thirty of which are sermons or lectures, and the rest scientific monographs. This life of ceaseless activity had no doubt the effect of to some extent rounding away the original individuality of his character, but it must at the same time have tended to keep it healthful and vigorous. His transition from a sea-life to the service of Christ's Church was evidently made from the purest and most disinterested motives, and more, perhaps, from the strong desire to do good in the most direct way, than from the feeling of any internal call or peculiar fitness for the work. His evangelical sentiments are peculiarly strong and uncompromising in their expression, especially at this time of his life; as is usual with those who have received them simply from the pulpit, not grown into them by prolonged personal thought or theological study. His life, indeed, gives us sometimes the puzzling feeling of two distinct lives bound up in one; and the transitions from the mere scientific observer to the mere devout pastor or preacher, and then back again to the mere sailor, are made so suddenly as somewhat to baffle our endeavours to apprehend the man. Yet a man evidently there was, saved by God's grace, working steadily and honestly through a long and most active life, keeping his eye fixed on the very highest points proposed to our faith, while his hands were occupied in doing with their might all that lay nearest to them to do. N.

THE GIFT OF THE SPIRIT.

WHEN the first great Christian revival took place, and the marvellous spectacle was exhibited of unlettered men suddenly gifted with the knowledge of other languages, and preaching to the people assembled from all quarters in Jerusalem with an "utterance" which produced the most startling effects, it is not surprising to hear that the spectators were in doubt, and began to ask one another, "What meaneth this?" Happily there was one on the spot who could fully and authoritatively explain the matter to them. Peter rehearsed the whole history of the manifestation, from its remote origin in the free promise of God, to its immediate cause in the glorification of the Saviour; and having shown the intimate connection subsisting between the shameful act of the crucifixion, in which they had taken a part, and the glorious and unexpected consequences which they were then witnessing, he in a manner sums up the whole in this single and pregnant sentence:—

"Therefore, being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear."

We have here the Trinity—the three persons in one Godhead—brought distinctly and prominently under our notice. There is the Father exalting the Son to his own right hand; there is the Son, having finished the work that was given him to do, reascending to the place of glory; and there is the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit, who has a work in the world to do after the Son has left it, in applying the salvation which he purchased, in converting sinners, in perfecting saints, in communicating and sustaining spiritual life. Let us observe what is said in this passage as to the mutual relations of the three persons.

1. In the economy of grace, the gift of the Holy Spirit is described as being ultimately in the hands of the Father. "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things." "When the Comforter shall come, whom I will send unto you from the Father." "I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Comforter, who shall abide with you for ever." Is it a matter of any practical importance to remember this fact? Certainly it is. Every one who has read attentively the many discourses of Jesus reported in the Gospel of John must have been struck with the frequency with which he makes mention of the name of his Father. How was this? What are we to infer from it? This much, at least,—that the honour of the Father was dear to the Son's heart, and that he would have all his followers understand and recollect that that Father is the fountain and spring of all mercy. Any one, then, who goes to the throne of grace to ask the blessing of the Spirit, and has no eye at all to the fact that with the Father especially is the residue of the Spirit, cannot be said to have the mind of Christ, and can hardly expect to be successful in his pleading.

2. Again, it is implied in Peter's statement that the gift of the Holy Ghost had been made the subject of a special promise. It is said of Christ after his resurrection, that, being assembled together with his disciples, he "commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me." And here we have evidence that they had attended to the form of the command which was then addressed to them; for when the effusion of the Holy Ghost did actually take place, this is how they described it to others: "Therefore, being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye do hear and see." Now, we are not to suppose that the whole meaning of this expression is exhausted when we have pointed to the prophecy of Joel, and to its fulfilment on the day of Pentecost. The gracious influences of the Spirit are, without a doubt, a covenant blessing. Between the Father and the Son, before the beginning of the world, a special agreement was entered into, and the former was, so to speak, under a direct obligation to grant the Spirit whenever the latter had implemented his part of the engagement.

3. Another idea suggested here is, that although the Father is the original spring of these gracious influences, he does not dispense them immediately out of his own hand. The contracting parties were not the Father on the one hand, and the Church on the other. The covenant was made between the Father and the Son; and when the time came for the fulfilling of its conditions, the blessing purchased was, in the first instance, paid into the hands of Him who alone had the right to it—viz., into the hands of the Mediator. And so when we come to inquire how the gracious influences of the Spirit do at last reach the earth, we find that there is but one open channel for them, and that is Christ. He received from the Father the promise of the Spirit, and He shed it down on the Church at Jerusalem. The one dispenser of the gracious rain is the Lord Jesus.

4. Further, there is something specially noticeable about the form of the expression: "Therefore, being exalted, he has received the Spirit." The dispensation of the Spirit is one of Christ's kingly acts, and doubtless the words are used to set forth that fact; but there is in them also a back look upon that state of humiliation out of which he was raised. It was in consequence of his attaining to a glorious place at his Father's right hand, after finishing the work that was given him to do, that he got the Spirit to bestow upon his Church. The blessing was procured and purchased by, and as the result of, his rising to the throne which he now occupies. He died and rose again, and ascended up into heaven; and it was then, and not till then, that he acquired the full right to do what he did on the day of Pentecost. The words, "Therefore, being exalted, he hath shed forth this," take us back upon the whole process of his mediatorial work (of which his exaltation was the crowning or culminating point), and make us feel—what, indeed, was the truth—that the outpouring of the Spirit was the divine assurance or public testimony to the fact that the purchase-money of redemption had to the uttermost farthing been paid. "He made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore" (here is the explanation of Christ's accession to the kingly dignity; it was not a mere matter of natural and necessary inheritance—it was an honour purchased by his own high and worthy deeds. and it and all that followed were but rewards suitable and appropriate to his services. Wherefore, because he humbled himself, even to the death of the cross) "God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." "The Holy Ghost was not yet given," says John, speaking of a time when the cross was still in the distance, "because that Jesus was not yet glorified." The Holy Ghost is now given, says Peter, because the time of his exaltation has come at last.

These are not points of merely speculative interest. Many seem to fancy that the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ are only to be used, as it were, for the procuring of pardon and acceptance, and that the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, whereby they are renewed and sanctified, form a boon over and above, which God, in his pure benevolence, gives to those whom his mercy has saved from death. This is a tremendous mistake. To procure for us the gift of the Holy Ghost was one of the chief ends aimed at in the whole course of the Saviour's work; and if we fail to recognise that gift as a covenant mercy—as a blood-bought blessing—we misunderstand the essential character of the scheme of redemption. Jesus humbled himself, and died, and rose again, and ascended into heaven; and as his reward he received gifts for men, and especially this gift. And it is when we most entirely believe this, and when in spirit, as it were, we repeat his sacrifice, approaching the throne of grace under the mantle of the Saviour, in his name and strength and merit, that we have any certainty that we shall get what he got himself. The oil poured on Aaron's head flowed down his dress until it reached even the skirts of his garments. If we cleave to Christ, and come to God with his purple robe cast over us, the blessing of the Spirit given to him will descend likewise upon us.

The sum, then, of the whole matter, so far as we have gone, is this,—the fountain whence the blessing comes is the grace of the Father. The bestowing it upon man was the subject of a high transaction in the counsels of eternity, when the covenant of grace was entered into. King Jesus has the sole right of dispensing it to the necessitous. And he acquired that right by his glorious and complete performance of salvation work.

These points should throw not a little light on the question, How is an outpouring of the Spirit to be secured? or, in other words, looking at the same subject from another side, How is a revival of religion to be promoted? You hear it very often said in these days that God has been owning the prayer-meeting far more than the pulpit; and that, therefore, in seeking to revive the Church and arouse the world, we ought to be placing less dependence on the formal preaching of the word than on simple and earnest and persevering supplication! Now, it is not difficult to see that there must be more than confusion of thought here. It were indeed a pity if we were brought to the pass of being obliged to pit one ordinance of God against another, and determine to employ the one at the expense of the other. Especially would it be unfortunate if we were compelled to believe that preaching had as an instrument become powerless; for in reading the inspired account given of the first three Christian revivals—those at Jerusalem, and Samaria, and Antioch—I find that that was the grand means employed. But the real truth is this, that the question is not as to the inherent fitness of one ordinance more than of another. Prayer may be leaden-footed and refuse to rise. Preaching may be dull and pointless, and refuse to pierce. Religious conversation may be stale and insipid, and be unfit to edify. It is the QUALITY of the instrument which determines its efficiency; and the one quality which above all the rest gives power to any means of grace is, a hearty and rejoicing recognition of the merit and glory of Jesus Christ.

When the Spirit was first poured out upon the disciples on the pentecostal Sabbath morning, it may be said in a sense to have been given in answer to prayer; but what was the element in their prayer which wafted it to heaven and made it prevailing? Was it the earnestness of it, or the importunity with which it was day by day presented, or the circumstance that it was a right thing that was asked for? No! It was because Jesus was glorified in their thoughts, and they hoped everything from the sufficiency of his atonement and the power of his intercession. They knew that the Father had the blessing. They felt the supreme importance of their speedily receiving it. As the week passed slowly away their desire for the fulfilment of the promise must have grown every moment more intense. But it is not likely that any one of them would for an instant imagine that they had any independent standing before God, or (setting the Saviour aside) could venture to plead with the Father directly for the mercy on the ground of their own weakness or the world's necessity. On the contrary, the thought that would be present to them every moment would be this: Jesus has died; Jesus has risen again; Jesus has ascended; Jesus has entered, for us, within the veil; Jesus is presenting his blood before the mercy-seat; Jesus is now interceding on our behalf for the gift of the Holy Ghost. There had now been secured a right to pour out the Spirit on the world, because Christ was glorified. And they were entitled to hope that the Spirit would be poured out on them, because they were glorifying Christ.

Prayer of this character may always be expected to prevail. So may always such preaching as was Peter's in Jerusalem, and Philip's in Samaria, (the burden of both was "the Lord Jesus.") And so no less may religious conversation, when the object of it is to awaken in the sinner's heart a hearty sympathy with Paul's confession, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Christ."

"Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name; ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full."

"He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not, WITH HIM, also freely give us all things?"

ON SYMPATHY.*

I WAS struck lately, in reading a domestic tale, with the remark, that one of the characters therein introduced greatly preferred when in distress being condoled with to being consoled; and I cannot help feeling that she had some reason on her side. Did you never feel annoyed if not hurt by some people, who will persist in endeavouring to make you take the bright view of things, as they call it, and who make vain, though perhaps well-meant attempts to console you, by representing how much worse off some one else is, or how much worse your own case might have been? It may be that it is you who are sullen and wish to nurse your grief, or it may be that you feel that these would-be consolers cannot enter into what makes your grievance a trial to you; but from whatever cause it arises, there is sometimes more sadness than comfort felt from these consolers, and you turn away with a feeling of want of sympathy that closes your heart. Surely it were well to meet sorrow with condolence, with an admission that it is sorrow, and that as such it must be felt and mourned over, with sympathy, in short; remembering that though to give consolation to the sorrowing is a delightful privilege, it must be well-timed to be of any avail. In the case referred to in the story, the causes of annoyance were chiefly petty domestic cares and small fretting worries; and when the mother is described as worn out with these and seeking sympathy from her daughter, that daughter will persist in treating them lightly, and taking most aggravatingly hopeful views of all her mother's distresses. I suppose I had been in one of the mother's moods when I read the tale, for I could not help feeling provoked with the model daughter, though she was meant to be a representation of that "sunshine in a shady place" which is so delightful in domestic life. I suspect you must condole with before you can console, and that it is sometimes a mistake to try to do the last without the first having been attempted. It is a mysterious thing this sympathy and the comfort of receiving it; the feeling of being understood even when little or nothing is said. Had Job's friends done no more than they did at first, when "none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his grief was very great," the ironical term of "Job's comforters" had never passed into a proverbial expression. Certainly it is about the worst way to comfort or console, this same plan of showing one in distress that it is all his own fault, and that he has no one to blame but himself; and yet it is not an uncommon way. I have heard it said that there are some people who dislike to be sympathized with; but I think this is a mistake: they may draw back from the offered sympathy of those they feel cannot understand them or their sorrow, or they may shrink from having a sacred tender feeling abruptly or it may be coarsely condoled with; but real unobtrusive sympathy is surely soothing to all, and though it may not be sought for by some so earnestly as by others, yet it is valued when received and felt to be genuine.

The power of feeling and showing sympathy seems to vary in different individuals even more than the desire for receiving it does; and I sometimes think that this variation arises more from the individual character, mental and moral, of the sympathizing person, than from the nature of the sorrow or joy sympathized with. It is surely not altogether true that we cannot sympathize with what we have never felt; for we may and do imagine what others are feeling, and thus enter into their joy or grief: it is this I mean when I say the mental character of an individual partly determines his power of feeling for others. This use of imagination is a high and holy one, not to be lightly esteemed, profitable for ourselves and comforting to others. Unimaginative commonplace minds can rarely enter into the feelings of those differently constituted or differently tried from themselves, and much of the defective sympathy met with arises from this. Still it is not to be denied, I fear, that selfishness is the chief root of this defect of character, as it is of so many other forms of evil; for the selfish are the least able to feel for others, and they are the last from whom we ever think of seeking sympathy. They are, moreover, not unfrequently the most morbid cravers after it themselves, and the most obtrusive of their own joys, sorrows, or cares, on their fellow-creatures.

Can we cultivate this most desirable power in ourselves, or is it one of those gifts which we only gain slowly and, alas! sadly, by the "discipline of years," by suffering ourselves? Not altogether so, for in proportion as we are enabled to strive against selfishness, and to obey the command, "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others" (Phil. ii. 4), so surely will our powers of sympathy be increased, as well as our desire to comfort others. And really the latter is often a vain attempt unless we can and do sympathize with them first. What is it but selfishness that makes the young and light-hearted so often averse to witness suffering, or visit the bereaved and distressed? What is it but another, though more excusable form of the same evil, that makes those in distress turn away or feel pained by the natural and innocent happiness of others not then under the same trials as themselves? We must not forget that sympathy with others implies "rejoicing with those that do rejoice, as well as weeping with those that weep;" and if we are feeling it to be a truth that—we shall certainly not turn away in morose sadness from the happy any more than we shall avoid the sorrowful, lest their grief should mar our enjoyment.

"We have a fellowship with hearts To keep and cultivate,"

There may be selfishness in those who too eagerly or morbidly crave for sympathy, as there may be pride in others who refuse it, it being sometimes felt as one of those things which "it is more blessed to give than to receive;" but should not the first strive to recollect that others may have joys as well as griefs to be shared in by them; and truly in doing so, they will often find their own hearts comforted, whilst the latter must guard against the danger that lurks under a too fastidious or proud rejection of kindness, of becoming cold and even repulsive to those who certainly mean well, although they may express themselves erroneously. If we feel it delightful to be "sons of consolation," why should we not allow others the privilege of feeling that they too can comfort, or soothe, or sympathize? Alas! how often is the last all we can do, except to commend our friends to Him who, while "touched with a feeling of our infirmities," is also able to give "grace to help in time of need."

The following passage from the Autobiography of M. A. Schimmelpenninck, struck me as I read it, from its agreement with what I mean when I say we must console in order to console. She is speaking of some one called Miss P——, and says of her:—

"She had the admirable art, so far as it can be attained independently of religious influence, of dealing with persons under sorrow or nervous depression. How often have I observed that persons depressed in spirits would cheer and brighten under her influence! She often entered the room as if accidentally, listened to the sufferer's sorrow, consoled with it, even enhanced upon it; then she would suggest some slight alleviation for the moment, which could be obtained without labour or occupying much time; then she turned perhaps to indifferent matters, in which the patient might feel self-complacency in interesting himself to oblige her; gradually her conversation assumed a more lively tone, till at length the patient's mind was entirely carried into some other channel, and not unfrequently have I seen a smiling sun burst forth from the thickest cloud. Truly it was a gift for blessing."

Do not you agree with me in feeling that in real sorrow or care, as well as in nervous depression, you would prefer having a visit from one like Miss P——, rather than from one who, as it were, tried to force you into cheerfulness?

OUR DORCAS MEETINGS.—No. V.

TIME—ITS VALUE, AND THE DUTY OF DILIGENTLY IMPROVING IT.

THE 2d of January happened to be one of our Dorcas evenings, and I was glad of the opportunity to call the attention of my young friends to the value of time, and the duty of diligence in employing and improving it aright. The subject had long and deeply impressed my own mind, and I had often been grieved to observe how little it seemed to be considered by many, especially the young, in all ranks of life.

After the friendly greetings and good wishes suitable to the season, I began by asking for Scripture emblems and illustrations of the short, uncertain character of our mortal life on earth. The memories of my youthful hearers soon supplied a touching catalogue. The fading flower—the dissolving vapour—the passing wind—the shadow that declineth—the dream of the night—the tale that is told,—these, and such as these, describing our brief sojourn in the tabernacle of clay, ready to be "crushed before the moth." "We can hardly," I said, "imagine what were the feelings of the antediluvian fathers, in looking back on the lapse of many centuries; the whole economy and experience of that period must have been so different from the present. But we find the patriarch Jacob, at the close of his pilgrimage of one hundred and thirty years, in his affecting reply to the question of the Egyptian king, numbering his life by days, and calling them 'few and evil.' How much more must we do so, whose number of years seldom exceeds but threescore and ten, while the strength which lengthens the period is in general only added 'labour and sorrow!' Why, then, do I speak of the value and importance of a thing so poor, so short, so precarious?"

An answer was readily given: "Because we must prepare in this life for the life to come."

"Yes; and it is the only time for preparation. We must, each one, live on for ever; and the nature and state of that life in eternity hinges on what passes in this brief life in time. For, on the great day of final judgment, each one shall be judged 'according to the deeds done in the body' here, on earth. If we considered this truly, deeply, as reasonable beings should do, how differently should we value our years, our days! For then we should come to know and feel their real importance. Let a child find a necklace of diamonds to amuse himself with,—how joyously he cuts the string, and chases the glittering playthings through the room! But let a jeweller at that moment enter,—how sharply would he rebuke the thoughtless boy, how eagerly gather up each precious jewel, and earnestly seek through every corner in fear of even one being lost! Our days, our hours, are like these diamonds; and while many a careless trifler is recklessly throwing them away, the soul once awakened to know their real value is watching over them, as treasures which he has now to trade with, and for each of which he will have to render account at last."

And so I showed that we find this view of the subject ever kept before us in the word of God. Although the emblems of mortal life are of so affecting a nature, it is not spoken of as a thing to be despised by ourselves. On the contrary, under the old dispensation, prolonged life is a subject of special promise and earnest prayer. And while, doubtless, this might partly arise from comparative want of clear revelation in regard to a future state of being, it must also imply a strong sense of the great work to be done by man on earth.

That work I considered as twofold: the duty of personal improvement and preparation for eternity; and that of "serving our generation according to the will of God."

"On both of these points," I observed, "we shall find, if we look for them, plain and earnest exhortations and directions in Scripture. What practical directions are given to the people of Israel in regard to many of the ordinary affairs of life! What exhortations and promises are in the Book of Proverbs to the diligent and industrious, and what reproofs to the slothful! The Holy Spirit does not disdain to refer to the instinct of a humble insect, and point her out as an example for our imitation: 'Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways, and be wise.' We find the apostles, amid all their mental toils and cares, labouring night and day with their own hands (1 Cor. iv. 12; 2 Thess. iii. 8, 9), in order at once not to be burdensome, and to give lessons of industry to the infant Churches. Above all, what an example of unwearied diligence in his great work we have in our all-perfect Pattern, the Lord himself!"

I noticed the striking parables of the talents, the pounds, and the last great judgment of those on the right and left of the King, as illustrating the solemn bearing of time upon eternity; then the apostle's earnest words of warning, "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation," and other injunctions to diligence, earnestness, watchfulness, throughout the New Testament.

I dwelt particularly on the words (Eph. v. 15, 16), "See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time;" the latter remarkable expression being repeated in another of Paul's epistles. We are told that it may be more literally translated as "buying back the opportunity." "It gives us the idea," I said, "of something we have lost, or are in constant danger of losing, and must anxiously seek to redeem, to recover, to buy back at any price. How much of our little store of precious hours we have already lost! Ah! that is a sad and humbling thought, but let it stir us up to more diligence for the future.

"We may well say, in regard to what we may call the thieves of time, that 'their name is legion;' but let us try to look a few of them in the face. Let me hear what some of the most dangerous are."

The answer first given was "Sleep."

"Yes, for although we must not call the time lost which is rightly given to the most graciously appointed means of restoring the strength and powers of body and mind, yet doubtless much is often taken from mere indolence and self-indulgence, which is nothing short of wasted time. It has always appeared to me a humbling token of the imperfection and weakness of our mortal life, that so much of it must be spent in unconsciousness. For many, even of the most energetic and gifted minds, nearly the third part of the twenty-four hours must be passed in total inaction, in order to be fit for exertion during the remainder. Surely a reasonable, intellectual being, when fairly roused to know the value of time, will be earnestly desirous to redeem all of it that he can from such a state. How is this to be accomplished?"

One girl said, "By sitting up late."

"That is one way, but a very bad one, defeating its own purpose, sure in the end to wear out health and strength. I could tell you many sad instances of its consequences when rashly persisted in. Some of you, who may often be obliged to work at late hours, must know by experience the languor and fatigue of the next morning. There is a far better plan."

"Early rising."

"Yes, and I cannot sufficiently impress upon you the value of this, and the good influence which acquiring the habit now will exert on your future life. There is no hour like that of the morning; whether for quiet devotion, which should ever have the first place, or for any kind of study or mental exercise. Even if you have the time, you will vainly seek for the same mental vigour and ability for either, after the cares and distractions of the day have begun.

"How striking is the example of our Lord in regard to this duty; and how often we find it recorded of the Scripture saints, that they 'rose up early in the morning!' The 'virtuous woman' whom I have so often referred to, is represented as rising 'while it is yet night,' to attend to her domestic duties."

"But," said Fanny, "she must have sat up late also, for we are told that 'her candle goeth not out by night.'"

I could not help smiling at this remark. "I should not recommend you to imitate her in this," I said; "but rather consider the expression as only intended to denote her unwearied diligence, and to show that she allowed herself no more sleep than was absolutely necessary."

"There is no way of redeeming time more obvious, or more satisfactory, than early rising. One hour each morning is fourteen in a fortnight, and may be called an added day for devotion or study; an entire day, too, without the many interruptions which must occur in the course of the same number of hours in ordinary circumstances. Not that I would wish you to deprive yourselves of sufficient sleep, which is especially needful at your age; but seven hours, or seven and a half, are enough in general for any one in good health, and by going to bed at eleven, you may rise at six or half-past six with perfect advantage. If you find it difficult to awake, you cannot spend a little money better than on a small alarm clock, which may now be had for a few shillings.

"Some of you will perhaps tell me that you are obliged to rise early, in order to begin the necessary work of the day. But do you rise early enough to find time for the Scriptures and prayer? Oh, make an effort for this also! Do not enter into the world without having first been alone with God—really, not merely for a few hurried minutes. Do you recollect what we are told of the lamented Havelock—that at whatever hour his men were to march, he was always, I think, two hours earlier engaged in devotion! How much of the secret of his 'great strength' may be found in this! I do not bid you imitate him literally (which few constitutions would be able for without injury), but in spirit and in measure."

Various other "thieves of time" were then suggested, and talked over,—as habits of indolence and trifling, dress, worldly amusements, want of order, needless visits and gossiping, foolish reading, what we call day-dreaming or building castles in the air, &c. I showed how most of these might be good or harmless in moderation, and that time is not really lost in healthful recreation, or in cheerful family and rational social intercourse; but in the abuse of either or all, to the neglect of higher duties, and the injury of body and mind.

I then, as on the previous evening, mentioned a few simple rules, the results of my own experience, which might be of practical use in this matter:—

1. Take care of the corners or fragments of your time. Bear in mind here, as in all other things, "the power of littles." Many a person who would be ashamed to think of sitting idle for a whole hour, will lose more time than that almost unconsciously, during a day, in small portions. And on the other hand it is astonishing what may be made out of those quarters of hours, which are so often allowed to slip uselessly away. A short trial would convince you of this. Let some simple piece of work, or useful book, be appropriated to those intervals which you know are likely to occur between your regular engagements, when you are alone or in the family, and you will be surprised to see the progress soon made in either.

2. Be methodical in laying out your time, so far as this is in your power. We must not be slaves to method, yet I believe nothing of much value, generally speaking, can be accomplished without it. While ever humbly acknowledging ourselves to be at the disposal of our God, yet let us endeavour, looking forward to each day as it arises, to be able to say with the apostle, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that." Even in tedious sickness, as has been well observed, it is wonderful how the weariness of long days may be lightened, by having regular times for such variety of employments as an invalid is capable of. Many of you, I know, have regular duties, dependent more on the arrangements of others than your own. Be faithful and diligent in these, but so far as any of you can choose for yourselves, my earnest advice is to plan beforehand, as seems most suitable, your hours for study, work, or recreation, and keep to them as much as Providence permits. Yet when any higher duty, or providential obstacle alters your arrangements, receive this in a cheerful spirit, as intended for your good in some other way.

3. Endeavour to do things at the best time. A little attention will show you the advantage of this. For example, as I have said before, the morning hours are those when the mind is most clear and active. Give the first and best to God, to prayer and reading of his word; then take such employments as require most attention. Let the times when you are most apt to be tired and dull be given to cheerful family intercourse, needlework, or reading of a lighter kind. Hannah More, that example of useful exertion, suffered much from headaches and other illnesses, and says that in the days when she was fit for nothing else, she could at least look over her papers and dot the i's. I was much impressed by this little fact in reading her life, and by the lesson it conveyed. To attempt any special physical or mental effort when illness or fatigue makes us unfit for it, is only to lose our time, and depress our spirits by failure.

4. Give your real attention to whatever you are doing. We have scriptural authority for this: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord." You must often have remarked how quickly one person will do the same thing compared with another, and perhaps you may have sometimes said with a sigh, "Oh, if I could but do that as she does!" No doubt there are natural differences of ability, but much is owing to bad habits and want of energy or perseverance in early life. Guard against dawdling hands and a dreaming head; give your mind and heart to the duty of the time, whatever it may be, and your progress will soon be cheering and satisfactory.

5. Avoid hurry and bustle. While anxious not to waste time, take what is required to do everything you undertake quietly and well. There is no more true proverb than that which says, "More haste worst speed." When you have finished any employment, put things quietly away into their proper places before you go to another, and you will avoid much vexatious loss of time and temper in seeking them afterwards. Ask the blessing and help of the Lord upon every duty. This of itself will promote composure as well as energy.

6. Have respect to the time of others. Be punctual, be considerate, in regard to this. I have often had my patience greatly tried by the manner in which those who seemed not to value time for themselves were robbing me of mine, either by not keeping appointments, or by prolonging needlessly their visits. When things of this kind occur, consider it as part of your daily discipline, and a lesson of patience, but never be the offending party.

The evening was now so far advanced that I felt much of what I wished to say, in following out the subject, must be deferred to another opportunity. Our minister looked in just as we were about to separate, to offer us the best wishes of the season. He had something kind to say to each one, and his kind looks and words were cheering to us all.

When I mentioned the subject we had been considering, "You could not have a better motto for a New Year, my dear young friends," he said, "than that which Miss —— has been speaking of,—'Redeeming the time.' Let it be your earnest prayer, resolution, and endeavour, to redeem as much as possible during this year, from the various ways in which conscience and reflection will tell you that it has formerly been wasted. Let life henceforward be, for each of you, more than heretofore life in earnest,—life fully, actively, happily employed in the service of a heavenly Master, not passing away in a mere round of cheerless duties or heartless follies. Begin at once; recollect that youth is the season, so to speak, in which time may be redeemed at a cheap rate, and habits of diligence and energy formed with comparative ease, which, at a later period, could only be obtained by painful, laborious effort. And then the result, after all, would be much less. Like the old story in Roman history of Tarquin and the books of the Sibyl, while the price will in no degree be abated, the gain will be deplorably diminished. How sad is the retrospect, in later life or in the approach of death, of opportunities neglected, and precious seasons of improvement or usefulness lost for ever! Yet even this need not discourage any one from vigorous efforts to redeem what yet remains. I recollect being much impressed by a New Year sermon from one of our gifted Edinburgh ministers, on the story of Joshua commanding the sun and moon to stand still. Without entering into the difficulties of the passage, he viewed it in its practical light, as a remarkable record of prayer heard and answered. And the God of Joshua, he said, is the same God still, and can still do wonders in answer to the prayer of faith. Even for those who feel that the day of life is well-nigh over, that many of its precious hours have been lost, and the shades of evening are advancing, while their work is not half accomplished, he can, as it were, lengthen the daylight, and give grace and strength to do the work of two days in one.

"The idea was consoling to myself, under a depressing sense of past sin and unprofitableness. But better, far better, for you all, not to need such comfort in the degree I did, if now, in the morning of your days, you begin at once diligently to live for the service of Christ on earth, and in preparation for his service in heaven. May the language of the Christian poet be that of each of us here:—

'Lord, in the strength of grace,
With a glad heart and free,
Myself, my residue of days,
I consecrate to thee.

'Thy ransomed servant, I Restore to thee thy own,
And, from this moment, live or die
To serve my God alone.'

THE INCUMBENT OF HAWORTH.

PART SECOND.

"THE voice of Grimshaw," says his biographer, "rushed and rolled amongst his astonished parishioners of Haworth, at his entrance upon the duties of his charge, like the peal of thunder over the surrounding moors." But unlike the thunder, it was not a crash and over. It was a steady, continuous, unintermitting peal. Thirty sermons a-week was not too much for his zeal and strength, and that week he counted as lost in which he numbered fewer than a dozen. Writing to a preacher, Thomas Lee, he says, "I hope your bow abides in full strength, and that you can preach twenty times a-week. If you can preach oftener, do. Preaching is health, food, and physic to me; and why not to thee, my brother? Besides, Tommy, there is great need of preaching now. For iniquity aboundeth, the love of many grows cold, and God's judgments are out on the earth. Tommy, let us preach four times a-day, or thirty times a-week, if you can bear it. It will be all little enough. Our Master well deserves it; yea, and infinitely more. Oh, that we may spend and be spent preaching his everlasting gospel, in converting sinners, and confirming believers!" And yet his sermons were not short. Preaching on one occasion in Manchester, before he ascended the pulpit, the steward, usually called Dicky Barlow, called him aside, and said, "Sir, we feel exceedingly obliged by your kindness in coming to preach to us on this occasion, but allow me to observe that our people here have a great deal of preaching, and a great dislike to long preaching. When our venerable father Wesley comes, he generally concludes the service within the hour." "Mr. Wesley, God bless him!" replied Grimshaw, "he can do more in one hour than I can do in two." With this apology, he preached just two hours. It was a habit he had acquired amongst his own people, who, when he came amongst them, were ignorant and slow of apprehension, and in preaching to whom he knew not how to be explicit enough, or to set his subject in a sufficient variety of lights, till he often wearied them in his inability to satisfy himself. But short or long, his preaching was accompanied with mighty power. Yet not his preaching alone. In his entire circle of parochial work, he had continually recurring fruits of his ministry. If it be often true that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, in the case of Grimshaw, success, if not the reward, was the attendant of his labours; and can we doubt that, if labours such as his, and conducted in his spirit, were characteristic of the ministers of any Church, the gospel would both have a wider diffusion and more glorious triumphs? Can we conceive of such a plan of ministerial work, faithfully, prayerfully, and for years systematically carried out, as is sketched by Grimshaw in the following description of his own parochial labours, without decided results? "The method," he thus speaks of his own operations, "which I, the least and most unworthy of my Lord's ministers, take in my parish is this: I preach the gospel, glad tidings of salvation, to penitent sinners, through faith in Christ's blood only, twice every day the year round—save when I expound the Church Catechism and Thirty-nine Articles, or read the Homilies; which, in substance, I think my duty to do in some part of the year annually on the Lord's day mornings. I have found this practice,

I bless God, of inexpressible benefit to my congregation, which consists, especially in the summer season, of perhaps ten or twelve hundred ; or, as some think, of many more souls. We have also prayers and a chapter expounded every Lord's day evening. I visit my parish in twelve several places monthly, convening six, eight, or ten families in each place, allowing any people of the neighbouring parishes that please to attend that exhortation. This I call my monthly visitation. I am now entering into the fifth year of it, and wonderfully has the Lord blessed it. The only thing more are our funeral expositions, and exhortations, and visiting our societies in one or other of the last three days of the month. This I purpose, through the grace of God, to make my constant business in my parish so long as I live."

In his letter to Dr. Gillies of Glasgow, he enters into details of the work of revival that accompanied his labours at Haworth. Then, as in recent revivals, physical demonstrations frequently attended the conviction and awakening of sinners. "It was amazing," he says, "to see and hear what weeping, roaring, and agonies many people were seized with, at the apprehension of their sinful state and the wrath of God." He reckoned, and that at an early period of his ministry, one hundred and twenty souls savingly renewed, whom he formed into little classes after the manner of the Methodists, though at that time he had neither seen nor conversed with any of them. Writing afterwards to Wesley, he says,—"You will desire to know how I do: O dear sir, hearty and happy in the Lord. And how my ministry, or rather the present state of my parish: Blessed be God, flourishing still more and more. Our societies are in general very lively in the Lord; and several others, though not as yet formed in society, are nevertheless come to a sense of the pardoning love of God. Others are under deep concern, or eagerly hungering and thirsting after our dear Redeemer. Two under my own roof are just now under deep convictions, one a girl about eighteen years old, and the other a boy about fourteen; and, I hope, my own little girl, between ten and eleven years old. It is near six months since she first began to show a serious concern for her sinful state."

In reference to the bodily manifestations attendant on conversion, he afterwards wrote: "That soon after the devil observed such crying and distress of soul, and agitation of body to affect people under the word, he also began to seize people under the word with strange, unnatural distortions, convulsions, hideous roaring—to bring, as we plainly saw, contempt and disgrace upon the true work of God; for it is remarkable that the generality of such persons, whatever pretences of repentance they might then make, dwindled away to nothing. For seven years past the crying and agitations in sincere penitents are in a manner ceased, and are rarely seen or heard of. The Lord Jesus now carries on his work in the heart in a still, serious, affecting way; and I trust with as great success as ever since it began." The effect of his ministry was not a mere excitement; it was seen in the holy conversation of the believer and in the formation of honest character. Acts of kindness and affection were reciprocated between neighbour and neighbour; a love for the word of God, and for secret prayer, began to prevail; and the scenes of many a death-bed told of the power of the truth. One year, in which he buried eighteen persons, he had reason to believe that sixteen of them entered into the kingdom of God.

But the powerful ministry of Grimshaw was not confined to his own parish. He struck out into Lancashire and Cheshire, accompanied by evangelists like-minded with himself. In the course of one of his preaching tours, he was brought into intercourse with a woman, too remarkable to be passed by in this notice of Grimshaw's labours, of the name of Alice Cross, who had opened a church in her house, and where he frequently held service. Alice, as described in the memoir from which we give this sketch, was a woman of great spirit and intrepidity, and a heroine for Christ. Her husband was a quiet, sober man, but, for some time after her conversion, he remained in the old way. When going out to worship, with her straw-hat in one hand and the latch of the door in the other, she would say to him, "John Cross, wilt thou go to heaven with me? If thou wilt not, I am determined not to go to hell with thee." John yielded at last to her good sense and strong appeals: a pulpit was fixed in the largest room of their house; and the messengers of God were made welcome to their fare and farm. When beggars came to the door she told them of the riches that are in Christ Jesus, and kneeling by their side, commended them to the grace of God, and then sent them away, grateful for her charity, and impressed by her earnestness in seeking their soul's good. Nor were the more honourable of the land beyond the reach of her reproofs. On one occasion she stopped the Cheshire hunt, when passing her house, and addressed the horsemen—especially the then Earl of Stamford and Sir Harry Manwaring—who listened to her word, "and rode on." When the expected preacher did not come, though the pulpit was left unoccupied, the congregation was not dismissed without manna, as Alice, in her simple and earnest way, dealt out the bread of life; and strict indeed would have been the discipline that would have prevented her thus standing before the people as the almoner of heaven. She was remarkable for her comeliness, "never wearing a border upon her cap, which was made of linen, pinned in a plait upon her forehead, and tied under her chin." John Pawson says she more nearly resembled one that had come from the happy world of spirits than any other woman he ever saw. She had one of those strongly marked characters which the novelist seizes upon with avidity, and which he converts into a name which becomes a household word more familiar to us than the names of real history. The conversation between William Grimshaw and Alice Cross, when they sat together by the fireside, with honest John nodding sleepily at intervals, tired by his day's work on the farm, could it have been recorded, would have read like a chapter in the immortal Dream.

It was not always that the heart of Grimshaw was refreshed in his preaching tours by the sympathy and godly converse of an Alice Cross. As he was doing the work, and had cast in his lot with the despised Methodists of the period, he had to bear with them his share of reproach and persecution. It fell upon him most sharply from his own brethren in the ministry. The clergy were on the watch to catch the faults committed by a man whose zeal was a reflection on their own supineness. When it was found that he could not be silenced by legal process, some of his opponents determined that it should be done by a more summary method. Amongst the most unscrupulous of these was the Rev. George White, perpetual curate of Colne and Marsden. Mustering a large mob at Colne, he attacked Grimshaw and John Wesley, who had come there to preach. When in the midst of his sermon at mid-day, the drunken rabble came down the hill, at the foot of which Wesley had planted his pulpit, menacing and threatening him and his friends with clubs and stones. They were headed by one who called himself a deputy-constable, who said he must bring the preacher before the clergyman of the parish. Wesley consented to go, that a riot might be prevented; but was struck at repeatedly on the way, the multitude following cursing and swearing in the most horrid manner, and flourishing a club over his head. White demanded of them, as the condition of their deliverance from the mob, that they should promise not to preach there again. Wesley at length yielded to say that he would not preach at that time. On this White went out to the mob, spoke a few words to them, when their noise for the time ceased. But the evil spirit he had stirred was greater than he could allay. As Wesley and Grimshaw walked out together the mob closed in upon them, tossed them about with great violence, threw Grimshaw down, and covered both of them with mire. The people who had assembled to hear the word of God were treated even with greater cruelty. They had to run for their lives amidst showers of mud and stones, and no regard was paid to either sex or age. Some were trampled in the mire, others dragged by the hair, and many were unmercifully beat with clubs. One was forced to leap from a rock ten or twelve feet into the river, otherwise they would have thrown him in headlong. All the while, White was looking on well pleased, watching his mad associates, without a word to stay them. Of this poor man, the perpetual curate of Colne and Marsden, it is sad to learn, "that he drank himself first into a jail, and then into his grave," though a ray of hope comes from his death-bed, when Newton tells us that when dying he sent for Grimshaw, and expressed his concern for the part he had taken in the outrage against him.

It is a glorious transition to pass from such scenes of enmity to the truth, to the record of its triumphs in the same neighbourhood, on the occasion of a visit of Whitefield to Haworth. The great preacher had thrice visited Haworth, when in the church-yard there were assembled about six thousand hearers, and in the church above a thousand communicants. One present says of the sacramental season, "that it was most awful," and that many dated their first awakening from that period. At the time of this fourth visit, an incident occurred which the great preacher knew how to use, and which gave additional impression even to his word of power. His text was the solemn one—"It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." On the announcement of the text there was a pause, the silence of which was broken by a wild shriek of terror that arose from the midst of the assembled mass. A few moments afterwards, Grimshaw was seen hastening towards the preacher, and was heard saying to him, "Brother Whitefield, you stand amongst the dead and the dying—an immortal soul has been called into eternity; the destroying angel is passing over the congregation: cry aloud, and spare not." It was then announced by the preacher to the people that one of their number had been summoned before the bar of God. The text was repeated, and all listened with awe-stricken countenances, as he read again the words with the emphasis of death upon his lips, "It is appointed unto men once to die." The Countess of Huntingdon and Lady Margaret Ingham were present; and from the spot near which they stood a loud cry was again heard, and it was announced that another of the congregation had fallen by the arrow of the destroyer. Each person there thought the next call might be to himself, and listened as to the voice of his own doom. Whitefield rose to the appalling grandeur of the occasion; there was a solemnity like that which sleeps in the darkened chamber when the struggle of the dying has commenced; and all hearts throbbed and heaved with an intense emotion, as the impenitent sinner was warned of the terrible of his position, with the wrath of God abiding on him, and but a step between his soul and eternal death.

It is a quieter scene that is presented than in the thronging multitude around Whitefield, when in the course of Grimshaw's itineracy he is brought into intercourse with the well-known author of the "Triumph of Faith,"—the pious Romaine. The same work is going forward, but it is in still air; yet not without the devoted minister suffering much for the truth's sake. What a picture is presented of the solitary witness for the truth, when we are told of Romaine, that in his own church of St. Dunstan's at Aberford, he had often to preach by the light of a single candle, which he held in his hand, as the church-wardens would neither light the church nor suffer it to be lighted! Romaine was averse to open-air service, and wrought within the prescribed range of recognised ecclesiastical order, which Grimshaw and his devoted associates had long overleaped. In strength of body, and flexibility of mind, and plain vigour of address, Grimshaw was admirably adapted for the life of the wandering evangelist. One day he was the guest of the Countess of Huntingdon, and the next sleeping in his own hay-loft, because of the number of strangers at the parsonage, and even cleaning the shoes of the guests. Like Wesley, when one side was sore from the hard pallet on which he lay down, he thanked God that the other side was yet sound. When drenched by the rain, chilled by the wind and frost, with no regular meals, walking far, and riding further, and speaking in the open air to companies of varied characters, he pursued his course with a blithesome spirit, singing songs of praise to his divine Master. "During the space of sixteen years," says Venn, "he was only once suspended from his labours by sickness, though he dared all weathers upon the bleak mountains, and used his body with less compassion than a merciful man would his beast." He would allow himself in no indulgence that even seemed to interfere with his work, or that threatened to come between him and the entire consecration of his every thought to the service of his Master. Possessing a fine cow, of which he was truly proud, he found that the thought of her followed him into the church and hindered his duty. He determined she should no longer ruffle his mind, and announced her for sale. When a farmer came to look at her, on asking the usual question if she had any fault, Grimshaw replied, "Her fault will be no fault to you,—she follows me into the pulpit." A man so self-denying to himself, was not likely to fail in the honest, faithful rebuke of sin in others, or in the frank expression of his mind when occasions called for it. To a lady with whom he was one day conversing, he administered a striking but severe reproof, which his biographer justly says may be of use to some who live in our own times. She had expressed her admiration of a certain minister who was more gifted in talent than in grace. "Madam," said Grimshaw, "I am glad you never saw the devil." When asked why he made this remark, he said, "Because he has greater talents than all the ministers in the world. I am fearful if you were to see him you would fall in love with him, as you seem to have so high a regard for talent without sanctity. Pray do not be led away with the sound of talents. Let the ministry under which Providence has called you never be deserted under the influence of novelty. There dwell, and pray that it may prove to you increasingly edifying, consolatory, and instructive." His faithfulness and ready power, even in the most trying circumstances, strikingly appeared on the occasion on which he was cited before the metropolitan. A complaint being lodged against his intrusion into other folds, his grace announced a confirmation service in Grimshaw's church, expressing a desire to have an interview with him. In the course of the conversation, the prelate, after stating the charge of his preaching where he had a mind, added, "And I learn that your discourses are very loose; that, in fact, you can and do preach about anything. That I may judge for myself of your doctrine and manner of stating it, I give you notice that I shall expect you to preach before me and the clergy present, in two hours hence, and from the text which I am about to name." The text being named, "Why, my lord," said Grimshaw, "should the congregation be kept out of the sermon for two hours? Send a clergyman to read prayers, and I will begin immediately." Prayers being read, Mr. Grimshaw ascended the pulpit and commenced an extempore prayer for the archbishop, the people, and the young persons about to be confirmed; and so wrestled with God for his assistance and blessing, that the congregation, the clergy, and the prelate were moved to tears. After sermon, when the clergy were gathered, expecting to hear the archbishop's reproof of Grimshaw's extemporaneous effusions, taking him by the hand, with a tremulous voice and faltering tongue he said, "I would to God that all the clergy in my diocese were like this good man." Grimshaw afterwards observed, "I did expect to be turned out of my parish on that occasion; but if I had, I would have joined my friend Wesley, taken my saddle-bags, and gone to one of his poorest circuits."

Two years after this, a malignant fever raging in the village of Haworth brought to a sudden close that life that had been in labours so abundant and so blessed in its work. As he had lived so he died. Being asked how he did, in the midst of his oppressive, feverish sickness; "Happy," was his reply, "as I can be on earth, and as sure of glory as if I were in it." In the twenty-first year of his ministry at Haworth, and the fifty-fifth of his age, he ceased from his work on earth, to enter into his eternal rest.

"TIS TIME TO AWAKE!"

"Now it is high time to awake out of sleep."

"The night is far spent; the day is at hand."

"'Tis time to awake!" for the Day-star of love
That rose o'er your childhood's way,
Beams forth from the fair realms of glory above,
Radiant and clear to-day.

"'Tis time to awake!" for life's journey speeds on;
The morn of gladness draws near;
When He who for you hath the victory won,
The Prince of Peace shall appear.

"'Tis time to awake!" O wanderers, who roam Afair from the Shepherd's fold;
Hear soft echoes sounding, like voices from home,
The grave sweet story of old.

"'Tis time to awake!" ye who, lingering, stand
Where earth's sunny waters glide:
Go, taste the pure streams of a lovelier land,
And the joy that shall ever abide.

"'Tis time to awake!" the call sounds from heaven,
To you, who by Jesus' priest,
To his holy keeping your hearts have given,—
Your Saviour, Refuge and Rest.

"Tis time to awake!" showers of golden rain
Now in rich blessing descend;
While the Spirit of love still pleads yet again,—
Your Comforter and your Friend.

"Tis time to awake!" friends! be earnest, arise,
With courage your race to run:
Toil on, as true servants, to win the high prize,
To gain the glad word, "Well done."

"Tis time to awake!" rest on Jesus alone;
His arm, when trial is o'er,
Shall bear you where light, as on earth never shone, Gilds the bright eternal shore. E. M.

HONEY FROM THE ROCK.

THE traveller through the bleakest and wildest regions of ancient Palestine was sometimes surprised by coming upon a thrifty olive-tree growing on the scanty handful of earth that covers the flinty rocks. Or in the clefts of the rock he would find a busy colony of bees. The hidden comb would be dripping with the luscious outflow of wild honey. To his parched lips how delicious the pressings of the liquid sweetness! And all the more welcome because found in an unexpected place.

For it is not from rocks that the famished expect supplies. Bare, bald, bleak, barren is the rock. The eagle may perch on its out-jutting crag, the wild coney may nestle in its clefts, but the golden ears never wave over it, the vine never mantles its rough cheek with purple clusters. Yet out of these very rocks came the dripping honey-comb; and from the crevices crept up the solitary olive. So the wayworn and thirsty traveller did actually and literally "suck honey out of the rock, and oil from the flinty rock" (Deut. xxxii. 13).

The charm of this fact in natural history lies in this—that blessings are found in unexpected quarters. This is as true in spiritual history as it is in natural. And no season is so honey-yielding and oil-producing to the Christian as the flinty season of adversity. In the first place his religion is more highly prized; in the next place the world is held in less esteem. The affections do not centre then upon gold, or honours, on schemes of secular profit, not even on books or domestic joys. But in Jesus the bereaved soul looks for its purest satisfactions. The honey-comb is there. All sweet graces—the peace that passeth understanding—the godly contentment—the hungering for heaven—the fellowship of the Comforter,—all flow forth from the secret cells that lie hid within that rock of affliction. The believer, with the Bible in his hand and the Saviour in his heart, sits down and draws "honey from the rock."

How wonderfully God discovers to his people their richest joys in the flinty places of bereavement and sorrow! Do I lose my investments in bank stocks or railway shares? Then I go up to my heavenly Father and inquire after my soul's investments in celestial treasures, and find they are all safe. Do I see my fair-weather friends deserting me in some pinching season of adversity? Then I flee the closer to Him who "sticketh closer than a brother." Do I bury up in the grave the darling of my cradle—or the sweet-voiced wife that made for me a sunshine in the shade—or the dear old mother that has beamed on us from her arm-chair for a lifetime? Then upward to my heavenly home and waiting kindred do I look, thankful that there is one home at last into which the spoiler never can penetrate. My thoughts go out towards God the oftener. Heaven seems nearer. Christ is certainly dearer. The closet is more eagerly sought; and life is more disentangled from the harassing cares, vexations, and absorptions of worldliness. How loath we were to be driven away into these dreary, outlying regions of adversity! And yet what delicious flowings of heavenly honey have our souls drawn from the flinty rock!

My brother! you make no greater mistake than when you suppose that the only things for which you ought to be congratulated are prosperous days, and fertile hours in the rich alluvials of life—are cloudless skies, and vernal airs. Those are not your safest hours, nor your most profitable. Do you ever thank God for a hurricane? Yet many a hurricane of trial has driven a sinner to Calvary, and sent a backsliding professor to his forsaken post of duty. Do you thank God for the deluge of sorrow? Yet how many a stubborn, barren heart has been mellowed by the descending floods! Much of the choicest, deepest, holiest portion of your character was engendered in those seasons of your history which called forth the pity and the condolence of thoughtless worldlings about you. You should have been congratulated, instead of being commiserated. You were, indeed, in the rough, jagged places of hardship and calamity. But never, never had your soul such honey offered it, as when the flinty rock was beneath you and the open heavens above you. It was your own fault—as well as your sad misfortune—if you did not feed copiously on the luscious drippings of Christ's honey-comb. When you grew weary by reason of the hardness of your pathway, then did the Everlasting Rest beckon you on the more invitingly. When evil news were dreaded, or were actually received, they but made the glad tidings of the gospel the more precious. When Death opened a grave at your side, he only opened a burial-place in which you might hide away for ever worldliness and sinful idolatries. When evil men vexed you and slandered you, what an onward stretch did your desires make towards that world where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest! And from the gateway of glory no portion of your earthly pilgrimage will appear to have yielded such agreeable disappointments as those hours of trial when you drew honey out of the rock, and oil from the flinty rock.—T. L. Cuyler.

TO THE MEMORY OF "ANNIE."

WHO DIED AT MILAN, JUNE 6, 1860.

"Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou? She, supposing him to be the gardener, said unto him, Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him."—JOHN XX. 15.

In the fair gardens of celestial peace
Walketh a gardener in meekness clad;
Fair are the flowers that wreath his dewy locks,
And his mysterious eyes are sweet and sad;

Fair are the silent foldings of his robes,
Falling with saintly calmness to his feet;
And when he walks, each floweret to his will
With living pulse of sweet accord doth beat.

Every green leaf thrills to its tender heart,
In the mild summer radiance of his eye;—
No fear of storm, or cold, or bitter frost,
Shadows the flowerets when their sun is nigh.

And all our pleasant haunts of earthly love
Are nurseries to those gardens of the air;
And his far darting eye, with starry beam
Watcheth the growing of his treasures there.

We call them ours, o'erwept with selfish tears,
O'erwatched with restless longings night and day;
Forgetful of the high, mysterious right
He holds to bear our cherished plants away.

But when some sunny spot in those bright fields
Needs the fair presence of an added flower, Down sweeps a starry angel in the night;—
At morn, the rose has vanished from our bower.

Where stood our tree, our flower, there is a grave!
Blank, silent, vacant; but in worlds above—
Like a new star outblossomed in the skies—
The angels hail an added flower of love.

Dear friends, no more upon that lonely mound—
Strewed with the red and yellow autumn leaf—
Drop thou the tear, but raise the fainting eye
Beyond the autumn mists of earthly grief.

Thy garden rose-bud bore within its breast
Those mysteries of colour warm and bright,
That the bleak climate of this lower sphere
Could never waken into form and light.

Yes, the sweet gardener hath borne her hence—
Nor must thou ask to take her thence away;
Thou shalt behold her in some coming hour,
Full blossomed in his fields of cloudless day.

READING PHILIPPIANS AT PHILIPPI.

BEFORE leaving the scene, I sat down upon one of the prostrate columns and read the Epistle to the Philippians. The recollections, the place, the circumstances, brought home to me the contents with new vividness and power. I had just traversed the road by which Paul and his associates approached the city. The gateway where they entered was within sight. I could hear the rushing of the stream upon the bank of which Paul declared the name of Jesus, and rejoiced over his first converts on a new continent. On my left passed the Egnatian Way, along which Epaphroditus, the bearer of the epistle, hurried with tidings of the apostle from his cell at Rome. The silent Stadium lay before me on the hill-side, of which his illustration reminded the Philippians, as he held up to them his own example for imitation in striving for the imperishable crown, which is to reward the Christian victor. Within the space under my eye must have stood the house where the first disciples were gathered for worship and called on the name of Christ. One of the mounds around me may have been the ruins of the prison which resounded with the praises of Paul and Silas, and which the earthquake shook to its foundations. I thought especially of the moment when the following great words were read and heard here for the first time, and of the myriads since that moment whose souls those words have stirred to their inmost depths, in all generations, and in all parts of the earth; "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus: who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." One could not, under such circumstances, repress a new and yet more ardent prayer that the day of this universal recognition may soon come, and, in the meanwhile, that the spirit of the sublime passage may pass more fully into the lives of those who profess and call themselves Christians.—Dr. Hackett in "Bibliotheca Sacra."

OUR ONLY HOPE.

IF the soul be safe—if it live by faith in the Son of God—if it fight the good fight of faith, and win the field,—all other losses are not to be reckoned of; we are more than gainers, more than conquerors. But if the soul perish (and it will perish, except it be fed with the word of the gospel; and it will make shipwreck, if Christ sit not at the stern ; and it will be overcome in the day of battle, if Christ be not its Captain, its Saviour, its Deliverer), then all the world is gone with us ; it had been better for us if we had never been born. Our sins do threaten God's vengeance upon us ; our consciences do accuse us ; the law contains matter of indictment against us ; the devil follows the suit ; all the creatures of God which we have abused, all the callings of God which we have neglected, all the threatenings of God which we have despised, do witness against us. In a word, the Lord sitteth on his throne as Judge—hell openeth her mouth wide, being ready to swallow us up—the world forsaketh us—our friends have no power to help us. What is to be done in this case ? what shift shall we make ? what place of refuge shall we flee to ? Only this is our comfort, that the Son of God became the Son of man, to make us the sons of God ; vile he became, to exalt us ; poor, to enrich us ; a slave, to enfranchise us ; dead, to quicken us ; miserable, to bless us ; lost in the eyes of the world, to save us ; lastly, partaker of our nature, of our infirmity, of our habitation, to advance us to his kingdom and glory.

CHRIST AND THE LITTLE ONES.

"THE Master has come over Jordan,"
Said Hannah the mother one day ;
"He is healing the people who throng him,
With a touch of his finger, they say.

And now I shall carry the children,
Little Rachel, and Samuel, and John,
I shall carry the baby, Esther,
For the Lord to look upon."

The father looked at her kindly,
But he shook his head and smiled :

"Now who but a doating mother
Would think of a thing so wild ?

If the children were tortured by demons,
Or dying of fever—'twere well ;
Or had they the taint of the leper,
Like many in Israel ;"—

"Nay, do not hinder me, Nathan,
I feel such a burden of care,—
If I carry it to the Master
Perhaps I shall leave it there.

If he lay his hand on the children,
My heart will be lighter, I know ;
For a blessing for ever and ever
Will follow them as they go."

So over the hills of Judah,
Along by the vine-rows green,
With Esther asleep on her bosom,
And Rachel her brothers between ;

'Mong the people who hung on his teaching,
Or waited his touch and his word,
Through the row of proud Pharisees listening,
She pressed to the feet of the Lord.

"Now why shouldst thou hinder the Master,"
Said Peter, "with children like these ?
Seat not how from morning till evening
He teacheth and healeth disease ?"

Then Christ said, "Forbid not the children ;
Permit them to come unto me !"
And he took in his arms little Esther,
And Rachel he set on his knee ;

And the heavy heart of the mother
Was lifted all earth-care above,
As he laid his hands on the brothers,
And blest them with tenderest love

As he said of the babes in his bosom,
"Of such are the kingdom of heaven"—
And strength for all duty and trial
That hour to her spirit was given.

REACH HITHER THY FINGER.

Look well upon him,—dost thou not know him ? Why, his hands were pierced, his head was pierced, his side was pierced, his heart was pierced, with the stings of thy sins ; and these marks he retains even after his resurrection, that by these marks thou mightest always know him. Is not the passage to his heart yet standing open ? If thou knowest him not by the face, the voice, the hands ; if thou knowest him not by the tears and bloody sweat, yet look nearer,—thou mayest know him by the heart : that broken, healed heart is his ; that dead, revived heart is his ; that soul-pitying, melting heart is his ; doubtless it can be none but his : love and compassion are its certain signatures. And is not here yet fuel enough for love to feed upon ? Doth not this heart of Christ even snatch thy heart, and almost draw it forth of thy breast ? Canst thou read the history of love any further at once ? Doth not thy throbbing heart here stop to ease itself ? If not, go on, for the field of love is large.—Ambrose.

T A N N A *

THE Rev. George Turner has recently published a narrative of nineteen years in Polynesia, the first part of which was spent in the island of Tanna, in the New Hebrides. These nineteen years date from one of the most striking tragedies in the history of missions, the massacre of the Rev. John Williams and his young friend Mr. Harris, on the adjacent island of Erromanga. The very day before his violent death, Mr. Williams had landed in Tanna. Twenty miles to the left lay Erromanga, guiltless as yet of his blood; right opposite the islands of Nina and Futuna, one fifteen and the other twenty miles away; and far to the right, about forty miles, "the beautiful pear-shaped island of Aneiteum." On this island of Tanna, then wholly savage, Mr. Williams had, on the whole, a good reception. At one time he was rather alarmed, when a hundred men with clubs, spears, slings, and bows, surrounded the boat, and held it fast as if determined not to let them away; but by means of "presents, kind forbearance, and God's blessing," all ended well. Three native Samoan teachers were left that night on the island to prepare the way for European missionaries, and Mr. Williams left delighted with this first attempt, and hoping to see better fruits in time to come. Next day he died on the beach at Erromanga, under the clubs of infuriated savages.

We had our share in the guilt of John Williams' martyrdom. The immediate cause of it was the cruel usage of the natives by some white men who had been on the island a short time before in search of sandalwood. This was, and is, far too common in the intercourse of Europeans with the natives; and Mr. Turner gives a painful account of the conduct of a captain of an American vessel, who, upon his men being chased back to their boats by the clubs and spears of natives who had been outraged by their immoralities on shore, at once weighed anchor, and, without any inquiry, fired upon the native villages lying about five hundred yards from the place where the missionaries were left. Had his guns taken effect as they were intended to do, there could be little doubt but Mr. Turner also and his brethren would have been massacred by the wild justice of those whom we somewhat too rashly call "barbarians."

In November 1839, John Williams died. In the following August, Mr. Turner and Mr. Nisbet, commissioned by the London Missionary Society, hastened to take his place and preach the gospel of Him who prayed of old, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

The missionaries reached Tanna, and found the Samoan pioneers all safe. They found the natives great thieves, constantly at war, always armed in their savage fashion, and almost naked; yet, on the whole good-humoured, and painted like a nation of Merry-Andrews. For several weeks their time was taken up in building a sixty feet weather-boarded cottage, surrounded by crowds of natives, who stole everything with marvellous ingenuity. And "their stealing was not confined to us. At first we wondered how it was that the women in passing to draw water, or in going to their plantations, had such burdens on their backs. But soon we found out they were obliged to carry about with them all their household valuables, even to the brood of chickens, lest they should be stolen." The language was soon learned, a printing-press set up, hymns composed, and schools opened. Few, however, would attend, and still fewer at the school for girls. They would not enter a house, so Mrs. Turner and Mrs. Nisbet commenced an open air sewing class under the shade of some trees. "The first day only one scholar summoned courage to come. We thought that better than none; so having fitted her little finger with a thimble, we began to initiate her into the mystery of sewing patchwork. Some women gathered round, curious to see this new wonder. Little Mañi was gravely trying to do her best, when the spectators suddenly burst out into a laugh, upon which our little pupil started up, dashed down her work and thimble, burst through the surrounding circle, and fled with the speed of a frightened hare, leaving us looking blank at the issue of our first attempt at school-keeping. The girls, however, soon collected round us, and got so fond of needlework, that we were astonished how quickly they found out the superiority of a fine needle, and would ask for one, saying that the coarse needle spoiled their work." The people were as difficult to get to church as to school. They all promised not to work on the Sabbath, but would never keep their promise. Like the old Samaritans, they would worship the Lord and serve their own gods. "They tried various schemes to please us, and to satisfy their very slender conscience of religious duty." They thought, like more civilized people, that a great deal might be done by proxy. "Was not my wife there?" or, "Was not my little boy there?" they would answer, when asked why they were not worshipping God. But they were always ready to hear when the missionaries came to them; and so the latter began to itinerate, and acquired a knowledge of the whole island.

* "Nineteen Years in Polynesia." By the Rev. George Turner, of the London Missionary Society. London: John Snow. 1861.

The most remarkable thing about Tanna is the mountain on one side of it, near Port Resolution. The interior of it is a vast furnace, and in some places the crust is so thin that, in passing over it, it is like walking on a hot plate. Yet it is covered with houses and villages, and some of these hot places are chosen for the village market place or forum, where the natives lounge and enjoy themselves, and have their night dances. Around the base are hot springs, some even boiling, which the natives make great use of. In some places the men and boys "have only to stand on the rocks, spear their fish, and pitch them behind into the hot spring." Beyond this mountain stands the cone of the volcano, inside which are five smaller craters, from one or other of which there is an explosion every ten minutes. "The hissing, panting, blowing, and strange unearthly sounds from these great gulfs, as you look down and along, are fearful; and presently you are awe-struck with the thundering, deafening roar of an eruption which baffles description. Then up fly the great crimson flakes of liquid lava, which gradually blacken, and consolidate, and descend. More solid blocks of stone fly up with these softer masses, and rise far above them, to a height of two and three hundred feet from the edge of the cup."

But the proper study of mankind, and certainly of the missionary, is man. The people are on the whole a fine race, but unfortunately in a state of continual war with each other. "We were never able to extend our journeys above four miles from our dwelling. At such distances you come to boundaries which are never passed, and beyond which the people speak a different dialect. At one of these boundaries actual war will be going on; at another kidnapping and cooking each other; and at another, all may be peace; but by common consent, they have no dealings with each other." So has sin divided and destroyed men, and made their "natural state" to be a "state of war!" Let us remember that the statements which follow, told by the missionary in quite a business and matter-of-fact way, relate to these islands at the present time, after so much intercourse with Christians real and nominal: "When the body of an enemy is taken, it is dressed for the oven, and sewed up with yams at the next meal. They delight in human flesh, and distribute it in little bits far and near among their friends, as a delicious morsel." They have hardly anything like government, the authority of a chief scarcely extending a stone's throw from his hut; and, as before mentioned, each district is continually fighting with the others. They have no idols, but their gods are called aremhū, a word which means a dead man, and thus points out the origin and nature of their religious worship. A very aged chief is deified after his death, addressed by name, and prayed to on various occasions. First-fruits are presented to them on a rude temporary altar. The chief advances, and prays, "Compassionate father! here is some food for you; eat it; be kind to us on account of it." Then all, by way of amen, unite in a shout; and continue feasting and dancing, after the manner of the old Syrian idolaters, from mid-day to midnight or far on in the morning. But the real gods at Tanna may be said to be the "disease-makers." This is a sort of priesthood of death, who are firmly believed in and much dreaded. It is believed that they create disease and death by burning nahak or rubbish; very much as in ancient Rome and in more recent times witches were believed to do. In Tanna the sorcerer rolls up the vegetable or other rubbish in the form of a cigar, and puts it to the fire to burn gradually. When any person is taken ill, he believes it is some one burning his nahak, and asks his friend to go to the door and blow a large conch or other shell to stop the torturer. And in the morning he sends him presents. It is noteworthy that the belief in the system of nahak-burning is as firm in the craft as out of it. If a disease-maker is ill himself, he too is convinced that some one is burning his nahak, and he too sends presents to those who are supposed to be doing the mischief. "Deceivers and deceived."

While over the earth in general the fires of heathenism are waxing pale, it is remarkable that some of its customs have only recently been introduced into Tanna. Suttee, or the strangling of widows, has been imported there only a few years ago, since Mr. Turner was on the island, and it is said to be spreading. An old chief will say as he is dying, "Now, who will go with me?" and to the question (so touching, as showing the craving of the soul going out alone and naked into the void), one and another will reply, "I will." And so they are strangled and pass away together—while it is now eighteen hundred years since Jesus sent his disciples to teach all nations a hope full of immortality, and to preach himself as the resurrection and the life.

On this island of Tanna, Mr. Turner and Mr. Nisbet, with their wives, remained only seven months, when they were driven out in circumstances of great danger. First of all, the priests, or disease-makers tried to burn nahak for them. Finding this of no use, and seeing that their craft was in danger, they tried other and more violent means. A chief pretended to be sick, and got the missionaries to pray with him. Just as Mr. Turner rose, he caught the gleam of his tomahawk raised over his head and about to fall; but something restrained the arm, though they afterwards learned that it had been a regularly concerted plot. By this time dysentery had spread very rapidly among the people, which they ascribed to the missionaries; and, singularly enough, while several of their chief opposers perished of it, they and all in their immediate vicinity continued well. On one memorable morning, a great council of the natives was held close to them, in order to attack and exterminate the missionaries all at once. Only one chief had courage to stand up in their defence, and he was of inferior rank. "What harm," said he, "have the missionaries done? They are not disease-makers, they are true men of the true God. They love the whole of us, and have come here to live for our good. Give up your rage and wicked designs. Go down and get some medicine from the missionaries for your sick friends, and let us all unite in the worship and service of Jehovah, the true God. This will make us all prosperous and happy." They gnashed their teeth at him, and muttered revenge for his daring to oppose them; but the principal chief of the district declined to take an active part in the murder, and a storm of thunder and lightning dispersed the assembly. In a few days, however, the enemy came back, and declared war against the district, in their usual savage way, by beating a boy to death. The natives about the missionaries fought bravely, with Iaru at their head, "an old hero of an hundred fights, blind of an eye, close upon eighty years of age, but still erect and energetic. He remembered Cook, who visited them sixty-nine years before." Deputation after deputation came to the missionaries, wanting them to join in the war, or at least to give them a gun. "It is your war," they said. The missionaries refused. "Then you shall die." "Then," they answered, "we shall not be afraid to die." So for days they lived in the jaws of death, and when, as the only chance of escape, they tried to reach the neighbouring island of Aneiteum in an open boat, they were driven back upon the coast by an adverse sea. The war again raged nearer and nearer to them, and on the last day an attack was made in two places. Suddenly, "like life from the dead," an English ship appeared off the coast, and the missionaries, their wives and children, were snatched from the hand of death!

So Tanna, ignorant and savage, shook off the gospel, and it is yet heathen. The narrative is deeply interesting, taking place in our own time; and the tale is not yet finished. In 1845, the missionaries, making a sort of "encyclical" voyage, landed at Tanna. They found it much in the same state, but a reaction had taken place in their favour. Kuanuan, the same who had stood up, like Nicodemus, in the enraged council and defended the missionaries, was now ready to welcome them. In the midst of heathenism he had "counted the days," kept the Sabbath, and on it with about twenty others worshipped God. Mrs. Turner's old school girls came wading into the water, vying with each other for the first shake of her hand; and when she got into the house, they took their places round her and her little girl Martha. Two days before leaving, Mr. Turner sat beside the lovely village of Maro, and gave beads to the children who crowded round. Yet on that spot, only a month before, the Maro people had killed and eaten a poor fellow from an inland tribe, who had ventured to come and take a look at a vessel at anchor. Such are the mingled elements of kindness and savagery to be found in the heathen parts of our beautiful earth.

Next day, before departing (and leaving some native teachers behind him), Mr. Turner preached on the great text, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." This is the last of Tanna in the meantime; for though there are missionaries still upon it, and the gospel is preached, it is still heathen, and the gospel is not yet received.

We may afterwards attend to the results of more extended labours on the part of the same missionary, in Samoa and elsewhere in Polynesia.

HOURS WITH LIVING PREACHERS.

"SON, BE OF GOOD CHEER."

ON this point, surely, the world and the world's Saviour are already at one. Good cheer! Christ and those who have no part in Christ agree in that desire. He who has all power in heaven and in earth expressly desires for us the very thing which we all ardently desire for ourselves; shall we not, therefore, all certainly attain it? Not necessarily; there are many methods of pursuing happiness—only one of overtaking it.

Every man has his own way of seeking good cheer. Money, lands, learning, fame, food and drink, company by night or day, amusement, politics, war, and many more, have each its own admirers. But must a man abandon the use of all that now affords him good cheer the moment he becomes a Christian? No, brother; Christ our Saviour has a tender human heart. He rejoiced with them that rejoiced, and wept with them that wept. He reclined with friends and relatives at a marriage feast, and stood with sisters beside their brother's grave, his heart in either case in unison with his company,—rejoicing in that place, sorrowing in this. He takes no pleasure in depriving his creatures of any enjoyment. He gives them all good, and gives it that it may be enjoyed. But he occupies a higher standpoint than we, and commands a wider view. There was plenty of good cheer in Jerusalem when Jesus with his disciples was for the last time approaching it by the way of Bethany and Bethphage. The throng within the city were eating and drinking, buying and selling, marrying and giving in marriage, when he looked down upon them from the hill, and wept. Underneath their merriment he saw unforgiven sin, and over it the charged thunder-cloud of judgment. He could not join in their joy, because he saw that its flickering thorn-flame would soon be quenched in wrath. He wept while they laughed, not because he was against good cheer, but because he was for it.

In like manner that same Jesus looks down upon this city to-day, and sees its multitudes seeking good cheer each in his own way; but he sees beneath and beyond the mirth of fools. He sees sin on the conscience of the man, and its wages written in the book of God. His desire is that we should have good cheer, not in the revelry of a night, but through life, in the hour of departure, and when the earth and sea shall give up their dead!

In a fertile valley of northern Italy, within the Sardinian territory, on a certain sunny day of spring, groups of country people are gathering,—the young for active sport, and the old for the pleasure of looking on. A troop of horsemen bearing their own king's well-known colours, sweep swiftly across the plain, hurry off the whole multitude, and shut them up within the gloomy grey walls of a neighbouring fortress. Why should their sport be spoiled so rudely, and that, too, by their own friends? A cruel enemy was approaching like a flood, and their own watchful prince carried off his defenceless subjects to a place of safety.

In our nature and for us, Jesus has gone into the heavens. From that height he sees us down in this low place. He takes no delight in the mirth of a thoughtless multitude, while a sea of endless sorrow, held off for a time by long-suffering Omnipotence, threatens every moment to close and cover them. He loves us too truly and too deeply to let us laugh away our day of mercy with sin unpardoned lying on our souls. To heal the sorrows of a human heart, and open there a spring of unfailing joy, one thing, in our Redeemer's view, is needful, but one is enough. It is the pardon of sin. The Captain of our salvation would first carry us into the refuge, and permit us to be joyful then.

The charge, openly or covertly made against religion, that it is a disturber of the peace, is in one sense true. Christ's witnesses, representing their benignant Lord, confess frankly that his presence in the heart damps the joy of unrenewed, unforgiven man. He came not to send peace to these, but a sword; and his way is to plunge it into their joints and marrow. He spares not for their crying. But, brother, when you fall and faint, look up and see the face of Jesus bending over you; a divine compassion is beaming through. He has sought and found you, whoever you are, on whose ear this word falls to-day. He has closed with you in the same way as if there were not another sinner in the world needing his compassion. By this word now he holds you, and compels you to listen and look. Here is his offer now made to you. He desires to make you cheerful, and his way of making men cheerful is to forgive their sins. Close with his method, and he will make the result good.

But here is a man whose heart still murmurs, Religion should not make people sad. Laying aside all figures and forms,—making the word bare that through God's gracious help it may go in, I repeat,—He who is at enmity with God should not be cheerful. Pardon, PARDON is the way to peace.—Rev. W. Arnot.

"GENTLE, AND EASY TO BE ENTREATED."

THESE two features, also, of the heavenly type, may be read on the terrestrial page. This glory of the Lord shines dimly, indeed, but truly, in the life of those who have been created again in his image. Receiving out of his fulness grace for grace, Christians obtain, among other things, some of "the gentleness of Christ." Those who possess any of it long for more. They speak of virtue being its own reward; and this is eminently true of gentleness. Every one knows how pleasant it is to receive gentle treatment from another; but as of other good things generally, so especially of this, "it is more blessed to give than to receive" it.

Do not, however, expect that when you have believed, the features of Christ's likeness will come down upon you one by one, without any thought or effort on your part. This assimilation to the character of Christ which goes on "within you," gradual as the growth of a mustard-seed, and pervasive as the spread of leaven, is none other than the kingdom of God—that kingdom which suffereth violence, and which the violent take by force. Strive to enter in. Do not count that you have already attained, or are already perfect; but, forgetting the things which are behind, press on to reach this high calling which still attaches to divine wisdom when it has been transferred to the life of believing men,—gentle, and easy to be entreated.

Although the lot of men is, on the whole, much more equal than it seems, yet at certain particular points some have more to bear and do than others. Hard knots occur in some persons as in some trees, while others are constitutionally smoother in the grain. But while I willingly confess that more gnarled natures must endure more pain in the process of being made meek and gentle, I hesitate to own that, in the end, these Christians remain ordinarily more harsh and ungainly than others. On them, indeed, were high, hard places which caught on everything that came near, giving much trouble both to themselves and their neighbours; but when the whole man is brought into subjection to the law of Christ, and placed, accordingly, under the inexorable processes of the Spirit's ministry, these highest, hardest places, are first rubbed down, and become at last, perhaps, the lowest and the smoothest. I think, although it is not a uniform law, it is, notwithstanding, a common experience, to find in the new man a very low place where in the old man there was a mountain-height. "Why should it be thought impossible with you that God should raise the dead?" Why should it be thought impossible, when he undertakes to create a new world or a new man, that every valley should be exalted, and every mountain and hill should be brought low? Where the old was harsh and overbearing, the new may be gentle and easy to be entreated; where the old was timidly yielding, the new may be faithful and bold.

Beware of excusing, either to yourself or others, admitted defects of Christian meekness, by allegations of constitutional peculiarities. Rather, if the high things of nature still remain high, fear lest you be either not under grace, or not growing in it; for "if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature."—Ibid.

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

"PREPARE TO MEET THY GOD, O ISRAEL."

AMOS IV. 12.

A NEW YEAR'S SERMON FOR THE YOUNG, BY THE REV. JOHN EDMOND.*

THE verses that go before contain a sad complaint by God against the people of Israel. They describe the sins of the nation, and their refusal to be reclaimed by many corrections. God tells them, therefore, that he will soon visit them with severe judgments, and bids them prepare to meet him when he comes to punish them. The words, you see, then, are a threatening of near wrath; yet the utterance of that threatening beforehand is in much mercy. Now, God has revealed to us all a time of coming judgment—of his meeting with us to try us—and in like manner he calls on us in loving kindness to be prepared for it.

I daresay, young friends, that a meeting with God has to your mind a sound of what is awful about it. Our hearts naturally are afraid to go near to God. Why is it so? Why is a child that has disobeyed his parent in his absence afraid of that parent's return at eventide? Why does he think the afternoon hours are passing very fast away? Why is a scholar who has committed some offence against rule afraid to meet the teacher's eye? Why is a servant who has been unfaithful to his master afraid to be called to give account of his stewardship? Why is a man, hiding from the officers of justice for some crime against the law, ready to start at every knock which comes to the door of the house where he is staying? Why does a criminal in prison dread the bar, and the judge, and the assize-day? To all these questions the answer is the same. Sin leads in fear. It is this which makes us shrink from meeting the eye of God. To get quit of the misery of this fear, many strive to forget it. They plunge into business, or gaiety, or more sin. But that is madness. How would it fare with a man who tried to quench thirst by falling asleep, or drinking draughts of brine? The sleep would not moisten his parched throat, and the salt sea-wave after momentary feeling of relief would make his agony greater. The text tells us what is the path of wisdom in regard to our future meeting with God. It directs us to think of it, and prepare for it.

In talking with you further about this solemn text, I shall endeavour to show you—

I. Why we should prepare to meet God.

II. How we should prepare to meet God.

I. Why.

There are four reasons I shall give :—

1. We cannot avoid meeting him.

Sinners would fain escape meeting with God if they could. Gehazi, when he had gone after Naaman, and told him lies to get money, did not like when Elisha called him into his presence. Adam tried to get out of God's way, when he heard him walking in the garden, after the fall. But he had to come out from behind the trees, and answer God's questions.

"He summoned the guilty fugitives,
And they could not choose but go;
He asked if they had eaten the fruit,
And they durst not answer, No."

Neither can we avoid appearing before God. We cannot avoid dying. Now, death leads the soul directly to God. We must all appear also before the judgment-seat of Christ. No one will be allowed to be absent from the great gathering of the last day. The wicked would fain be still in their graves that day, if Jesus' power would let them. But no one of them all is strong enough to resist his power, and none of them all is too insignificant to be overlooked. The cry from many lips then will be, "Fall on us, ye rocks, and ye mountains, and hide us from the face of the Lamb;" but it will be of no use. There is a passage in the last chapter of this Book of Amos that very strikingly teaches how impossible it is for God's enemies to escape being brought before him. He there says: "Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down: and though they hide themselves on the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence; and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them."

2. We cannot excuse ourselves for our sins in God's presence.

Adam tried excuses. So did Eve. So we are all very apt to do. Have not you often, when challenged for a fault, felt apologies rising to your lips? Some one led you to do it, or you could not help it, or you did not intend it, or something of that sort. Now, excuses sometimes pass with men; but God sifts them. It will not be enough before God, to show that we were tempted. For the very fault is, that we did not resist. That frequent excuse, "I could not help it," will not stand in God's presence. It does not stand, indeed, before our own conscience. Did you say something like that the other day? Then you know you did not quite mean that. You meant simply that you were too indolent or careless to help it. In short, you would not. You were led away by some wrong feeling to do otherwise. All excuses come in the end to this,—it was my liking. I was too forgetful, or too bent on gratification, to say No to that. Till you can quite clear yourselves before your consciences you need not dream of putting off God with excuses. No; nor even then, for God is greater than our hearts, and knows things against us which we overlook, and sees hollowness in our excuses which we do not discover.

3. We cannot resist God's power when he will punish us for sin.

See what follows in the next verse, and say, Can you contend with Him "that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind, and declareth unto man what is his thought, that maketh the morning darkness, and treadeth upon the high places of the earth, the Lord, the God of hosts, is his name?" You remember the story of King Canute—how to prove the flattery of his courtiers he made them place his chair one day within tide-mark, as the sea was rising. Then commanding the waves to keep back, nor dare to touch the feet of royalty, he let his followers see, as the waters swelled up all the same, how powerless he was against the great King, who bade the sea ebb and flow at his pleasure. What would become of you if you were to try your arm's strength against a thunderbolt, or to rush on to meet a railway train in full career? But what are those things—sea, lightning, force of steam—to the power of the great God? In God's hand, you cannot struggle out of it. You remember how it fared with Jonah when he "rose up to flee from the presence of the Lord." I remember a good man telling me that he once saw a prisoner condemned to die; and when, after the sentence, he saw the poor man led away by the officers of justice back to the convict-cell, helpless against the might of human law, to wait his doom, he felt what an awful thing it would be to be condemned of God, and removed out of his sight.

4. We cannot, when called to meet God, sue then to get pardon.

You think, perhaps, you will cry for mercy when the judgment-day comes. And it is a blessed thing that there is abundant mercy for sinners. Nor is there a prayer God likes better to hear than that of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" But it must be presented at the proper time. The judgment-day is not for mercy, but justice. We must then be dealt with according to our works. On earth a condemned criminal is sometimes pardoned afterwards. But human administration of law, as well as human law, is imperfect; and it becomes sinful men rather to err in showing mercy than in punishing. God himself offers pardon to the condemned criminal while he is in this world. But if the offer be not accepted, then judgment takes the place of mercy, and divine pity itself tells us of no hope of pardon beyond the grave.

Surely these taken together make reasons cogent enough for obeying the word of our text. Let me now tell you—

II. How we should prepare to meet God.

In general, we are to prepare to meet God hereafter by going to him, and having a meeting now. If we seek him in Christ at present, if we go to him as our Father, we need have no fear to meet him as our Judge. He will then himself undertake and plead our case. But to help you, I will break down this general precept into several directions included in it. I would say, then—

1. Meet God, confessing your sins.

How did the prodigal son in the parable do? He said to himself, I will arise and go to my Father, and say, I have sinned; and he arose and did so. When you have done anything against the will of your parents, which is best, think you,—trying to hide the fault, or going humbly to own it? If you got a thorn in your hand, would you act wisely to let it remain and fester; or would it be better to have it taken out at once? When a little child falls and is wounded, how readily the bleeding hand or lip will be shown to the mother's eye! So it is best to go to God, and show our sin-wounds. We must not think, indeed, that if we only confess, we may go on sinning as often as we please. But when we do sin, let us go at once, and with openness and true sorrow say, Father, we have sinned. God asks us to confess our sins. And he promises if we do confess to forgive us. Here is a beautiful text to that effect, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." You recollect how Jesus teaches God's willingness to forgive in the parable of the prodigal son, when he tells us that the father, while his son "was yet a great way off, saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him." You may learn also how ready God is to forgive, on confession being made, by reading David's experience in the thirty-second Psalm. This is his account of his own case, "I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin."

2. Meet God pleading for mercy.

I have already cited the publican's prayer. You remember it fits us all. David's prayer was quite like it, when he had sinned, "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions." It is the right thing, here and now, to call for mercy. And we need have nothing to do with justice at present, except to believe it satisfied by what Jesus did and suffered. Call for mercy, believingly. Do not doubt that there is forgiveness with God. No matter how many and how bad your sins be, God is ready to blot them out. There is a text that says he delights in mercy. It gives him pleasure to show it. He would far rather spare us than strike us. You understand that you are to ask and expect mercy, for Jesus' sake. Use his name as your plea. Use him as your pleader. The mercy-seat of old was sprinkled with blood. We get mercy now by Christ's bloody cross. If you will not go to God in Christ, you cannot meet him in mercy even now. But "he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

3. Meet God, keeping up communion with him.

A man forgiven is secure against God's anger. But he is not yet ready for meeting God as he will see him on the throne and in heaven. He must be made holy too. God provides for this. The Spirit comes and cleanses the heart. He can do this very quickly. He did it very quickly in the dying thief. But he generally takes longer time. He uses means in doing it. He uses truth. He leads us to use it. You will find, children, that what we constantly think about with pleasure, we come to resemble. If it is bad, it blackens us; if good, it betters us. You will be just what your thoughts most converse about. Meet, then, with God often in your thoughts, and you will be like him. The means of meeting with God in our thoughts are prayer, praise, reading, and hearing the word. Pray as if you were near and talking with God. Read the Bible as if he were near, speaking to you. Read it as a sailor studies his chart at sea, to find out where the rocks lie, and the currents, and the shoals, that he may steer the ship safely through. When I go out to make calls in this great city, I very often study the map first to make sure of my way to the places I wish to reach. If I had got directions in a letter from a friend how to transact for him a piece of business, I would be careful, in referring to the letter, to take pains to understand it, and then to act according to what was written. When you are giving medicine to a sick friend, you are heedful to keep the physician's prescription under your eye, and to follow it. The Bible should be looked at with like practical ends in view; to find out our dangers, to discover the right way, to know our absent Saviour's will, and to be healed by its medicine for souls. When you go to church also, go to meet God. Go to hear, not the minister so much as what God will say to you by him. Those who see God oftenest, and with greatest joy in Zion below, are readiest to meet him in the Zion above.

4. Prepare to meet God, doing his will.

Prayer, reading, and coming to church are means of grace—helps to holiness. Now, the grand preparation for meeting God is being made like him. When people prepare for going to church, they wash themselves and put on clean garments. They have a good emblem in that of what prepares a soul for meeting God. When the people went out to meet Jesus on the day of his riding into Jerusalem, they carried branches of palms, and strewed his way with leaves and garments. When the queen visits distant parts of her empire, the people prepare crowns and wreaths of flowers, and archways of evergreen, and other decorations to meet her eye.

When the bridegroom was coming in ancient wedding-processions, the virgins expecting his arrival trimmed their lamps and went forth to meet him. Let us get ready to meet Jesus with sweet flowers of right feeling, and evergreens of good works, and clear lights of shining graces. Good works are of no use to get pardon, for pardon in its very nature is free. But good works prove pardon, and they prepare for the kingdom. For the kingdom is a kingdom of good working. Whatever country of the world I go to, I must, in order to be at home there, know its language and live according to its climate. It would not do to wear furs, and speak the tongue of the Greenlanders out in Dahomey or Old Calabar. So I must get the language of heaven, and have its habits learned, to be fit to go there. Being in Christ makes death safe, being near him and like him makes death happy.

All these advices come to this,—meet with God now. God himself alone can make you ready for meeting him hereafter. Do not put off. You need not seek any other hour, or any other place than the present. Prepare to meet your God. This is the voice all Scripture and Providence are raising to us. Funerals say it. Sabbaths say it. New moons say it. Winters and summers preach it. Sermons say it. Conscience says it. Oh, hear the voice and live!

THE CHILD TEACHER.

"PLEASE tell me some more about God and about Jesus."

Almost daily these words fell in childish accents upon our ears from the lips of Ella B—, a sweet little girl of seven summers, whom we had learned to love and feel much interest in. Though as lively and affectionate as any child, she never seemed so happy as when listening to the story of the cross, and never wearied in hearing us read to her or tell her of the blessed Saviour who loved little children, and of the home prepared above for all who love him.

We wondered at the uncommon interest in sacred things evinced by one so young. We knew that her parents were far from being religious people—that she had never attended the Sabbath school, and yet she loved her Saviour more than any or all of her friends. "Yes, more than my mother," she said; "and had I not ought to do so?"

Where had she learned so much of Jesus? We had been reading and talking with her when she seemed more thoughtful than usual one day, and she said to us, "I want you to read to me all there is in the Bible about God and about Jesus, and all the prayers," meaning the Psalms, "for when I go home there will be no one to read them to me."

"But," we asked, "would not your mamma read to you if you asked her?"

"I don't know as mamma has any Bible," she art-lessly replied. "I never see her read it. I am afraid she don't know about Jesus or love him, for she never talks to me about him, nor tells me how to love him and pray to him."

"But who did tell you before you came here?" we inquired.

"Only some little children who had been to Sabbath school; they told me about Jesus, and said that if we were good he would take us to heaven; and oh, I do want to be good, so that Jesus will love me and make me an angel."

Blessings on the heads of these child-teachers, the little ones who had first led that babe to Jesus! Surely a work of grace was begun in that child's heart, for we never knew one so conscientious, or so imbued with the spirit of Jesus. She was indeed a miniature Christian, an example to us all, and so eager to learn, that it was a pleasing task to direct her to Christ and help her walk with him. Children may become teachers. Speak of Jesus with your little friends and schoolmates. Above all, live like a child of Jesus, and then what lessons you may give!—Child's Paper.

THE IDOL AND THE EYED DOLL.

THERE had gone out from Manchester a missionary and his wife to those fair but miserable islands of the Pacific, the Samoan group. Children were born to them in due time, to call forth, more effectually than ever, the sympathy and affection of those in England who "held on to the rope," as Carey said. And a little missionary sewing circle was formed in Manchester to make up a box of clothing, comforts, and memorial gifts for these far off friends in the sea.

When this became known in the households, an old family servant who had spent thirty years of her life with them, and had grown in that time to be one of them, greatly desired to send some present that would be prized by the little ones, the children of the children she had nursed and loved, and followed into their willing exile with her tears and blessings. So she bought a handsome doll, one of those mysterious little constructions which open and shut their eyes on a slight hint; then she went to work upon its wardrobe with a generosity that showed her conviction that dolls at least are not liable to vanity. Morning-dresses, and walking-dresses, dinner-dresses, and ball-dresses, basques, cardinals, &c. &c., until it was necessary to provide a separate smaller box to be enclosed in the larger one, that the rich array might not be marred on the way.

While this kindly little enterprise was growing up in England, another doll had made its appearance in Samoa. Roman Catholic priests arrived there, bent, we fear, more upon defeating the Protestants than upon converting the natives to Christ. They obtained some slight foothold, and opened their wares, not the least important of which was an image of the Virgin Mary.

Doubtless its dresses were also rich, and its tresses fair; but, alas, its eyes were fixed.

The priests and this object of their worship were still under discussion, when it was noised abroad that the English people had received a box of gifts from their own country. Far and wide the tidings spread, and all sorts of people crowded thither to see these strange and beautiful things. Among other matters, the doll of course was not forgotten by the children; she was brought forth in her brilliant attire, and put upon the display of her accomplishments. The eyes silently and rapidly shut and opened, to the admiration of untutored Polynesia.

And now, unbidden by the missionaries, but prompt and clear, came this odd but very direct reasoning: "We have seen the god of the Roman Catholics, we have also seen the plaything of the English children; the plaything opens its eyes, but the eyes of the Catholic god are fixed: greater is the plaything of the Protestants than the idol of the Romanists. What must the God of the Protestants be?" And the missionaries declare that, so strong was the hold of these thoughts upon the minds of the people, that the priests could not recover their influence, but were absolutely driven from the island by the doll. The word preached by the missionary had free course, and was well listened to; and the evangelization of the people was thus signally aided by the old servant's kindly gift.

1. How narrow is the base of error, and how precarious its foothold!

2. How constantly God's servants find that they are in his hand, no less in their duties than in their history! They set out to do great things, and accomplish nothing; to do little things, and behold, great things are done.

3. God's blessing alone gives life to any means of service we employ. Let it be our business then to be faithful; it is his prerogative to be victorious.

THE PRINCE'S FOLLOWER.

LITTLE Ben Potter had been staring with sleepless eyes out of the curtainless window ever since daybreak, but he had not cared to move hand or foot. The fact is, he had gone to bed supperless the night before, and felt rather weak and faint; and as he had no very encouraging prospects for breakfast, he could not make up his mind to get up to another hungry day. So he lay very quietly watching the heavy mist curtains gradually roll away, till the sky became beautifully blue and clear, and the old elm trees waved their golden arms in the yellow autumn sunshine.

"Oh, how I wish it was real gold," sighed poor Ben, "and all those lovely leaves sailing off now and then were bright, golden dollars! Oh, how I would run out and fill my cap full, and then down to the baker's, to buy some of that beautiful white bread and butter!—

oh, we'd have butter too, and a little tea, perhaps, for dear, sick mother; but oh, dear me," sighed Benny despondingly, "they're nothing but yellow, withered leaves."

Then he shut his eyes and thought of the time when his father was alive, and they lived in such a pleasant place, and had a garden full of roses, and a beautiful brown cow. How long ago it seemed, and how long it was even since his mother had been sick, and could earn no more money by sewing. Yesterday (and Benny's cheeks were crimson) was the first day that he had ever tried to beg. There might be kind people in the world, but he didn't much believe it. At any rate, how angry all the big, well-fed cooks looked when he knocked at the kitchen doors, and sometimes they would slam them so quickly that they nearly pinched his fingers. In one kitchen, he remembered, he saw a little kitten with such a great saucer of nice, sweet milk before her. How sleek and comfortable she looked! But when he asked for something for his poor, sick mother, they gave him such hard crusts, it made his teeth ache just to think of them, and his mother could eat none at all. "Oh dear," cried Benny to himself, "I'll just die before I go begging again!"

A long sigh from the other side of the room made him start up and exclaim, "O mother, are you awake? Did you hear me! I didn't mean exactly that. It wasn't so very bad."

But Benny's mother did not answer, and he soon saw that she was only groaning in her restless sleep. He lay a few moments longer, busy with his sad thoughts, then, suddenly starting up, he exclaimed—

"I declare, if I didn't forget the prince was coming to-day, and I meant to be up with the first streak of light," and he began hastily to dress himself in his ragged clothes, talking busily to himself all the time.

"I wonder, now, why I wasn't born over the sea in a great palace, with plenty of servants to wait on me, instead of living up four pair of stairs, in this little narrow street. There, now, what a terrible hole at my knee! Oh, if mother only could mend it, but I'll just have to pin it up as well as I can. Good-bye, mother," and he gently kissed her; "I'll be back before long."

"Where are you going, Benny?" said she, rousing from her troubled sleep.

"To get some breakfast for you," said the boy cheerily, "and to see the prince. I wish you could see him too, mother."

"I think I shall see him very soon, Benny," said his mother, with a tender look in her sad, faded eyes. "Perhaps this very day."

"Oh no, mother," almost laughed Benny. "Do you think he will come through this narrow street? They wouldn't let him know there was such a mean place in the city. Now, you don't think he'd come here!"

"I shall go to him," she murmured dreamily, "dear Prince of peace," and her heavy eyes again closed.

Benny looked very grave. "How much she sleeps," he said to himself, "and she don't know what she says half the time."

His wistful eyes filled with tears, and he turned anxiously away. As he walked down the busy street, he suddenly thought of a grand plan of making his fortune. He had heard that the prince was very kind and generous, and if he could only get near enough to just tell him quickly how sick and poor his mother was, perhaps he would give him something, or, perhaps, better than all, he would make him his little servant, and hire him to follow on and hold his horses, or do something of the kind. The poor, simple child never thought how impossible it would be for such a ragged boy to be allowed to come near the great prince.

After he had the matter all arranged to his satisfaction, Benny's step grew very lively, and as the prince was not coming till afternoon, he tried to find some little job to do by which to earn breakfast for himself and mother. But no one cared to hire such a small, weak boy, and he was becoming almost discouraged, when a kind countryman gave him three large apples. One was eagerly devoured by the hungry boy, but the other two were carried home, and laid carefully by the dear, sick mother, who still slept so strangely and heavily. Then Benny spent a long time busily and painfully trying to darn the worst holes in the faded old clothes, that he might look fit to speak to the prince.

At last afternoon came, and he found himself in the greatest crowd he had ever seen. "I don't care for myself," said little Benny, as he was pushed and jostled about, "but what shall I do if my clothes get torn any more?" and he took off his cap, and for safety tucked it under his arm. But after poor Benny had so many knocks and bruises that his courage began to fail, and he only wished to be once more safe at home, suddenly the band burst forth into a most magnificent strain of music. "Oh, what are they playing?" cried Benny excitedly.

"Why, that's 'God save the Queen,' you blockhead," cried a large boy standing near.

"God save the Queen," thought Benny; "ah, how beautiful to pray in music! I'm sure God will hear that, and will save the great Queen. Oh, if somebody would only pray for my mother like that;" and Benny, with streaming eyes, said softly, "O God, save the Queen, and my dear mother too," and then he wondered if his little trembling prayer went up with the grand music.

"What are you going to do with that bunch of horrid flowers?" cried Jack White behind him suddenly.

Benny looked around. "Why, they're the very best I can find, and I'm going to give them to the Prince, and ask him to let me be his little servant while he stays."

"Hi! hi!" screamed Jack, so loudly that half a dozen of his vagabond friends gathered around in a minute. "What do you think this fellow says?" and amid shouts of jeering laughter, he disclosed Benny's plan. "Won't the Prince have a gay follower? Won't he be proud, though?"

"That's a good joke, old Patchwork," cried another, poking him in the ribs.

"My friends," continued Jack, with much politeness, "I have the honour of introducing the Duke of Rag-tag and Bob-tail."

Benny, with crimson cheeks and a breaking heart, tried hard to get away, but they held him fast, while they showered all manner of jokes upon him, and pulled at his old worn clothes till he was perfectly aghast at the unseemly rents.

There, and now, the Prince was passing by, and Benny's last chance would soon be lost for ever. He clasped his hands, and implored them to let him go.

"Oh yes," screamed Jack. "I'm afraid we are keeping his excellency. He hears his friend, the Prince, calling him. Room there for Lord Ragamuffin!"

Benny's broken-hearted sobs attracted the attention of a gentleman standing near, who exclaimed—

"You young scamps, what are you doing with that poor boy?"

The little teasing mob quickly scattered, and Benny was alone.

"Please, sir," faltered he, "has the Prince passed by?"

"Oh yes, he is quite a long way down the street."

A look of bitter disappointment swept over Benny's worn face.

"Did you want to see him so much?" said the gentleman, kindly.

Benny could not speak, and his new friend, taking him by the hand, led him out of the crowd into a quiet street, and by degrees drew from him all his sad story.

"Don't sob so, my little friend," said he, as Benny finished; "perhaps I can help you as well as the prince."

"Oh, are you very rich and great? Are you one of the prince's servants?"

"Yes," said he, smiling quietly, "I hope I am one of the Prince's servants, though not of the one who has just passed by."

"Who, then?" asked Benny, eagerly.

"Oh, a far greater Prince; one of whose kingdom there is no end."

"And will he help me?" cried Benny. "Will he let me be one of his servants too?"

"Yes, you have only to ask him, and he can do all things, for he is King of kings and Lord of lords."

"Ah," said Benny, with a look of great disappointment, "I know who you mean now. It is the Saviour Prince, and mother and I have prayed to him weeks and weeks, but he will not hear us," and Benny burst into tears.

"But," said the gentleman, kindly "I think he has heard you at last, and has sent me to help you and your poor sick mother; show me where she lives."

I have not time to tell you of Benny's extravagant joy, nor what he said to the good doctor (for such the gentleman proved to be) on the way home. When they first entered the room, his mother was so still and white that he at first thought she had really gone to see the "Saviour Prince," as she had said in the morning. But no; she was still living, and, after great care, she is now nearly restored to health. Benny has become the doctor's little errand boy, and hasn't been hungry for a fortnight.

But, best of all, Benny has asked the Prince—the great Prince—to make him one of his servants, and he studies his Bible every day, that he may learn how to follow him very closely, for he knows he is safer the nearer he is to him.

Dear little Harry, or Charlie, or Mary, or Susy, would not you, too, like to be a follower of the great Prince?—Congregationalist.

A WINTER STORY.

ONE cold December evening a family group assembled after dinner in their usual sitting-room. The fire, owing to some neglect of a servant, had been allowed to go out, and was but newly rekindled; the windows had been opened on account of smoke, and the room had rather a chill, comfortless feeling. The young people, one after another, gave way to various expressions of grumbling, and bitter complaints of the cold.

Mrs. Ellis quietly wrapped herself in a shawl, and took her work. Mr. Ellis lighted the gas, rubbed his hands, and sat down to a book.

"Do not poke the fire, Fanny; you will do more harm than good."

"O mamma, will these coals never light! how dreadfully cold it is!"

"Why are you not giving us some music, Ann, as usual?"

"Papa, how can I? my fingers are frozen."

"George, why are you not going to your drawing?"

"Who could hold a pencil, papa, in cold like this?"

"My dear children," said the father gravely, "you really do not know what you are saying. You have no idea what real cold and frozen fingers mean. What is the thermometer just now?"

"Twenty, papa, twelve degrees below the freezing point!"

"What would you think of more, far more degrees than twelve, not below the freezing point, but below zero itself?"

"That must be in the Arctic regions. Surely man could not live in such a place."

"Men have lived, and toiled, and nobly suffered there, for the sake of God or their fellows. If you would read but a few pages of the book I am now busy with, you would be quite ashamed of your conduct at this moment."

"Papa," said a younger boy, "will you tell us a story till the room gets warm?"

"Yes, Harry, you deserve it, for you are the only one who has made no complaints of the cold just now."

"Nor I, papa," said the youngest girl; "I only shivered a little, and crept beside mamma on the sofa."

"Very well, come beside me now, and I shall tell you a real winter story, out of the book I am reading. You all know about Sir John Franklin, and how he and his men were lost in the Arctic regions?"

"Oh yes, papa, you read a good deal of us out of Captain M'Clintock's book."

"Before Captain M'Clintock discovered the real truth of that sad story, various other attempts had been made to find it out, and some crews were very nearly lost themselves in seeking to rescue Franklin. I am reading now the account of one of these expeditions, led by a good and brave man, Dr. Kane, from America. He had made a voyage for this object before, and been obliged to return without success; but in 1853 he set out again, in a small brig, with eighteen bold strong men, who volunteered to accompany him. The long winter came upon them before they had gone so far as they hoped to have done, and the ship was fast frozen up in a bay called Rensselaer Harbour. See, here is a drawing of it, with the sad words below—'The same ice is round her still.'"

"Did they never get out, papa?"

"The ship never did, and never will. But you must read the whole story, George, for yourself. I shall only tell you now one of the many terrible dangers from which God delivered the voyagers, by his blessing upon the leader's fortitude and energy:—

"They got through the dark months tolerably well, and as soon as daylight returned began to explore the land, as they had been doing before the darkness came on, in sledges drawn either by men or Esquimaux dogs. Towards the end of March a party of eight men went off on an exploring expedition, with a sledge which they were to draw themselves, carrying a tent, provisions, &c. The weather just then became intensely cold. Eleven days passed, and there was no appearance of their return. Late one night, while those on board ship were busy at work in the cabin, steps were heard on the deck above, and then three of the absent party entered. The first glance at their swollen, haggard faces told a fearful tale, which they were hardly able to give in words. They had left their five comrades on the ice, four of them unable to move. Where? They could not tell—somewhere to the south and east. They had evidently come a long way, and were so completely exhausted, that it was difficult to get them to speak at all.

"Dr. Kane saw in a moment that the only hope of being able to save the lost ones was by setting off with a reserve party at once. He chose nine to accompany him. He made them prepare the lightest, smallest sledge they had, and putting Mr. Ohlsen, the one of the three returned travellers who was most alive, into a bag of fur, they strapped him on the sledge, hoping he might serve as a guide. The thermometer was then forty-six degrees below zero, that is sixty-six degrees colder than to-night, when you, George and Ann, speak of not being able to play or draw in a room with a poor fire.

"They walked on without stopping for sixteen hours, and then felt they were losing their way. Poor Ohlsen had fallen asleep as soon as they began to move, and now, when he awoke, it was evident his mind was affected; he could remember nothing, and could not help them. As he was, however, able to walk, Dr. Kane gave orders to drop the sledge, raise the tent, and bury under ice, for fear of bears, all their provisions, except a small allowance for each person to carry. Only quick motion could keep them from being frozen, so they moved on, looking around for any traces of their friends. The strongest among them was now in danger of breaking down,—Kane himself fainted twice, in spite of all his efforts to bear up. They could not even melt any ice to quench their thirst, and the snow, when they tried to swallow it, made their mouths bleed as if it had burnt them.

"They were ordered to keep as far separate as possible, to give more chances of making discoveries. They had gone on for eighteen hours, without food or water, when one of the party thought he found something like the track of a sledge, half covered with drifted snow. With trembling hope they tried to follow it out; it led them on,—then they saw the appearance of footmarks, and at length—oh, joyful sight!—a small flag was seen fluttering in the distance. It was from the pole of a tent almost buried in the drift. They had found their poor brethren at last, after a march of twenty-one hours.

"The men stood silently around, and signified that Dr. Kane should be the first to enter. As he crawled into the darkness, there came a burst of 'welcome from the poor sufferers within—'Doctor, we were expecting you, we were sure you would come!' Then, at the sound of their feeble voices, arose a loud cheer outside, and the brave leader was overcome, and wept tears of joy.

"But that was but for a moment,—there was time now for nothing but action. The terrible journey back was before them, and the thermometer stood seventy-five degrees below freezing. The tent could hold barely eight persons, while there were now fifteen in all. Half of the party took by turns two hours' sleep, and the others kept themselves alive by rapid motion and exertion. They made the sledge into a sort of litter, laying the tent flat upon it, and sewing up the limbs of the sick men in soft skins, covered them with furs and blankets, and fastened them down, leaving only an opening opposite their mouths for breathing. It was four hours before everything could be got ready. Then they all gathered round the sledge, commended themselves in prayer to the mercy of God, and set out on the retreat.

"It was terribly difficult to draw the heavy sledge safely over the rough ice, but all worked bravely, and even poor Mr. Ohlsen was now able to take his turn. They got on wonderfully for some hours, and Dr. Kane hoped they would soon arrive at the half-way place where they had left a tent the day before. But it was still nine miles off, when the whole party seemed suddenly to become completely overpowered, one by one falling on the snow in that fatal sleep, from which, if not aroused, there would be no waking on earth. 'They did not feel the cold now,' they said; 'all they wanted was leave to sleep.' The commander saw that a halt must be made. With great difficulty they got the tent, which they had brought with them, raised, but their frozen hands were incapable of lighting a fire. They crowded as many as possible into the shelter, and then Kane pressed forwards with a single companion, in hopes of being able to reach the next refuge, and get some food and water ready before the rest should follow.

"How they got over these nine miles he could hardly tell, but it was a time of terrible suffering. They kept themselves awake by continually speaking, at least repeating words aloud. They were scarcely in their senses, and went on like men in a dream. Both recollected afterwards having seen a bear walking before them, and when they came to the tent it was overturned. They raised it again with great difficulty, crept into their sleeping bags, and fell asleep at once. When Kane awoke, at the end of three hours, his beard was fast frozen to the covering, as a mass of ice, and his companion had to cut him out with a knife.

"They got some ice melted and food warmed before the arrival of the others, who came up wonderfully restored by a rest of five hours, and as soon as possible, after taking the refreshment, all set out again. The way through the hills of ice was now terribly rough, and had not the sun mercifully shone, and the thermometer risen to four degrees below zero, none could have survived to reach the end of that dreadful journey."

"And did they all get to the ship alive?"

"They did, but by that time they were delirious, as if in a fever. All were very ill afterwards, and in spite of every care two died. The rescue party had been out for seventy-two hours, that is, fully three days and nights, and in all that time only got water twice, and halted for eight hours, half sleeping and the others walking about by turns. It seems little short of a miracle that they got through it in life."

The young people had listened with deep interest, and now gave expression to feelings of sympathy and admiration.

"Yes," said Mr. Ellis, "it is a remarkable story,—a noble example of what hardy and resolute men can do and endure by the help of God. Let us learn useful lessons from it. See the wonderful Providence of our God, preserving them in such dangers, strengthening them for such efforts, guiding them in perplexity, allowing them to reach the lost men in time to save them, and then all together to regain the vessel, when an hour or two more in either case would have been too late. But learn also, that while we trust to Providence, and look up to the Lord for blessing all our endeavours in any time of trouble, we must use every reasonable means for our own relief. So we find Jacob, David, and other saints in Scripture acting, and so acted the brave men of whom I have been speaking. They prayed, I doubt not, but they also laboured, powerfully and vigorously. And observe how they obeyed too. Their commander was well worthy of confidence, and they followed his directions without questioning or hesitation, though often with pain and difficulty. The wisdom which God gave him, and their steady obedience to his orders, saved them all."

The fire was now burning brightly, but George and Ann seemed ashamed to go near it.

"Come, my children," said their father, drawing forward his own chair, "let us thankfully enjoy the mercies our heavenly Father has provided for us. I think you will not complain again when obliged for half an hour to bear a little discomfort. None of you, I trust, are likely ever to be exposed to sufferings such as I have described; but the only way to be able to face manfully such lesser hardships as we may all expect to meet with, is to begin early, when opportunity occurs, to practise endurance and self-denial."

THINKING.

"I WILL think of it." This is easy to say and simple to do; but do you know, little ones, what great things come of just thinking?

And yet thought itself, though very mighty, is nothing we can see or smell, hear, taste, or feel.

A boy named James Watt sat quietly by the fire one evening, doing nothing but watch the tea-kettle lid "dance," as it was moved up and down by the steam from the boiling water. He didn't say anything, but he was thinking how much power there must be in steam if it could move the heavy lid.

He kept thinking about it, and years and years after, when he was a man, he made very important improvements on the steam-engine, that can do as much work as a great many horses, just by the steam of boiling water moving wheels and rods that move machinery in their turn. So when you see steam mills, steam-boats, and railroad cars, you may remember that they never would have been built if it had not been for thinking.

When a man is lying awake some night very quiet, would you believe he can be doing what may change the life of a million people? But he may be planning some terrible battle that will bring sorrow into a multitude of homes, and change the fate of a whole nation. You have heard of Napoleon, who was such a great soldier?

About the time Napoleon was thinking of the glory he would get to himself and the French people, and planning long marches and bloody victories, there was a man living in Gloucester, England, who was thinking just as earnestly, but of something very different. He was a good man, and believed that we should work for the glory of God and the best good of men, and so he was thinking what he could do to prevent the little children who lived in Gloucester from taking God's holy name in vain, from breaking the Sabbath, and from stealing. Some of them had wicked fathers and mothers, who did these wicked things themselves, and there was no one to teach the children any better.

One Sabbath day Mr. Raikes had occasion to go to a part of the city where was a large pin factory, and a great many people who worked there lived near it. He was shocked and grieved to see the swarms of dirty children in the streets, who were playing rough games, fighting, and swearing. He heard that the farmers who lived a little out of town were obliged to stay at home to watch their fruit-trees on Sundays. They said they had more trouble by thieves on that day than on any other.

Finally, Mr. Raikes thought if he could get these poor little degraded, ignorant ones into a school on Sundays, they would be kept from mischief, and taught something which might make them good men and women. It was very hard work, but he succeeded; and other people, seeing what a good and blessed thing it was, started other Sunday schools, till now, a hundred years after, there is one connected with almost every church in both Great Britain and America. So you see what Mr. Raikes brought about by thinking.

Every person does not have such wonderful and powerful thoughts, but we are all thinking continually, and our thoughts are what make our actions. If we allow evil ones, they will make our lives evil; and pure, happy thoughts, will make pure, happy lives. The best, indeed the only way, to have good thoughts in our hearts is to have the Holy Spirit there. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Is the Holy Spirit in your heart, my young reader? "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." And if not his—whose?

CHARLIE, AND THE ROBIN'S SONG.

ONE summer morning early,
When the dew was bright to see,
Our dark-eyed little Charlie
Stood by his mother's knee.
And he heard a robin singing
In a tree so tall and high,
On the topmost bough 'twas swinging,
Away up in the sky.

"Mamma, the robin's praying,
In the very tree-top there;
Glory! Glory! it is saying,
And that is all its prayer.
But God will surely hear him,
And the angels standing by,
For God is very near him,
Away up in the sky."

"My child! God is no nearer
To robin on the tree,
And does not hear him clearer
Than he does you and me.
For he hears the angels harping
In sun-bright glory drest,
And the little birdlings chirping Down in their leafy nest."

"Mamma, if you should hide me
Away down in the dark,
And leave no lamp beside me,
Would God then have to bark?
And if I whisper lowly,
All covered in my bed,
Do you think that Jesus holy
Would know what 'twas I said?"

"My darling little lisper,
God's light is never dim;
The very lowest whisper
Is always close to him.

Now, the robin's song was filling
The child's soul full of bliss;
The very air was trilling
When his mamma told him this.
And he wished, in childish craving,
For the robin's wings to fly,
To sing on tree-tops waving,
So very near the sky.

Child at Home.

A LESSON FROM A CHILD.

"It is too bad," exclaimed young Emily Grant one Sabbath morning as she sprang from her bed; "another rainy Sunday! I wonder what's the use of having a new silk dress, if one can never wear it; and the water spots mine dreadfully."

It was with a very petulant, discontented look that Emily moved about the room performing her toilet, and it had not left her face even when she rose from her hasty devotions. It seemed to her that she had nothing to be thankful for; everything went wrong; the muffins were burned at breakfast, and even her little brother, when he put his arms around her neck, crumpled her clean collar.

So it was with a spirit as dark and unpleasant as the weather itself, that Emily at length set out for church. In spite of the threatening clouds, she had suffered a momentary gleam of sunshine to beguile her into wearing the new dress; and as she walked along, holding it carefully up from the muddy side-walk, her thoughts were much more intent upon preserving it from contact with the wet, than preparing her spirit to render fit service in the temple of God.

As though to set the climax to her ill-humour, just as she was within sight of the church, but too far off to save the dress, the black clouds rifted, and down came a pelting shower of heavy drops, every one of which left a dark and wrinkled spot upon the delicate silk. Poor Emily's eyes filled with tears of vexation, and she drew her veil hastily over her unlovely-looking face as she entered the door of the church, and went into her father's pew.

There she sat, silent, and thinking rebelliously that she was the most unfortunate girl in the world; everything happened to annoy her, and she did not see what it was she had to be thankful for. Of course she did not hear much of the solemn opening prayer; and when the congregation rose to sing, Emily's usually tuneful voice was silent; she had no heart to join in songs of praise. As she stood with her eyes bent sullenly upon her open book, there came to her ear, clear and distinct through the volume of sound that filled the church, the sweet tones of a child's voice, ringing out full and earnest, as though she were indeed singing with the spirit and the understanding: "Oh, go your way into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise; be thankful unto him, and bless his name."

The chant was familiar enough, but it had a new meaning now to Emily; it came with the voice of rebuke to her repining mood, and she turned to look at the singer whose clear tones rang out the reproving words so plainly to her ear. It was a little girl with a pale, meagre face, and scanty garments, that proved her to be one of the poor of the earth; yet her face was lighted up with an almost angelic devotion, and it was plain to see that she felt that she had cause to be thankful.

"Thanksgiving—praise," thought the conscience-smitten Emily; "if that poor little creature's heart is full of these, how ought it to be with mine? I have every comfort and am tenderly cared for; and yet my heart is filled instead with vanity, and fretfulness, and ingratitude."

Emily's eyes again filled with tears; but they were those of shame and sorrow. She knelt reverently as the minister's solemn voice called to prayer, and an earnest supplication rose from the very depths of her heart for pardon, and for grace to take this child's lesson to heart, which had taught her that the "garment of praise" was a more fitting preparation for the house of God than a robe of new and shining silk.

THE LENT HALF-CROWN.

WHEN Charlie Leason was about ten years old, a bright half-crown was given him by his grandfather, to buy anything he pleased for his New-year's present. The boy's mother had that morning taught him the verse, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again," and told him the old story of the good man, who, asking a friend for a little money for a poor man, offered him good security for its repayment—thereafter explaining what he meant by quoting this text. The words were running in the boy's mind while on his way to the store to purchase a toy which he had seen in the window of the shop on the previous day.

Just before Charlie reached the store, he met a poor woman who had sometimes washed for his mother, and she seemed to be in great distress.

"What's the matter, Hannah?" said the kind-hearted child.

"O Master Charlie, I've got to be turned into the street this cold morning, and my little Bill so sick too."

"Turned into the street, you and Bill! What for?"

"Because I can't raise my weekly rent. I've just been to see my landlord, and he says it's three days overdue, and he'll not wait another hour. There go the men now to put my bed, and grate, and few things on the side-walk. Oh, what will I do?"

"How much is your rent, Hannah?" asked the boy, with a choking voice.

"It's half-a-crown," said the woman. "It will kill Bill to be put out in this cold, and sure I will die with him."

"No, you won't; no, you shan't," said the tender-hearted child; and feeling in his pocket, he brought forth his treasured half-crown, and placed it quickly in her hand. Seeing she hesitated to keep it, notwithstanding her great need, Charlie told her it was all his own to spend as he pleased, and that he had rather give it to her than have the nicest toy in the store. Then walking away swiftly from the shop windows, which were all full of tempting New-year's presents, he went bravely home to his mother, sure of her approbation.

The first person he met was his grandfather. He had observed Charlie go down the street, and was waiting for his return, that he might see what he had bought. So his first salutation was, "Well, child, what have you done with your money?"

Now, Charlie's grandfather was not a religious man; and the boy knew that, though he sometimes gave money to his relations, he seldom or never bestowed it upon the poor; so he rather disliked to tell him what he had done with his money; but while he hesitated, the verse which he had that morning learned, and the story his mother had told him, came into his mind and helped him to an answer. Looking pleasantly into his grandfather's face, he said, "I've lent it, sir."

"Lent your half-crown, foolish boy? You'll never get it again, I know."

"Oh yes, I shall, grandpa, for I've got a promise to pay."

"You mean a note, I s'pose; but it isn't worth a penny."

"Oh yes, grandpa, it's perfectly good. I am sure about it, for it is in the Bible."

"You mean you've put it there for safe-keeping, eh? Let me see it."

Charlie brought the book and showed him the verse: "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again."

"So you gave your money to some poor scamp. Well, you'll never see it again. Who's got it, pray?"

"I gave it to Hannah Green, sir;" and Charlie told him her sad story.

"Oh, nonsense!" said his grandfather, "you can't pay poor folks' rent; it's all nonsense. And now you've lost your New-year's present, or will, if I don't make it up to you. Here," he added, as he threw him another half-crown, "seeing your money's gone where you never will get it again, I must give you some more, I s'pose."

"Oh, thank you," said Charlie heartily. "I knew the Lord would pay me again, grandpa, because the Bible says so; but I didn't expect to get it so quick."

"That boy's too much for me," said the old gentleman; and he walked quickly away.—Child's Paper.

THE TWO BEARS.

THERE was a great outcry in the nursery, which much disturbed Uncle James reading his morning paper. "Those children are always at it," muttered Uncle James, knitting his shaggy eyebrows, and looking perhaps not so cross as worried. In fact, he was not used to children, and therefore their little squabbles and differences troubled him. He forgot that little brooks did not always run smooth; they would dash and splash over the pebbles. By-and-by, as the noise did not hush, Uncle James threw down his paper and rushed up stairs. "Children," he cried, "do you know there must be a couple of bears in this nursery!"

"No, there a'n't," said they, each at a surprised stand still; "no bears here."

"I say there must be," cried Uncle James with determination; "I shall have a couple of bears put in here, chained in."

Little Emily bobbed down behind the bed, Maurice got into the closet, Johnie held tighter to his whip; but George stood up with a protecting look, as much as to say, "I'll guard the flock, sir." Uncle James faced the children and the children faced Uncle James. For a moment or two no word was spoken; the nursery was never stiller. Perhaps the children were thinking of the pains of being crouched, for Maurice asked in a little frightened voice from the closet, "Bears to eat us up, uncle?"

"I hope they will eat you-up," said Uncle James, "every one of you."—This savage wish was almost too much for them.

"I'll tell mother," said Emily, turning quite pale and almost ready to cry.

"I'll whip the bears off," cried Johnie, rallying his courage, and snapping his whip.

"Is that the way you would treat your children, uncle?" asked George; "the Bible says you must do as you would be done by."

"Yes," persisted Uncle James, "I shall always keep two bears in my nursery." Uncle James did not then know, as he had no nursery, how much more easily this was said than done. "Two bears—two bears, boys; two bears, girls!" he repeated. "'Bear and for-bear,' these are their names," he added, smiling.

Ah, those good, gracious bears, that eat you up with kindness! Happy is the nursery which has them.

THE OLD BRIDGE.*

SOME time ago I was living in the country. One day I was out walking. I came to a deep, dark river, rushing rapidly down from the mountains to the sea. I could see, far below, the great, deep, black pools, with huge lumps of rock, all broken, and jagged, and worn into fantastic shapes and smooth round edges, by the rush of the water. There were high steep banks on both sides, —so steep that you could neither clamber down the one side nor up the other. The only way to get across was by a rude and rustic bridge, that was made of two round logs with narrow strips of wood nailed across them. The logs were all rotten-looking; many of the little strips of wood had fallen off, and here and there large rusty nails stuck out in places where the wood had rotted off and dropped away. This was the only bridge; and I did not like the look of it. When I stamped on it with my foot, it swayed to and fro, and cracked in a very ugly manner. I thought with myself, if I go over on that bridge it may break with me; and I am sure that if I fall down into that torrent, among these rocks, I shall never rise alive till the resurrection.

While I was standing deliberating, I saw a stout countryman at work in a meadow, over on the other side. I cried out to him, and asked him whether he had ever crossed that bridge? "Oh yes, sir," said he, "very often: I came across it a little while ago; it's all right." I said, "May I trust to it?" "Oh yes," said the man; "it's all right enough, you may safely trust to it." Looking at the man, I saw that he was much stouter and heavier-looking than I, and so I thought, If this bridge could bear you, it will also bear me; and then over I went, trusting to the bridge, and reached the other side in peace and safety.

Now, do you understand what trusting is? I trusted three ways in that case, and was not deceived in any of them. First I trusted the honest countryman. I thought he looked a decent, truthful sort of man; and so, when he told me that he had gone over that bridge a short while ago, I believed him, I trusted his word. You know he might have lied to me: he might have said he went over that bridge, though he did not; and I might have trusted his word and been drowned. But he had no reason for deceiving me; and I thought, by his look, that he was a truthful man, so I put trust in his word, and was not deceived.

Second, I trusted my own opinion. I thought the man looked heavier than I. I argued that if the rotten bridge could bear his weight, it would bear mine. I might have been deceived here again. It was quite possible that I was heavier than the man; and if I had been much heavier, the bridge that bore him might not have borne me: but I trusted to my own judgment, and was not deceived—the bridge did bear me.

And third, I trusted to the rotten-looking bridge. I had good grounds for doing so, and I did so. I put my whole weight upon it. I had no other support whatever. If that bridge had broken down, I should most certainly have fallen into the river below, and been dashed to pieces on the hard ragged rocks. But I trusted the bridge, and it bore me safely, and all was well.

You have these three things to trust to, also, when trusting in God:—You have first to trust the word of another; but that other is the Son of God himself. If you ask him whether he is both able and willing to save you, he will tell you that he is both able and willing. He will tell you that he is able and willing to save unto the uttermost all that come to God through him. None that trust in him are ever put to shame. He cannot lie. He is not only true, but the Truth. You need have no difficulty in trusting to his good word. O Lord God of hosts, blessed is the man, and blessed, above all, is the little child, that putteth his trust in thee.

Second, The Lord Jesus has saved many others. You have to trust to this, that he has saved sinners as great as you. And though your sins be very great, never fear that he has not saved sinners greater than you. He saved Paul, who persecuted his Church, helped the men who stoned God's first martyr to death, and dragged men and women bound to prison, because they loved Jesus. He cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalene, and saved her. He saved a thief who was condemned to be crucified. He has saved many that were guilty of all the very worst sins—sins so bad that you hardly know anything about them. So you may safely trust to him.

Third, But will the bridge bear you? Ah, you may safely trust to it. The Lord Jesus Christ himself is the bridge. He says, "I am the way; I am the door; I am the Jacob's ladder from earth to heaven." He is mighty to save. He is strong. It was he that made this earth, and spun it round, and sent it whirling into space just as easily as you would spin a top. It is his hand that holds the moon and all the stars in their places by night, and the sun all day. He has all power in heaven and on earth. He overcame the Devil; he grasped Death by the throat, and overcame him too. Jesus is able to save unto the uttermost all that come unto God by him.

Now, further, I had no great need to cross that old bridge. I could have remained on the side where I was. I might have sat still in peace, and looked down on that river boiling below. But you cannot sit still where you are. To do so is to die. You are on the wrong side: you must cross.

Here, where you are, if you are not born again, there are wild beasts to tear and destroy you. You must cross, or die.

That man, as I said, might have deceived me; but God cannot deceive you. You may put most perfect trust in all that he says to you; and he bids you flee for your life, and do it now.

I might have cheated myself, and been lost, by thinking that the man was heavier than I; but you cannot be wrong. Jesus says, "Whosoever will, let him come; and him that cometh I will in no wise cast out." And, he says, in special, "Suffer the little children to come:" I will by no means cast them out. Jesus loves to carry the little children over in safety. The good Shepherd carries the lambs in his arms. Trust with all your might, and lean on him with your whole weight: you need fear no evil.

Besides all this, I had at the last to trust to a rotten bridge. It was very rotten, and very narrow. It looked very fearful indeed. If you had seen it, it would have made you tremble. But you have to trust to one who is able and mighty. The Lord Jesus is the living one. He never grows old. He is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.

I got but little by crossing that old bridge. But you get God, and heaven, and glory. You get the sweet song of the angels, the white robes, and the golden crown, and the green palm of the saints. You get all that is glorious in heaven, and you avoid all that is dark and terrible in hell. You go from death to life; you go from the bottom of the cold dark grave to the green earth and glorious sunshine: you go from hell to heaven; from the devil to Jesus Christ; from all evil to all good. And that is a journey you cannot begin too soon: you ought to start now, if you have not begun it already; if you have already begun, then you must hold fast the beginning of your confidence steadfast to the end.

You must trust all to Jesus. You must not do a little to save yourself, and expect him to do the rest. All that you do is a hindrance rather than a help. Let me try to make this plain to you.

A little boy falls into the water, and is in danger of being drowned. If he throw himself on his back, lie perfectly still, and trust himself to the water, he will float, and so be saved. But if he struggle, and cry, and try to save himself by his own efforts, he sinks, and is drowned.

Or better still. While the little boy is in the water, and near the point of death, a strong swimmer strikes out to him, and lays hold of him. If the little boy lays hold of the man in return, and simply keeps hold, then it is easy for the man to swim to the shore with him; but if the boy will try to save himself, it becomes very difficult indeed, and often quite impossible to save him. He does most to save himself when he trusts to the strong one who is saving him. And when he clings very close, and lies very still on the back of the strong swimmer, then they come to the safe shore very speedily together.

Do you now understand what it is to trust in the Lord Jesus? It is to lean your whole weight upon him—to leave the whole guidance of your salvation to him. You are to do work, but not for the purpose of saving yourself; all that you do is to show that you are saved, and to show forth the praise of that God who has saved you.

LONG RACE FOR A BOOK.

Nor many years ago, a Sabbath-school teacher in a remote district met a number of children playing by the roadside. He was much interested in their replies to his questions, and as he left them he handed to each a tract.

After following a lonely path for nearly two miles, he heard approaching footsteps, and, turning round, found that he had been followed by a little boy, who had run all that distance to beg a tract for his mother.

"Can you read?" asked the missionary.

"No, sir, but my mother can."

"Will you carry these home, and try to remember what is in them, and pray God to make you a good and useful child?"

"Yes, sir; and I shall never forget your kindness."

The teacher, after giving his little friend some timely words of counsel, went on, and the boy retraced his steps till he had joined his companions, holding up to their delighted gaze a couple of illustrated tracts, which he said the religion man had given him.

The "good seed" sown by a trusting hand brought forth precious fruit. The contents of those simple pages so moved that mother's heart that she earnestly sought the Good Shepherd, and found in him peace and pardon. She now rests from her labours, and her released spirit doubtless rejoices in the realms of light; while her son is preparing to be a guide to the wanderer, and a light to them who sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

STEADFAST IN PRAYER.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"They continued steadfastly . . . in prayer."—ACTS II. 42.

THE water is purest among the mountains where it gushes cold from the rock, or bubbles up at the mossy spring—the nearer to the fountain the clearer is the stream. By every mile it rolls that grows in volume, till the streamlet which a child could leap, has swollen into a broad river, on whose bosom, as it nears the sea, fishermen shoot their nets, and the ships of nations ride. But what it has acquired in depth and breadth it has lost in purity—growing the muddier the further it goes. How like to what happens with Churches;—the larger they have become, usually becoming more loose in doctrine, more lax in discipline. With an increase of numbers, how often they present an increase of corruptions! So that if we would find the purest days of many a sect, we must turn our steps back to the period of its rise.

In some respects this is true even of the Christian Church. When young in years and small in numbers, what love, unity, purity, and peace dwelt within her walls! Since then how have they been shaken by the violence, and filled with the din of controversies? Here one sect carrying on fierce war against another, and there contending parties within the same body, more like wolves than sheep, worrying, "biting, and devouring" one another. Had an inhabitant of another sphere lighted on this one to see the Church rent into jealous, envious, scowling, angry factions, that, instead of presenting one bold front to a common enemy, were burying their swords in each other's bosoms, how difficult it had been for him to believe that these, the subjects of one King, had a common faith, a common cross, a common Bible, a common hope, a common heaven; and that the choicest title of their common Sovereign was not the god of war, but the Prince of Peace. Can we contrast what she is now and has for long ages been with her happy state, when the heathen said, See how these Christians love one another, without being ready to cry, How are the mighty fallen; the weapons of war how are they perished!—How is the gold become dim, how is the most fine gold changed?

It was not always so. What a picture of Christian unity, love, self-denial, mutual affection, noble devotedness to each other's welfare, and to the great interests of Messiah's kingdom, in the verses that follow the text; in that community of goods, which politicians have often dreamed of,—aimed at, but Christians only have ever attained to! In those days the Church was one large, loving family, into whose common treasury each member brought his wealth and wages. Nobody was immensely rich; nobody was miserably poor. Riches and rags, splendour and squalidness, did not stand in incongruous conjunction; worship, as I have seen these, under the same roof, or sit at one communion-table. As all the rivers of earth pour their waters into one sea, and all the roots of a tree convey their nourishment to one stem, and all the veins of the body empty themselves into one heart, from which the tide of blood, borne along the bounding arteries, is sent forth again to be distributed to every member according to its needs—so was it with the Church, the body of Christ. What states have been in name, it was in truth—a commonwealth; the only instance of one the world ever saw. The people lived for Christ. They regarded their possessions as his, not theirs; they judged that as a man, when he buys land, buys all—the trees that grow on its surface, and the minerals that lie beneath it—so, when Christ bought them with his blood, he bought all that belonged to them; and they felt that if Christ gave his life for the poorest saints, they could not do less than share meals and money with them. See what we are told: "They who believed were together, and had all things in common, and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need."

There was no command laid on them to do so; there is no command lies on us to imitate their example. Such a practice, indeed, would now be as undesirable as it is impracticable. Still, though theirs were peculiar circumstances, how ought their conduct—the spirit of their example, and, to adduce a still higher authority, that of Christ, who, with his disciples, had a common purse—to call forth our charity to the poor saints, that we may fill the scantiness of their cup with the overflowings of our own.

There is, however, one marked feature of that early Church recorded in these verses, which we are safe in copying, and are called to copy. In that they set us an example that we should follow their steps. If we would grow the same fruit—a crop as fine in quality and as abundant in quantity, we must apply the same culture to ground or tree. I have seen two plants beneath the glass of a conservatory: this was a mass of flowers, dazzling the eye with their beauty, and filling the whole house with their perfume; while that, fruitless and flowerless, hung its drooping leaves, and seemed pining into death under a deep decline. Both stood in the same soil, enjoyed the same heat, and had been taken from the same parent stem. Whence the difference? The cause of it was not obscure or remote. This had been often, but that, somehow neglected, had been seen seldom watered. Now what water is to thirsty plants, prayer is to the graces of a man or Church. Do we admire, wonder, stand astonished at the love, unity, peace, purity, fruitfulness of the first Christians? The riddle is read, the mystery solved, in these words, "They continued steadfast in prayers."

I. Their employment—prayer.

A refuge in trouble, strength in weakness, armour in battle, our comfort in sorrow, guide in darkness, the wings by which we fly to God, our ladder to climb the skies, prayer is the first sign of conversion. It is the birth-cry of a soul,—like the cry of the new-born, by which the mother knows her child is alive. The dying thief—for where may not a soul be born again?—was converted on the cross; and the first intimation the world had that he who but an hour ago was mocking our dying Lord had become another man, was to see him turning round on the nails to cry, "Lord, remember me when thou comest to thy kingdom." The jailor—nor is he the only man born again there—was converted in the prison; and the first intimation Paul and Silas had of the change was when he cast away his sword, and, calling for a light, sprang into the dungeon, to fall on his knees, and cry, Sirs, what shall I do to be saved! Paul himself, like some vagrant's child, was born on the public road, struck down, converted on his way to Damascus; and the change was announced to Ananias in these words, "Behold, he prayeth." Prayeth! and it is of such prayers I speak, of course—true prayers—not those of the lip, but of the heart; for no arrows reach yonder sky but prayers shot from heart-strings, when, like a strong bow, the soul, not merely the knee, is bent. A man may say his prayers—say them from lisping infancy to mumbling age, from the cradle to the coffin, yet never once have prayed.

The first true sign of spiritual life, prayer is also the means of maintaining it. A man can as well live physically without breathing, as live spiritually without prayer. There is a class of animals neither fish nor sea-fowl, that inhabit the deep. It is their home; they never leave it for the shore; yet, though swimming beneath its waves and sounding its darkest depths, they have ever and anon to rise to the surface that they may breathe the air. Without that these monarchs of the deep could not live in the dense element in which they move, and have their being. And something like what they do through a physical necessity, the Christian has to do by a spiritual one. It is by ever and anon ascending to God, by soaring up in prayer into a loftier, purer region for supplies of grace, that he maintains his spiritual life. Prevent these animals from rising to the surface, and they die for want of breath; prevent him from rising to God, and he dies for want of prayer. Give me children, cried the woman, else I die; Let me breathe, says a man gasping, else I die; Let me pray, says the Christian, else I die.

"Now," writes Paul, "abideth faith, hope, charity, but the greatest of these is charity;" and the fair crown he puts on charity, we may place on the bent head of prayer. Among all the means of grace—sermons, sacraments, Sabbaths, providences, God's word, either read or preached—the greatest of these is prayer. Nor men, nor devils can shut its gates. When every other avenue to God is closed, these stand open—day and night continually. Persecution may drive us from the house of God; the voice of preachers may be silenced in the storm; we may be excluded from the communion table; the Bible, plucked from our hands, may be burned to ashes in Popish flames; all this has happened, and may happen again. These avenues man may close—not this, the door of prayer. The martyr found it open in his lonely dungeon; Daniel in the den of lions; the three children in the fiery furnace; Jonah in the belly of the whale; Paul and Silas in the inner prison—their feet were in the stocks, but their spirits were free; and when his brow is marble cold, and his eyes are glazed and dim, and his ear has lost its hearing, and his tongue its powers of speech, the moving lips and uplifted hands tell the by-standers at a Christian's death-bed that the gates of prayer stand open still. Prayer and a good man part only at the door of heaven; there is but a breath, a groan, a sigh, between earth's prayers and its eternal praise. He rises from his knees to assume the crown, and ascend a throne.

Prayers which are not answered at the time, nor for long afterwards, may nevertheless be accepted—were he to speak, Christ's reply to a mother, earnest and urgent for a son's conversion, might be such as he gave his own mother, "Woman, my hour is not yet come." Now, God's people are apt to forget this; and that it is with prayer, to borrow an illustration from commercial transactions, as with a bill, which, though accepted, is often not paid till months or years elapse. Our heavenly Father knows best what to give; and also how, and where, and when to give. Were its answer always to follow prayer, as the peal roars upon the flash, I suspect that we would be as ready in spiritual as we are in earthly matters to forget God's hand,—coming to look on our prayers as being the cause of the answer, as much as we are in the habit, without any reference to God, of regarding the flash of lightning as the cause of the peal of thunder.

Besides, if, without respect to other things, the answer were always to follow the prayer, the grand ends of God's providence would often be defeated. Let me illustrate this by reference to the case of the prodigal. It so happened that he was deeply impressed with a sense of his bad, and unfilial conduct. How touchingly is that expressed in his soliloquy, "I will arise and go to my father, and say to him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and am not worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants." But suppose it had been otherwise, and that by report, or his bold bearing and sullen look, his father knew it to be otherwise, would he have run to meet him? Would he have kissed his cheek? Would he, anticipating his prayers, have granted forgiveness before it was asked; and, in the fulness of a father's joy, the gush of long pent up feelings, would he, as having nothing too good for him, have cried for the fairest robe; bidden music sound, and wine flow, and floors shake to the dancers' feet? A hired servant was the height of that son's hope, the boldest venture of his prayer; and as God in the end will do to his people, would he—taking him to his bosom, restoring him to the place of a son both in his heart and home—have done exceeding abundantly above all that he could ask or think? Certainly not. If the prodigal, though somewhat, had not been fully sensible of his sin, the father would have pursued a different course. God cures souls as we cure bodies—he wounds to heal. And, in the case supposed, this father, in whose portrait Jesus drew an attractive picture of his own Father, would have turned his back on his son at the very time his heart was turning to him. Restraining feelings that struggled to get forth, he would have received him coldly, that he might humble his pride, and make him fit to receive his gracious favour. See how David dealt with Absalom! To say nothing of those that heard it, who ever read that doleful cry, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son," without feeling that David was as tender in heart, as he was true to friendship, and pious to God, and brave in battle; yet when his heart was breaking for the love he had for Absalom, see how he allowed him to stay two whole years in Jerusalem,—refusing to see his face. Look at Joseph's conduct to his brethren! He yearned to make himself known to them, and had forgiven all the moment that he saw them; yet he dealt harshly with them; spoke roughly to them; called them spies; cast them into prison. Nor till conscience, long asleep, woke by this rough hand to reproach them and teach them to reproach themselves, saying, "We are very guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us," not till then did he drop the mask, and with look, and tones that proclaimed their pardon, cry, I am Joseph! Even so, to deepen the humility of those that seek him, to try their faith, to exercise their patience, to quicken their penitence, to fire their ardour, and blow the smoking flax into a burning flame, Jesus, when his heart is overflowing with tenderness, may for a while refuse prayer her answer,—hide himself, nor say, I am Jesus.

And when we pray, and get no answer—knock, and the door is not opened—and putting our ear to it, we catch no approaching footstep, nor sound, nor sign of any one being within, what are we to do? To cease praying? Cease praying! By no means. No more than I would cease swimming for dear life when the rude wave had plucked my hands from the rock, or, after my feet had touched the blessed sands, bore me back again and out to sea. I am to knock and listen; to stand, and wait till the door of God's heart is opened—importunate as the widow, till then take no rest and give him none. Do so, for what his word teaches you is agreeable to his will, and if you don't get the answer when you are living, you shall get it when you are dead. In prayers, or curses, men sow what often grows above their graves. It is eighteen hundred years since Jesus prayed, "I will that thou whom thou hast given me be with me where I am;" and that prayer gets its answer in every chamber which the dying saint leaves for the gates of glory. It is eighteen hundred years since they cried, "His blood be on us and on our children," and God is answering that curse now in a people scattered and peeled, a hissing, a byeword, and a proverb in all the earth.

Let faith and hope hold up the arms of prayer till they drop powerless at your side in death. Many a parent has entreated God for an ungodly son; nor got his answer till he went to heaven. Some day its door opens; he looks round to see who comes in—and there is his son! Amid rejoicing angels and ringing heavens, the two embrace; and Jesus, seeing of the travail of his soul, rejoicing in this trophy of his cross, hears that burst of paternal joy, "My son that was dead is alive again, that was lost is found."

III. The fruit of prayer.

In standing up before his audience to proclaim salvation, and offer pardon to the guilty—to the guiltiest, by the blood of Jesus,—and by all that is sacred and holy, that is tender and terrible, by love to God and regard to themselves, to urge its cordial and immediate acceptance, how often do the vacant eyes and unmoved demeanour of his hearers—so unlike people under sentence of death getting tidings of a pardon—remind the preacher of the question, Shall horses run upon the rock, shall a man plough there with oxen? Time that sheds snows on our head, draws furrows on our brow; but it is not over bald mountain brows that the husbandman guides his plough. He cultivates the valley, leaving the rocky summits to the eagle, to clouds and roaring tempests.

Bolder than he, the preacher of the gospel casts the seed of the word on stony hearts. God encourages him; saying, Is not my word a fire and hammer to break the stones in pieces? Yet, alas! how often does the result of his most solemn, most startling, most searching appeals but show that he has run his horses on a rock, and ploughed there with oxen?—the only feeling elicited, like the spark which the horse's hoof strikes from the rock, to die the instant of its birth.

It is one thing, however, to speak to men, and another to speak to God—in other words, it is one thing to preach, and an entirely different thing to pray. Who prays, nevers runs his horses on a rock, nor ploughs there with oxen. When the season has been cold and backward, when rains fell and prices rose, and farmers desponded and the poor despaired, I have heard people, whose hopes, resting on God's promise, did not rise and fall with the barometer, nor shift with shifting winds, say, We shall have harvest after all. You can safely say so of the labours and fruits of prayer. The answer indeed may be long in coming—years may elapse before the bread we have cast on the waters comes back; but if the vision tarry, wait for it! Why not? We know that some seeds spring as soon almost as they are put into the ground; others lie buried there for months: and in some cases years elapse before they germinate, and rise to teach us that what is dormant is not dead. It is often so with prayer. Before that immortal seed has sprung, the hand that planted it may be mouldering in the dust—the seal of silence lying on the lips that prayed. But though you are not spared to see it grow, it is not lost; it bides its time, God's "set time." In one form or another, in this world or in the next, who sows in tears, sickle in hand, shall reap in joy. He who puts his people's tears into his bottle, will never forget their prayers.

Consider what honour has God put on prayer! The question is not, What can it do? but, What has it not done? It has divided the sea; quenched the violence of fire; shut the mouths of lions; and opened the gates of Paradise. As you would do to that clock, by putting your finger on the pendulum, prayer has gone up to heaven and stopped the sun. It has gone down into the dusty grave, and brought back the dead. It has bound up the clouds; and loosed them again. See yonder the prophet's servant climbing Carmel for the seventh time. There is a speck like a white sail on the rim of the sea. It rises; no bigger at first than a man's hand, it grows, gathers, spreads, till it covers the whole dark vault of heaven; and now, with thunders roaring, lightning flashing, rain pouring from the skies, and foaming cascades leaping from the hills, the king lashes on his startled horses,—flying before the tempest. The prayers of that man who, with girded loins, runs by his chariot, did it—shattered with thunderbolts the bottles of the sky. "Elias," says the apostle, "was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heavens gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit."

Are we to expect such answers now? Well, we err more, perhaps, by expecting them too little than too much. When the State or Church appoints fasts and days of prayer for rain in dry, for drought in wet seasons, how few go to prayer with a spark of the faith of that child who was observed going to church prepared for rain. True, there was no cloud in heaven, but God was there; and would to Him we brought to prayer more of the faith that spoke in her answer to those that taunted her, and expressed surprise to see her prepared for change of weather: "We are going to pray for rain, and I expect God will hear and send it." If we expected more, we should get more; and this is especially true of prayers that, seeking better harvests than sickles reap, plead and urge such promises as these, "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit on thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring; and they shall spring up as among the grass, and as willows by the water-courses."

It is by men on their knees the door of heaven is opened. Prayer is the key. The Spirit yields to prayer. Look at our Lord's baptism. Side by side John and he stand in Jordan stream. He afterwards bowed his head to death; and now he bowed it to a servant's hand. Baptized by John—the greater by the less—he leaves the water. Not there, but on the bank, where, as Luke tells us, he engaged in prayer, the eyes of the spectators catch a dove-like object; and in that form—dropping with expanded wings till it rests upon his head, he receives the Spirit. And how were the disciples engaged at Pentecost when they received the Holy Ghost? That day of days found them all in one place; and in prayer. Suddenly, though no breath stirred the leaves of the aspen, or bent the reeds that stood in the shallows of the sleeping lake, there came a sound, as when the wind roars through the winter forests; every man started and raised his head to cry, What is that? but was struck dumb to see the sign of the Spirit's presence, and the power of prayer—a tongue of fire resting on every head. Once more they are met,—met like a crew on the deck when their vessel, reeling in the sea, is driving on a horrid reef. The Church is in danger. The preaching of the gospel is forbidden. Hanging over destruction, his poor people cry to the Lord. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and his anointed; but he that sits in heaven laughs, the Lord has them in derision. Suddenly when the Church, in her distress, cries to the Lord, the house where she is met, struck by no reeling earthquake, feels such shock as when a ship takes the sand. It rocks to its foundations; and they who feared, perhaps, that they and the hopes of a lost world were to be buried in a common ruin, find themselves filled with the Holy Ghost. And who would be so filled, or who would have others filled, let him pray. "To your tents, O Israel!" was an old cry; now it should be, whether they seek their own or others' salvation, To your knees, O men! The Spirit comes to the call of prayer.

Now is the time, the day, the hour for it. There is nothing too great you may not get in this world; and nothing too little you shall not be refused in the next. Here God will give pardon to the greatest sins, his saving mercy to the greatest sinners; there the man that now rejects the cross of Christ and the crown of glory, shall lift up his eyes in torment—nor get a drop of water to cool his burning tongue. Seek the Lord, therefore, while he is to be found; and continue steadfastly in prayer.

SAMOA.

SAMOA is not one island, but many—being the native name of the group called the “Navigators.” They are lovely islands, with mountains from 2000 to 4000 feet high, and surrounded by coral reefs; and with a Malayan population of about 35,000. In 1787 La Perouse landed on these shores, and the natives, for some real or fancied injury, slew ten of his men. For fifty years after this the place was dreaded by voyagers; but when the missionaries, Williams and Barth, arrived with Tahitian teachers in 1830, they were delighted to find the people quite friendly. It was a crisis in Samoan history. Tamafalinga, who was supposed to have within him the spirit of one of the principal war gods, had just been killed. Before any other warlike impostor could claim the succession to this divine incarnation or possession, the missionaries arrived; and after many struggles and difficulties, the God of “the men who had burst through the heavens” began to be feared.

Among the early hindrances to Christianity was one which is both curious and instructive. The news that the Samoans were favourable to Christianity spread among the whaling and other ships in the Pacific, and here and there an adventurous sailor would find his way on shore, and set up for a priest of the new religion. A chief thought it added vastly to his importance to have an adopted white son in his train for this purpose; but in most cases it was hardly a step in advance of heathenism. The people were delivered from some of their old superstitions, but they transferred them to the white man's god, whom they were not taught to know as the God of holiness. A native tells the story thus about himself:—“The new religion was spreading in our village. One after another joined, ate the incarnations of the spirits, no harm followed, and so I determined to join. The sea-eel and the sea-spider were the incarnations of the gods to whom our family prayed. I went to the white man's house—he was said to be a Portuguese. I told him I was come to say I was now of his religion, and would henceforth worship his god. After this I cooked and ate a piece of the eel and of the sea-spider. Night came on, and there I lay, feeling whether any disease was commencing. The night passed, and the following day, and other days; I felt quite well, and so concluded that the white man's god was more powerful than the gods of Samoa.” . . . “There was nothing forbidden; plurality of wives, and other heathen customs, remained as they were. Nothing was required but to meet together for a month in the year, for worship, feasting, and fun.” For some time this continued. It was the fashion to have a foreign religion, and the fashion carried it, until at last an old woman giving out that she was an incarnation of the “Son of God,” many, to their ruin, followed this Joanna Southcott of Polynesia. Even to this day these mistakes perplex the people, though now (through ten missionaries and two hundred and twelve native teachers, under the oversight of the London Missionary Society) a true and large work is being done.

The aggregate of Church members (not rashly admitted) is 2798, and of candidates for Church fellowship 2892. The people, once heathen, contribute for the support of their pastors and teachers £560 annually, and send £650 to the funds of the London Missionary Society. The plan adopted by the Rev. George Turner and his coadjutors was that of a Mission Seminary, in which they might teach native students, who should afterwards teach their fellow-countrymen. At the end of the fifteenth year the number of young men thus sent forth had amounted to 263. The Mission Institute is self-supporting; and the account, both of its internal economy and of the course of instruction given, possesses great and permanent interest. The entire Bible has been carefully translated, and Mr. Turner is at present carrying through the press, under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society, an edition of 10,000 copies, to be taken out to the expectant Samoans. May God send forth his light with his truth!

In Mr. Turner's book on Polynesia, which we noticed last month, he gives full details as to the old manners and customs of Samoa, while yet heathen. We cannot take note of all these; but some are very interesting, and we begin with some of those that relate to the great common fact of death. The Samoans, like almost all nations, have the custom of wailing for the departed immediately after they expire, also “rending their garments,” beating themselves with stones, and making what they call an “offering of blood” for the dead. While the body is in the house all are “unclean until the evening,” and touch no food by day; the fifth day is a “day of purification,” and on it they wash their face and hands, and become “clean.” Each buries his dead in the private burying-place of his fathers, which they call “the fast resting-place.” It is spread with mats, like an ordinary couch; and there the Samoans “rest in their beds,” with their heads laid to the sunrising and their feet stretched to the west. Sometimes, in the case of people of rank, they “make a very great burning” for the dead, kindling great fires all round the body, and the grave, and the house of the deceased. The unburied (as in the old Greek and Roman times) occasion great concern. They think the spirit haunts them everywhere, and, like the heroes in Homer, hear the “shrill, thin voice” of the wandering ghost wailing, “Oh, how cold!” In Rome of old, when the body was not found, the mourning friends satisfied themselves with a tumulus inanis, or empty tomb; the Samoans, on the other hand, think it possible in such a case to obtain the soul of the deceased. “On the beach, near where a person had been drowned, or on the battle-field, where another fell, might be seen, sitting in silence, a group of five or six, and one a few yards before them with a sheet of native cloth spread out on the ground before him.” He was praying to the god of the family to send them the soul, and the first thing that lighted on the sheet—grasshopper, butterfly, ant. or anything else—was carefully wrapped up, and solemnly buried, as if it were really the spirit of the dead.

The grave, however, is not the Hades of the Samoans. Its entrance was supposed to be a circular basin among the rocks, at the west end of the westmost island, where the day went down. A band of spirits, they believed, waited for each dying person, and carried his soul with them to the Fafa, or pool through which they plunged together into the nether world. In this region there was supposed to be another earth and sky, where the dead, with real bodies, went on planting, fishing, and cooking, as in the present life. But at night they changed their forms, and became like a confused collection of sparks of fire, and thus visited their former places of abode—fleeing from the approach of day back to their dwellings in the deep. The chiefs had a separate Elysium, or house of death, which was supported, not by columns of stone or wood, but by the mighty dead; who became thus literally, in the words of Job, the "pillars of hell." In the midst of them reclined Saveasilneo, their king of hades, with "all the chief ones of the nations" round him, the upper part of his body towering among them, while his extremities stretched in huge Python-like coils deep into the abyss. In place of such a paradise as this, the missionaries found it interesting and effective to preach His gospel who says, alike to the great man and the mean, "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God."

Besides these stories of death, the Samoans have a disjointed mythology. Men did not exactly spring from dust; but a huge plant, that grew on the primeval rock, decomposed into worms, and these became men and women. Their poetic account of the early history of the earth is strangely like that to which, by the aid of the Bible and geology, we are coming. Thus we are told how "the low rocks fought with the high rocks; the low were beaten, and the high rocks conquered. The ground rocks fought with the earth; the ground rocks were beaten, and the earth conquered. The earth fought with the small stones; the earth was beaten, and the small stones conquered. The small stones fought with the small grass; the stones were beaten, and the grass conquered. The trees fought with the creepers; the trees were beaten, and the creepers conquered. And then began the wars of men."

They have also a sort of didactic mythology, of which we may give two examples. Of old the rat had wings, and the bat had none. The bat said to the rat, "Just let me try on your wings for a little." The rat lent the bat his wings; off flew the bat, and never came back with them again. Hence a common Samoan proverb. Again, the bananas once held their heads erect, but having quarrelled with the plantain, fought and were beaten, and have ever since hung their heads. Hence an old Samoan in a missionary meeting likened "the cause of Jesus" to the plantain erect to heaven, before which all its enemies must bow.

The Samoans were polytheists rather than idolaters. Each one had his own god, the choice being fixed by whoever happened to be invoked at the moment of birth. These gods appeared in different animals, which were, therefore, sacred to the individual, and could not be eaten by him though they might be by others. "If a man found a dead owl by the roadside, and if that happened to be the incarnation of his god, he would sit down and weep over it, and beat his forehead with stones till the blood flowed." There were many public priests, but each man was priest in his own family. Before the evening meal, he took the cup of ava in his hand, poured a little of it on the ground as a drink offering, and amid deep silence, said aloud, "Here is ava for you, O gods!" There was also the "offering of flaming fire at the approach of night." Calling upon some one to blow up the fire and make it blaze, and begging all to be silent, the head of the family prayed thus:—

"This light is for you, O king, and gods superior and inferior! this light is for you all. Be propitious to this family; give life to all; and may your presence be prosperity. Let our children be blessed and multiplied. Regard our poverty; and send us food to eat, and cloth to keep us warm. Keep away from us sailing gods, lest they come and cause disease and death."

It is hardly possible to read this perverted prayer without remembering how the early Greek Christians, at the lighting of the evening lamp, prayed to Christ as the "Light from the immortal Father;" and Mr. Turner remarks that, amid the vagaries of Samoan superstition, there was much to prepare the heathen mind for the pure and holy doctrines of truth. "Now, the evening meal is commenced by thanking the one living and true God for his goodness, and is generally followed by family worship, in conducting which they praise God, read the Scriptures, and unite in prayer." So may all false shadows of the true, in every land of heathendom, break and scatter before the rising sun, and either merge into that better light, or flit into the past and be forgotten!

DAVID SANDEMAN.

PART FIRST.

EARLY LIFE AND CONVERSION.

WHEN man sharpens a sickle it is that it may do his work in the field white and ready for harvest. When he constructs a machine at vast expenditure, and through long years of invention and toil, it is that it may labour for him in some proportion to its complexity and cost. God alone seems prodigal of his instruments. He prepares them through long years, yet casts them aside on a sudden; fits them exquisitely for work, yet at the moment of their completed preparation, supersedes or suspends their operation. John the Baptist, "the greatest of men born of women," after thirty years' training in the solitudes of Judea, is allowed but six brief months of service, when he is shut up in prison and left to be beheaded at midnight by the axe of the executioner. James, the brother of the beloved disciple, a companion of the Lord, a witness of his glory in the transfiguration, and of his agony in Gethsemane, and endowed from on high with all gifts and grace for the apostleship, falls while but on the threshold of his ministry before the hand of Herod "stretched forth to vex certain of the Church." A Henry Martyn, burning with the zeal of an apostle, droops and dies at the moment that Persia is opening to him the possibility of a conquest for his Lord. David Sandeman, with like fervour of love, and soul on fire for the conversion of China, has left all behind, kindred, country, pleasant picturesque estate, is already at Amoy, has cleared his first difficulties in the acquisition of a new tongue, is fitting like a bow to an arrow for his work, when in manifestation of a sovereignty which we adore, but cannot understand, his life is cut short and his mission ended before he has entered upon his labours. Yet his life is no failure. He who gives not an account of his ways to any, shows enough in those blossoms that go up as the dust to draw towards them our wondering eyes. Their early death gathers around them a more loving and intense gaze. He who reads the memoir of David Sandeman needs no argument to assure him that he did not live in vain. He will learn that though arrested in his work for China, his life had its great mission and lesson. May it not be that even for that land there will arise many "baptized for the dead!"

From the deeply-interesting memoir that has just appeared,* we learn that David Sandeman was the second son of George Sandeman, Esq. of Bonskied, and was born at Perth 23d April 1826. The pleasant residence of this prosperous family was Springland, close to the river Tay, within a mile of the town, and not far from a locality renowned in Scottish history, the old palace of Scoon, where the kings of Scotland used to be crowned. From infancy he was of a quiet, sedate temperament. As a boy, he was not much given to engage in the usual boyish games; yet loved bolder and more manly exercises, being an expert swimmer, rider, and skater. At school he was more distinguished by perseverance than quickness, often outstripping cleverer boys by his conscientious industry. The study in which he especially excelled was mathematics, a study which he seems to have prosecuted through life, as we find him in China commissioning a friend to send him a copy of the Principia. It was not till his eighteenth year he experienced the decisive change of heart that issued in an entire and solemn consecration of himself to the missionary cause. From infancy he had been taught to know the Scriptures, and had around him in the home of his childhood and youth those who loved and adorned the gospel by their holy lives. A mother's prayers had ascended for his conversion, the searching, awakening book had been dropped in his way or put into his hand, the word of parental and pious counsel had fallen upon his ear, and his young steps conducted to the sanctuary, where he heard the most faithful and impressive preaching. Still, for eighteen years, according to his own decisive testimony, his soul was dead to God. "During all that time," he remarks in his retrospect of it, "my conduct was never influenced by the thought of his existence as a person, or of anything I did being pleasing or displeasing to him. An undefined sense of duty, my parents, masters, emulation among my fellow-students, carnal lusts, and, above all, self; these, I believe, were my gods, at least they held all the place where God should have been. I was satisfied or happy entirely as I managed to please or displease them. . . . I went smoothly on in utter disregard of Christ. I never honoured him as God, as my Creator, my Judge, my risen Redeemer. I was a decent rebel, outwardly respectable, but, in reality, a despiser of Christ."

No single instrument was honoured in his conversion. Many sowers had sown the seed in his heart. A word from his mother dropped shortly before the period appears to have been the proximate cause. "David, did you ever give yourself to Christ? You have no right to remain one week without loving him." The word was spoken with a view to his joining in the communion of the Church. His honest conviction was that he was not willing unreservedly to give himself to the Lord. He desired to go to the communion-table, yet knew that he ought not to go in an unconverted state. Occupied with these thoughts he retired to his room for prayer, and whilst alone and engaged in the review of his spiritual condition, his heart was drawn out "by the omnipotent hand of God to think simply of Christ and his willingness to receive all who have a true wish to come to him." That evening, for the first time, he felt his soul anchored on the Rock of Ages. "Where am I now? what is this?" were his first words of adoring wonder. "Heart and hand, and all that I have is thine! Begone, poor world!" Next Sabbath found him seated at the table of his Lord.

It was not the impulse of an hour that was given to David Sandeman in that closet solitude. The interview of that evening with the Father of his spirit ruled his life. He was henceforth a man of prayer, of self-sacrifice, of unceasing devoted service. Though he had much to learn he was now one of wisdom's children. The three mottoes of his life from that day became—"LOOKING UNTO JESUS," "MY GRACE IS SUFFICIENT FOR THEE," "WHOM I AM, AND WHOM I SERVE."

More than ten years passed from that day before he formally entered upon the field of missions. A course of study had to be gone through in preparation for the ministry; and not a few preliminary steps had to be taken before his path to the ministry lay perfectly open. Yet from the hour of his conversion he was not only a missionary in spirit, but in deed. He had drunk of the cup of salvation, and he hastened and delayed not to pass it to lips that were still athirst. Like Paul he straightway preached—felt his commission in the fact of his own conversion to open blind eyes. To the cotters of his father's estate, to the neighbours around the family residence, to the traveller he met by the way, to the associates in the Manchester warehouse where he was training to business, he straightway preached Christ. His tongue was unloosed to speak of his praise, as his face shone in the light of his new peace and joy. In his earlier days his friends were wont to mark an expression of countenance that indicated something sombre in his character. After his conversion the cloud was lifted from his brow. The glory of God in the face of Jesus shed gladness through his heart, a gladness that his companions often took notice of, and which they felt to be infectious. One who knew him well remarked, "It was the love of Jesus that first put that smile on his face which never left it." So early as his first communion season his new life was cast into what was its subsequent characteristic trait—an intense desire to be of use to others. On meeting him as he came from that communion table a friend asked him, "Were you happy?" "So happy that I fear to trust it. What a salvation! Shall not life be spent in proclaiming it?" His life was the embodied utterance of his soul in that hour—

"Loved of my God, for him again With love intense I burn."

The very first entries in his journal present to us the characteristic traits of his spiritual mind and life—prayerfulness and labour for souls. "I wish," he writes, "that more progress were visible, but it is in truth a pure impossibility for man in his own strength to begin or to maintain a walk with God. My evil passions and wicked heart are continually interfering and leading me off almost before I am aware of it. 'Pray without ceasing.' O Lord, give me a more earnest, prayerful spirit for my dear unconverted friends. If I would but think seriously of their condition, that each of them is continually fighting against his Lord, inflicting new wounds on Jesus's breast, and yet it is the very hand which they are wounding that prevents them dropping into everlasting misery! How can I rest one moment while I do assuredly know that such is the case? O Lord Jesus, show them but a spark of thy incomprehensible love and then they will be changed. Thou holdest every man's heart in thy hand. O Lord, if it be thy will, change their hearts. Would it not be for thy everlasting glory? O Lord, give me no rest till I have done all that man can do. And surely I cannot doubt but that thou wilt be graciously pleased to answer; for 'this is the confidence that we have in him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us.'"

The most instructive parts of his journal are the statements of his experience in relation to the healthful influence upon his own soul of efforts made on behalf of others. In him was a happy union of prayerfulness and promptitude for service, and in the union he found the strength of his own soul. Prayer and effort, and effort and prayer were the business of his Christian life. They reacted on each other, prayer on his work and his work on prayer, and both in maintaining his spiritual health and abounding joy. He received to impart and in imparting received. The seed he cast liberally abroad returned in full sheaves to the sower. "I find," says he, "that unless I am continually doing something for the souls of unthinking sinners, my love becomes cold, and a deadening effect is the result, which soon spreads into everything." And again, "I find almost invariably that the more I am engaged in doing something for the good of others the happier I am in my mind." Ought it to be otherwise? The word of God is bread to strengthen for labour. If eaten as a spiritual luxury, as a self-enjoying spiritual epicureism, to what can it turn but like dainty feeding to the weakening of the frame. With David Sandeman it was strong meat making him stronger as he fed upon it and fed others.

In his continual watchfulness to serve we see much of the peculiar ability of Richard Knill, as well as of his promptitude. Love was the fire that threw off from the hearts of both burning coals. They loved much. Their utterance was the outward sign of an invisible grace. With Richard Knill the love that spoke was in alliance with a sharper, quicker intellect. Yet in many of the impromptu sayings and doings of David Sandeman, we see both Knill's love and boldness. A friend of his youth tells an anecdote of those days that illustrates this. Delighting as he did in vigorous exercise and gymnastic feats, he one day, in a walk with two companions, joined for a few minutes in the amusement of leaping over the stile at one corner of the old Queen's Park. While his companions failed, he cleared the stile so easily and gracefully as to draw forth the admiration of a dragoon who stood by. When about to walk on Mr. Sandeman turned to the soldier, got him into conversation, and spoke of the perils and honours of a life like his. Then suddenly drawing himself up to his full height, he exclaimed with deep feeling, "There is something far better yet! It is to be a soldier of Jesus Christ. Are you that?" The dragoon looked with wonder on the man of muscle and sinew who could thus speak to his soul, and shook hands at parting evidently deeply interested. Scenes like these, the narrator adds, were continually recurring; but this power of gracefully turning every little event into a means of usefulness could exist only in one whose natural atmosphere was the love of God, and in whose soul there was an uninterrupted gravitation towards his divine Saviour.

One day, in harvest, finding by the roadside a woman cutting grass, he plucked a head of wheat, and told her how a corn of wheat must die before that beautiful head could spring up, and that so Christ must needs die ere we could be saved. The woman was astonished, and the young missionary went on his way, praying that the Lord might send his word to her heart. So continually did he act upon his favourite text, "Whom I am, and whom I serve," that in a brief summer excursion in the west of Scotland, a companion of his journey informs us, that he believes that he must have spoken to not less than five hundred persons in the course of their pedestrian excursion, and that when opportunity occurred he was as direct and ready in addressing the rich as the poor.

It will encourage those who have experienced the difficulty of this service, yet who would watch for souls, to learn that David Sandeman had much to overcome ere he attained the freedom and readiness he ultimately reached. It was in him more the gift of grace than of nature. He traded with his talent and gained more. Let the Christian reader do likewise, and as his heart is enlarged his tongue will be unloosed; as the rock is smitten the waters will gush forth. Listen to his experience, and if all difficulties do not disappear in the work, it will become both more easy and pleasant as we cultivate his spirit. "It is undoubtedly," he says, "the case that there is a secret reluctance to speak plainly to unthinking men, unless we are specially endued with a sense of eternal things, and that so strongly as to conquer the natural evil of the heart. But if there is much secret striving with God, and then going in his strength boldly to the work, many a seeming difficulty will vanish; we are strengthened above what we thought, and a sense of divine things is experienced brighter and clearer than ever before. God has wonderfully connected praying and acting. If we pray to be enabled to speak the truth to dying sinners, and do not, when opportunity occurs, actively engage in doing something for them, the effect is to deaden our minds. It is saying, 'I go,' and going not. Many Christians fall into a lethargic state from this cause."

MAXIMUS.

MANY, if God should make them kings,
Might not disgrace the throne he gave,
How few who could as well fulfil
The holier office of a slave.

I hold him great who, for love's sake,
Can give, with generous, earnest will,—
Yet he who takes for love's sweet sake,
I think I hold more generous still.

I prize the instinct that can turn
From vain pretence with proud disdain;
Yet more I prize a simple heart
Paying credulity with pain.

I bow before the noble mind
That freely some great wrong forgives;
Yet nobler is the one forgiven,
Who bears that burden well, and lives.

It may be hard to gain, and still
To keep a lowly steadfast heart;
Yet he who loses has to fill
A harder and a truer part.

Glorious it is to wear the crown
Of a deserved and pure success;—
He who knows how to fail has won
A crown whose lustre is not less.

Great may he be who can command
And rule with just and tender sway;
Yet is diviner wisdom taught
Better by him who can obey.

Blessèd are those who die for God,
And earn the martyr's crown of light—
Yet he who lives for God may be
A greater conqueror in his sight.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

THE TWO VALLEYS—HINNOM AND JEHOSHAPHAT.

It was pleasant to return to our cool rooms in Simeon Rosenthal's hotel on Mount Zion, after leaving Bethany and the Mount of Olives. The entrance to our inn was through a courtyard, where we always dismounted at the foot of a rude flight of stone steps, which led over the flat roofs of the lower rooms to the vaulted hall where we took our meals. This room had a window looking over the city. Pigeons ventured near sometimes, and perched on the window sill, and three times a day a cool reviving breeze came in from the sea or the mountains. A little beyond the door of the sitting-room two or three steps descended through a door in a low wall into a garden on a lower roof, from which an arched doorway opened into our bedroom, another large, airy room, with thick walls, and one of those cool, vaulted roofs which form the domes so characteristic of the cities in the south of Palestine. These rooms were furnished much in the same way as in a moderate German hotel. Above them rose one higher roof, from which we had our first view, over the roofs of Jerusalem, of the Temple precincts, thence of the large open reservoirs beside them, and the three brown summits of the Mount of Olives beyond. And now the names so familiar to our hearts had become pictures familiar to our eyes. It is difficult to give any idea of the charm of feeling these sacred names becoming everyday realities—solid, actual, familiar things blended with daily life—and thus giving in our minds a deeper reality, and therefore a tenderer sacredness, to the great events and the holy presence which have consecrated them.

In the afternoon we called on Miss Cooper at her Industrial School for Jewesses, and then went out by St. Stephen's Gate, and, descending into the Kedron Valley, took the path towards the village of Siloam. We passed the curious pyramidal mausoleum, half hewn out of the rock and half built on it, called the Tomb of Absalom, on which it is a traditional custom for the wayfarer to cast a stone as he passes, in token of his detestation of Absalom's undutiful rebellion. The strength and endurance of the tradition says much for the impression made by the family order and reverence so deeply stamped on the Bible. The fact of that sad history of filial ingratitude and punishment has been so strongly felt that tradition has had to find it a locality, and has given it possession of one of the many unknown and empty tombs which surround the fallen city.

Other massive rock-hewn mausoleums are beside Absalom's Tomb, and the sides of the valley everywhere, especially at this its narrowest part, were pierced with the cave-tombs of many races. If everywhere it is true that the dead laid beneath the soil far outnumber the living who tread it, a hundredfold is this the case with Jerusalem. Now a poor, thinly-peopled Turkish town, once the royal, the sacred city of a prosperous nation, the bones of generations of kings and warriors, of the slain of five besieging armies and their victims, mingle with the dust of her hills and valleys. And, besides this, the tradition of the Moslem religion, so long dominant in the East, coincides with the faith of the Jew in fixing the Valley of Jehoshaphat as the scene of the final judgment, and thus makes it a favourite burial-ground for both. The ignorant Jew, it is said, believes that, as all are to rise in this place, the bodies of the dead will have to work their way underground like moles from their various burial-places to the sides of the Mount of Olives, and therefore many an aged Jew will totter to Jerusalem to die, preferring to perform this inevitable journey at any cost in his life, rather than after death. Moslem eyes are fixed on the broken column projecting from the walls of the Temple enclosure over the Kedron Valley, as Mohammed's throne of judgment. But, whether led by wild and grovelling traditions, by a false sacred book, or by the inspired pages of Divine prophecy, on this valley, on these slopes the gaze of the followers of the three religions is fixed, expecting that sacred feet are to stand again on the Mount of Olives, that all nations shall be gathered here to judgment, and this lonely, desolate valley of the dead be thronged with eager, trembling life. "Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision"—in this valley of the judgment of God, Jehoshaphat! Whatever differences may exist among Christians as to prophetic interpretation, nothing can lessen the solemnity which invests the only place in the world to which the minds of Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians turn with equal interest and the same overwhelming anticipation.

From the Valley of the Kedron we ascended the desolate slopes of Mount Zion, a strange scramble over ploughed fields and among old, dry wells, tombs, and pits, which made it necessary to walk very warily. From this waste, uninhabited side of the old royal hill we looked across the ravine of Hinnom to the Hill of Evil Counsel, with its craggy sides and cave tombs. Tradition marks this as the death-place of the traitor Judas. On the other side the green gardens of the king lay beneath us, below the "Pool of Siloam," and above, beyond the many foldings of the brown intervening hills, rose the blue mountains of Moab.

We began to know our way quite well about the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. It was remarkable how our interest deepened in proportion to our familiarity with the scenes, as in some measure we passed out of the condition of sight-seers, with every sense alert for novelties, into the quieter frame of ordinary inhabitants.

This Valley of Hinnom we had more than once traversed, painfully toiling through the track paved with a deep mass of loose stones, which forms its only road, from its head, near the Jaffa Gate, to its junction with the Valley of Jehoshaphat at the steepest angle of Moriah. The upper part is called the Valley of Gihon, and commences in a slight depression of the table land at the west of the city, gradually deepening into a narrow, shady ravine beneath Zion and Moriah. At the head are a series of three large tanks or reservoirs, in successive stages, excavated in the rock. It is supposed these were the Pools of Gihon; they were now quite dry. The lower part of the valley is precipitous; its craggy sides are caverned with tombs, and opposite Zion it is hemmed in by the Hill of Evil Counsel, haunted with the terrible memory of Aceldama.

It is a remarkable thing, even in this wonderful allegorical land, that the Holy City should be fenced on two sides by valleys, one of which is looked on by the adherents of three religions as the scene of the final judgment, whilst the name of the other is used by our Lord himself to indicate the place of final doom*—Jehoshaphat and Gehenna.

Strangely different are the associations of these two valleys. The Valley of Kedron, linked with the tenderest and most solemn memories in the earthly life of our Lord, watered by the brook over which he so often passed on his way to Bethany; once crossed by the joyous throng hailing his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, made glad with children's hosannas, and strewn with festive palms and garments; and, more than all, hiding somewhere in its tranquil bosom the garden of his frequent prayers and his midnight agony. The Valley of Hinnom, on the other hand, black with the darkest associations of the cruel heathenism adopted by the Jews from the earliest races of Canaan, echoing to all time with the piteous wails of the little children burned alive in its gloomy depths, the cries of the victims having been drowned at intervals by the tabrets of the priests and worshippers collected in its groves. In the days succeeding the captivity, when Pagan idolatry ceased to be the sin of the Jewish nation, horror at its past scenes of torture and crime made it a place it seemed reverence to desecrate. The bodies of malefactors and the carcasses of animals were thrown into it; and, to prevent its polluted air infecting the city, funeral fires burned there night and day. Thus Gehenna, the ravine of Hinnom, with its terrific images of continual corruption and unquenched fires, is used by our Lord himself as the type of that place where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched.

Imagine a Christian of Apostolic times standing at the angle of Mount Zion on which we stood, and in one glance sweeping those two valleys: the ravine of Hinnom on one side, glaring with its fearful fires, made typical by the voice of Him who, knowing the terrible abysses which skirt our mortal life, deemed it the highest compassion to unveil them; with the dreadful story of Judas haunting its precipitous sides—Gehenna, the dark valley of the shadow of the second death: on the other side the Valley of the Kedron, sacred with the memories of redemption, the nights of the Saviour's prayer, the garden of his redeeming agony, where he tasted how bitter the cup of our curse was, and held it fast, and drank it to the dregs—the scene, perhaps, of his future manifestation in glory, when his feet should stand on the Mount of Olives. Then think with what feelings such a Christian would return to the city, to plead with the multitudes there for whom the Redeemer's tears had fallen and his blood had been shed, to turn from the doom so certain and so fearfully pictured, to the salvation also so certain, so dearly bought, so free to all who would listen and believe.

And do not we Christians of these days all stand, as it were, at such an angle of the City of God, with judgment and redemption as plainly in our sight? And shall we be less earnest?

One strong contrast between Oriental and European cities must strike all Eastern travellers, and this is especially the case with Jerusalem. There are no suburbs. There is no easy intermingling of town and country life, —the city overflowing into the country in villas and suburban villages, the country blending with the city in market-gardens, parks, and groves. Immediately outside the gates of Jerusalem you are in a solitude, almost in a desert. Pits, and ruins, and heaps of rubbish lie on all sides, wild Bedouins meet you, and neglected wastes surround you. In some measure this must, of course, be the result of bad government, the insecurity of life, which compels men to seek the defence of numbers, and the insecurity of property, which paralyzes industry. Yet there are traces in the Bible of a similar state of things, partly, no doubt, from similar causes, but partly, also, to be attributed to the hilly nature of the country. Close to the Jaffa Gate were deep, unguarded pits, and one very deep one especially, which often reminded us of the danger which our Lord appealed to as so familiar to the Pharisees who sought to entangle him. "If any of you have an ox or an ass, and it fall into a pit," was a catastrophe evidently as common in those days as it must be now. The cement which lines an underground water tank cracks, and it becomes a broken cistern, and is abandoned, leaving its open mouth a snare to all unwary animals; wells are dried up with the same result.

Evidently, also, a few minutes sufficed to bring our Saviour from the crowded city into those "desert places" which he so habitually sought for prayer, thus practically proving to us that no abstraction of mind will compensate for being absolutely and consciously alone with God in secret prayer, when that is possible.

This was our last walk in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, our last survey of the two valleys of doom and redemption, of Gehenna and Gethsemane, which so mystically skirt the earthly Jerusalem, "the city of the great King."

HOURS WITH LIVING PREACHERS.

"SLEEP ON NOW AND TAKE YOUR REST."

WHAT a melancholy meaning that "Sleep on now" has, if only we understand it aright. It is not that He was now approving or allowing that drowsiness of spirit in which they were holden still; far from it. But the import of the words we may take to have been this: The opportunity is past and gone. Even if you should at length shake off this clinging sloth, yet now it would profit nothing in this matter. Other opportunities of service may indeed occur, but this one is gone, and for ever; the moment, with all its rich possibilities of service—the golden moment, has fled; the battle has been fought without you; the victory has been won without you. You may sleep on now and take your rest, for the time when your watching and waking would have profited has passed away.

Ah, brethren, how bitterly must the three apostles, fervent lovers of their Lord, although greatly wanting now, have subsequently mourned that they should have failed their Lord in such a moment as that—a moment which never in the history of their lives, which never in the history of the world, could return again; how must they have resolved not to slight, but to make much of, every future occasion of high devotion to him which should present itself to them, lest that too, by a carnal drowsiness, through the same unreadiness of spirit, should slip by and escape them for ever. And my desire is, that we should take this lesson home with us to-day—namely, that special occasions for serving God and his Church, for bringing glory to him, are in their very nature swift of passage, and, when they are past, often irrecoverable; that, if we are wanting in watchfulness to recognise them, and in what I may call the grace of Christian promptitude to seize them and make them our own at once, we cannot afterwards recall them—we cannot, by any self-willed efforts of our own, reproduce the combination of circumstances under which they offered themselves to us. Does not this, at every turn of our lives, approve itself true?

How often, for instance, in our daily life, in the social intercourse which we hold with our fellow-men, if we will not bear witness for Christ on the moment, we cannot do so at all. If we will not throw ourselves into the gap at the instant, then, while we are deliberating, while we are mustering our tardy forces, the gap is closed, and it becomes impossible for us to do at all what we would not do at once. The stream of conversation flows on, and cannot be brought back to the point where it then was. The pernicious maxim was left unproved—the word dishonourable to God, or injurious to his servants, to his truth, was suffered to pass by unrebuked; and it must continue so now, for that word which we would not speak at once we cannot now speak at all. We may sleep on and take our rest, for the time when we might have served God and the cause of his truth in this matter is past.

Nor does it fare otherwise with acts of kindness and deeds of love. It is, indeed, quite true of these, that, in one shape or another, they may always be done by those who have any mind or affection to them. In a world of woe like ours, the stripped and wounded traveller lies ever in the way, if only there be the good Samaritan to see him and to help him. But it is not the less true that many precious opportunities of binding up wounds, strengthening the weak, comforting the mourner, may escape us unimproved, and, having once escaped, may have passed from us for ever; for they are as guests from another world, whom, if we do not invite to turn in upon the instant when they show themselves to us, we may afterwards follow, but we shall not overtake them, least of all shall we persuade to turn back again at our bidding. The need which we might have helped, but did not, another has helped in our stead; or it has outgrown all human help, because we would not help it in time. The prayers which we might have offered for a suffering brother in the hour of his sore temptation or his pain, with which we might have helped him, he has struggled through without them, or has passed, it may be, into a world where they cannot reach to aid him.

Nor will it fare otherwise in regard of our own spiritual life. We have great need of watchfulness to turn to present and immediate account God's manifold dealings with us. When the heart is deeply stirred by feelings of gratitude and joy, we must seek to direct those feelings into their due channel at once, or else they will run to waste, and the blessing which they might have brought will escape us altogether. We must seek to embody them at the time in some distinct act of thanksgiving and praise—in the dedication, it may be, of some special portion of our substance to the service of God, or to the needs of his saints; or else, if we do not give diligence to embody our gratitude at once, we scarcely shall do so at a later day, when, in the very necessity of things, the high tides of our grateful thanksgiving shall have somewhat ebbcd and abated.

And if this behoves in the time of a great joy, it behoves still more in the time of a great sorrow, which, as such, ought also to be the time of a great holiness. The fruits of such a time—the peaceable fruits of righteousness which that season was intended to bear for us, must be gathered at once; or if they are not thus gathered by us at once, they will not be at all. The mere onward course of time, the succession of events, the business of the world, will inevitably rob us of that sorrow, deaden at least the quickness and liveliness of it. If, then, when that sorrow was fresh and new, we did not use it—we did not compel it to yield up its blessing to us, the sweet which it had as well as the bitter, at a later day we shall seek in vain to extract from it that spiritual profit with which once it was charged for us to the full.—R. C. Trench, D.D.

THE RAGGED-SCHOOL TEACHER.

ON arriving, one winter evening, at a town where I was occasionally in the habit of spending a few weeks, I was met by the tidings of a sad accident which had occurred that day. The teacher of a small ragged school (recently established), and a little girl, his most promising pupil, had been drowned a few hours before, by the breaking of the ice on a small loch which she was attempting to cross. The event had caused considerable excitement, and was everybody's theme for the time. When calling next day for a friend, I asked if she knew any particulars of the accident, or anything about the teacher.

"Oh yes," was her reply; "I was with his poor mother when his body was carried in."

"His mother! Then you knew her before?"

"I had not seen her before," she replied; "but last time I was in —, some friends asked me if I knew about the ragged school here. They were interested in it, they said, because the only son of a former much-valued servant had gone to be teacher, and she had accompanied him, being now a widow, and chiefly dependent on him for support. He was a young man of rare excellence, they said; and no wonder, for his mother was truly a saint. He had been engaged in some trade, but had taught in a Sabbath school from early boyhood. His peculiar talent for teaching had there become known. It was seen that somehow or other he could control the most riotous. He interested them and touched their feelings, and won the respect alike of teachers and pupils. And when Miss — formed her benevolent purpose of gathering together a few neglected outcast children, to be fed, and clothed, and trained, and cared for, she was advised to put them under his care. And he and his mother have now gone to —, my friends added. She is in weak health, and knows nobody there; perhaps you'll kindly call for her when you return. I readily promised to do so, and several times after coming home I meant to go, but put it off, as one too often does. But yesterday morning, by a strange enough coincidence, a letter came announcing the death of a member of that family. I instantly thought of the faithful old servant who was interested in all their joys and sorrows, and resolved to call for her in the afternoon. But before the afternoon came there was another death to announce to the lonely widow; for when, with a beating heart, I walked towards her cottage, I knew that a crowd would soon follow me, bearing the lifeless body of her son. I was spared the pain of being the first to break the sad news. Two Christian friends were sitting beside her. They had told her that means were being used to restore her son to life; and when I went in she was saying, 'Oh, go and see how he is—never mind me! Oh, go and see about my laddie!' So one of them went, and we who remained persuaded her to go to bed, as she was faint, and cold, and bewildered. We tried to prepare her for the fatal news, which we knew he would bring on his return. So when he came in and said her son was with God, she made no reply—only a faint moan now and then showed that she was conscious. He began to pray with her, whilst I went into the inner room—her son's room—to prepare it for its now lifeless inmate. It was as he had left it. The book he had been reading lay on the little table—the chair stood in front as he had risen from it. I soon heard the steps approaching outside, and returned to the poor mother. We got her to turn her face to the wall, for we could not bear that she should catch a glimpse of that pale face, which would never more beam with intelligence and love, and that form, so long looked on with pleasure, now carried in cold and motionless. But who could shut out from a mother's ears the sound of these footsteps? They laid him on the bed, from which he had risen strong and buoyant but a few hours before. His face made an impression on me which I shall never forget."

"Was it so ghastly?" I said.

"Ghastly! oh no—so beautiful. There was not exactly a smile, but a bright look; it seemed as if (I hardly know how to express it)—as if some glorious being had beckoned to him, and his face had beamed a response. The female teacher was standing beside me. I pointed to his face. 'Ah, yes,' she said; 'I've seen many a pleasant look on his face, but never one like that.' There was something in her look and tone of voice which touched me, and I could not help watching her. I saw she did not weep, nor stand stricken and powerless. On the contrary, her eyes seemed to note everything that had to be done, and her hands went diligently about their work. She put everything in its right place, moving quietly and steadily. Yet somehow her actions seemed mechanical, and her rigid face, and the very firmness and precision of her movements, made me think that the quietness was only on the surface, and that there was terrible inward emotion kept down by a strong hand. I drew close to her. 'Have you many friends here?' I said. 'I had one friend,' she replied—'one friend; and he lies there.' Her breast heaved, but in a moment she was calm again. When everything needful was done, we left the two mourners to weep together over the sudden stroke, which had left the one childless, and the other widowed in heart. He whom they loved had, almost without a death-pang, passed into the world of endless sunshine. His was the bright side of death; its darkness and shadow had fallen upon them. But that God who had already done so much both for him and for them was still with them, and their great sorrow but drew them nearer to him. No hand but his could dry their tears—no voice but his could speak peace to their hearts. Next day several of the children were led in, one by one, to see all that remained of their much-loved teacher. The sight of his well-known face (on which a sweet and joyous look still lingered), with all its tender and hallowed associations, stirred the fountains of love and sorrow in their young hearts. They wept piteously, and sobbed out broken words about his past kindness. Some of them clung to the bed, on which he, whose loss they so passionately lamented, lay stretched in calm, unconscious repose; whilst one or two neither sobbed nor spoke, but stood as if awe-struck in the presence of death."

"And what of the little girl?" was my next question.

"The little girl was one of the best pupils in the school. Her previous condition did not differ from that of the class usually met with in such schools. But she had made great progress in her lessons, and had become so docile, so trustworthy and affectionate, that although only twelve years old, she had been intrusted in some degree with the care of the younger children. She was eager to learn about the Saviour, and her heart, first moved by the love of her teachers, seemed gradually to open to that higher love which had originated theirs. She liked her texts and verses, and would on no account part with the little religious books which were given her. But on the night before the accident, when her mother called to see her, she brought all her little books and gave them to her, beseeching her to read them, and think of what they said. Little did either of them know that it was her dying testimony.

"There had been snow on the ground for several days, and on the morning of the fatal occurrence the sky looked dark and cloudy. 'You'll not go a long walk to-day,' said the teacher's mother to him; 'you'd better just take the children to the pond, I think.' And he did so. The ice seemed solid and firm, and they crossed and recrossed several times. They were then about to return home. All the children left the ice except little B——, who, getting suddenly timid, stood helplessly near the middle of the pond. Perhaps she had heard the ice cracking, or had felt it giving way.

"Mr. — went towards her, holding out his hand. The additional weight hastened the catastrophe. The ice gave way, and opened on all sides. Mr. — flung his plaid to the female teacher, who called out to him to save himself, as she saw with agony that two lives were to be lost instead of one. But he thought only of rescuing the child. Once he had her on the edge of the ice, but in trying to turn round she overbalanced herself, and both went down together. Miss —— tried to throw his plaid towards him (he was so near the shore), but he was unable to catch it. She called to the children to run for help, but they only clung around her, and their loud cries did not alarm the passers by, as they thought they were at play.

"Assistance came, however, but too late. The bodies were brought to the surface, and every effort was made to restore animation, but in vain. Their spirits had fled. The teacher had gone home to God, taking with him the once ignorant and destitute child. He had tried to save her earthly life, and had only lost his own; but we believe that he had been the means of leading her to seek that better life, on the full enjoyment of which they had now entered together."

This was my friend's story, told with the earnest tones and gestures of an eye-witness. My feelings were more deeply stirred than is usual at a morning visit, and I could not refrain from going soon after to see the mother of the young man whose death was so much deplored. She was feeble and deeply-stricken, but looked quite calm and placid. Both her manner and her words evinced the most entire resignation. She said:—

"I've had six of a family, five of them died very young, but he lived to be my hope and comfort. I thought he would have laid my head in the grave, but the Lord's will be done."

After talking for some time, she said:—

"The Lord is good and gracious; he has been kind to me and my bairns. I prayed that they might all be saved from sin, and made happy for ever, and I believe that he has answered my prayers. I had mony a wish for my laddie, and they're all more than fulfilled now. He is with Jesus, and like him; what more could I desire? And I'll no be lang ahint him."

And she did not long survive him, for in less than a year her chastened and submissive spirit had also joined the blessed company who have "come out of great tribulation, and washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

The school passed into other-hands, but it was long before the children ceased to mourn for their late teacher. And he was missed, too, in other departments of work. Not long before his death he had been asked to take the charge of some district meetings, commenced for the purpose of bringing religious truth to those who were utterly ignorant of it, or averse to its claims. The clergyman who had planned these meetings, and put them under the care of the ragged-school teacher, said, with much satisfaction in reference to him, "And now I've got the right man in the right place"—so apparent in his character were the qualities which fit a man for dealing with those who know nothing of truth or goodness, and the evils of whose nature have never been restrained. For he sought to follow in the steps of that Master who, although infinitely pure and holy himself, yet drew near in unutterable love and pity to the chief of sinners, bringing his blood to cleanse away all their sin, his infinite wisdom into contact with their ignorance, and using his divine power to melt their hard and stubborn hearts, and regenerate their whole moral nature. No wonder that one who lived in constant fellowship with Christ should show disinterested love to men, or that he should be wise and patient, gentle, yet firm, ever seeking their highest good, and thus giving to others a dim reflection of those graces which shone so brightly in his Lord. It may interest some to know that the book which my friend found on his table, and which he seemed to have been reading, was Dr. Guthrie's "Gospel in Ezekiel." The mark was between the 14th and 15th pages. Strangely enough, at the bottom of the 15th page the words occur with which I close my little narrative:—

"As surely as yon planet worlds that roll and shine above us, draw radiance from the sun around which they move, so surely shall they shine who spend and are spent in Jesus' service; they shall share his honours, and shine in his lustre. The man, however lowly his condition, who, some way between his cradle and the tomb, has converted even one soul to God, has not lived in vain, nor laboured for nought, but has achieved a great work. He may be well content to go down into the grave by men unpraised, by the world unknown. His works, if they have not preceded, shall follow him; and needing no tablet raised among mouldering bones and tombstones, he has a monument to his memory, where there are neither griefs nor groans, more costly than brass or marble. Others may have filled the world with the breath of their name; he has helped to fill heaven. Others may have won an earthly renown, but he who, one himself, has sought to make others Christians; who, reaching the rock himself, draws another—a perishing child, brother, friend, neighbour—up; plucked from the flood himself, pulls another out; who has leaped into the depths that he might rise with a pearl, and set it lustrous in Jesus' crown;—he is the man who shall wear heaven's brightest honours, and to whom before all else the Lord will say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

EVEN ME.

LORD, I hear of showers of blessing
Thou art scattering full and free,
Showers the thirsty land refreshing;
Let some droppings fall on me,—
Even me.

Pass me not, O God my Father,
Sinful though my heart may be;
Thou might'st leave me, but the rather Let thy mercy light on me,—
Even me.

Pass me not, O gracious Saviour;
 Let me live and cling to thee;
 Fain I'm longing for thy favour;
 While thou'rt calling, calling me,—
 Even me.

Pass me not, O mighty Spirit;
 Thou canst make the blind to see;
 Witnesser of Jesu's merit,
 Speak the word of power to me,—
 Even me.

Have I long in sin been sleeping—
 Long been alighting, grieving thee?
 Has the world my heart been keeping?
 Oh! forgive and rescue me,—
 Even me.

Love of God, so pure and changeless!
 Blood of Christ, so rich and free!
 Grace of God, so strong and boundless!—
 Magnify it all in me,—
 Even me.

Pass me not—thy lost one bringing,
 Bind my heart, O Lord, to thee;
 Whilst the streams of life are springing,
 Blessing others, oh! bless me,—
 Even me.

—Hymns for the Church on Earth.

JERICHO.

MANY a broad track beaten by the tramp of armies, and many a by-path worn by saintly feet, meet and cross upon the open plain into which the valley of the Jordan widens, when the river, after foaming and leaping down the long gorge from Tiberias, flows with deep and rapid current towards the Dead Sea. Long before the "desert wearied tribes" crossed the cloven river over against Jericho, and went up through the mountain-glens to possess their goodly heritage, the towers and bulwarks of a stately city of Canaan rose above the thick ever-green forest that overspread the plain. From his lofty watch-tower on the blue ridges of Moab, their dying law-giver "beheld the land of Judah, and the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm-trees, unto Zoar." And from the first days of the Hebrew settlement onward through centuries of varying fortune, the name of Jericho acquired an ominous renown, a fateful interest, which still lingered round it when the Great Prophet of the Church passed under the wayside sycamore, and brought salvation to one of its many homes.

In the heart of a fruitful region, and at the entrance of two of the main passes into the inland country of Palestine, Jericho became a position of critical importance in the wars of Israel. It was the first heathen stronghold that arrested the march of Joshua from the banks of Jordan; and under its massive ramparts the armies of God learned how they were to wage their appointed warfare,—not by might, nor by power, but "by faith the walls of Jericho fell down." The city was laid utterly desolate, and the site branded as a lasting monument of vengeance by a curse on the man who should attempt to raise it from its ruins. Not till the days of Ahab was the sacred interdict broken through, and the doom fulfilled in the person of Hiel the Bethelite, who "laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in Segub his youngest son, according to the word of the Lord." Soon after we find a school of the prophets established there, and the place was visited by Elijah in his memorable journey to the scene of his translation. The situation of the city was pleasant, but "the water was naught, and the ground barren," till Elisha, at the request of the townsmen, healed the bitter spring by casting salt into its waters. About two miles from the modern village, where some scattered ruins mark the site of the ancient city, a large fountain, now called the "spring of the Sultan," but long known as "Elisha's well," gushes up at the foot of some low hills. Its square basin is overshadowed by a luxuriant fig-tree, and pours forth a clear and copious stream, which branches through the plain, and marks its course everywhere by streaks and clumps of the brightest verdure. To this limpid source, along with the waters of another spring, the plain of Jordan owes all its fertility. Van de Velde speaks of "the splendid gush of water" which this fountain sends through the plain; and the thick, dark woods around it he describes as forming the most romantic forest scenery he had seen in Palestine.

Long after Elisha's time, the highway-side near the city was the scene of another miracle, when our Lord, with a crowd thronging round him, "stood still" at the cry of blind Bartimeus, and restored his sight. At this period Jericho had attained its highest degree of splendour and prosperity. The well-watered tract, with its forests of palm and balsam trees stretching for miles, yielded royal revenues, and its richness and beauty made it a possession coveted by kings. The love-sick Roman bestowed it as a princely appanage on Cleopatra, hanging the costly jewel in the ear of the fair Egyptian, to be dissolved and drunk at some luxurious banquet on the Nile. On the sunny slopes of Jericho, and in its ever-verdant glades, all the luscious fruits of the East reddened and mellowed; and in the hot summer air beds of spikenard and camphire, calamus and myrrh, mingled their incense-steam of spice with the fragrance of its thickets of roses. It was a "place where heaven's breath smelt wooingly,"—a "heavenly country," as Josephus calls it, whose description of its delicious climate and natural loveliness reminds one of his finely-touched picture of the happy region which bloomed on the shore of Genesareth. The city was the favourite winter residence of Herod the Great, and was embellished by him with many fair and majestic structures.

He built a palace and a fortress, and a magnificent circus, in which, when he lay on his death-bed, he ordered the Jewish nobles to be confined, and massacred on his decease, that the whole nation might be put into mourning. During the siege of Jerusalem Jericho was destroyed by the Romans; and after it was rebuilt it survived with many vicissitudes to the troublous times of the Crusades, struggling for life and gradually fading, till it has now dwindled into a wretched village, which, at some distance from the ancient site, preserves the shadow of the name of Herod's royal city.

This hamlet, which is called Er-Riha, consists of a few mud hovels and Bedouin tents, and is one of the most miserable in Palestine. One palm-tree, the last survivor of the ancient forest, was to be seen in 1838, but has now disappeared. The soil may be as fruitful, and the climate as genial as of old, but the labour of the vintager and husbandman has ceased, and the garden of Palestine has become a wilderness. The springs and rivulets which still flow through it give it a look of greenness and fertility, which contrasts with the bare mountain ranges which surround it; but it is the fruitless luxuriance of a wild and untrained nature. The glades of "tangled forest-shrub," with the rills trickling through them, are said to "recall the scenery of an English park."

The brooks are thickly skirted with nebbuk-trees,—the Spina Christi,—of whose long pliant twigs it is supposed the crown of thorns was made. Dr. Robinson identifies the brook Cherith, where Elijah was fed by ravens, with the Wady Kelt, a deep glen, through which a mountain torrent, streaked with verdure, bursts into the plain.

The only striking relic of antiquity in the neighbourhood is a square castellated structure overlooking the village, and pointed out to the crowd of pilgrims, who flock every year to bathe in Jordan, as the house of Zaccheus. This, of course, is quite apocryphal, the building being probably a stronghold of the age of the Crusades. As long as the solitary palm-tree stood near the village, it was venerated as the sycamore-tree into which the owner of this castle had climbed,—a fair sample of the value of the monkish traditions of Palestine.

The most impressive point of interest connected with Jericho is the long descent, through a succession of wild and gloomy ravines, by which it is approached from Jerusalem, illustrating, as it does, with singular force and clearness the incidents of the parable of the Good Samaritan. The road winds through the bottom of savage gorges, or rises steeply along the edge of precipices, only to sink deeper into narrow passes and glens still more desolate, cloven through naked cliffs of limestone. Here, without an escort, sometimes with one, the traveller may still "fall among thieves;" and none can pass that way, through the heart of these stern and rugged solitudes, without a sensation of awe and peril. A particular part of the road, the scene of many a murder, was called the red or bloody way; and here in Jerome's time a fort was placed with a Roman garrison, for the protection of travellers. "The region," says an American writer, "is so scarred, gashed, and torn, that no work of mankind can save it from perpetual desolation. It is a wilderness more hopeless than the desert. If I were left alone in the midst of it, I should lie down and await death without thought or hope of rescue." The heat reflected from those ghastly walls of rock, the sultry ash-coloured vapour brooding over the white hollows like the smoke of a furnace, with no breath of air to lift it, the scorching sirocco blowing in fiery gusts, render the "going down" into the Jordan valley a most fatiguing journey; and the frightful sterility and silence of the place gives one an impression, till then unfelt, of the horrors of the situation in which a traveller would find himself stretched bleeding by the wayside and left to die.

Yet apart from the excitement and glow of emotion which must be kindled by passing over ground so memorable, a higher and more enduring good may be reaped by the thoughtful student of God's word, and borne away with him as an heritage for ever. A firmer grasp of spiritual truth, a deeper and clearer insight into the spirit of the gospel, may be gained on a spot like this, where the mind is strangely opened to the power and tenderness of the sacred story with which it is associated. It will surely remind him, that as He of whom the Good Samaritan was a type had passed along this rugged way in his earthly day of foot-wandering and weariness, there is no path of life so arduous and lonesome, no road of suffering so strange and fearful, that his servants may not hope to find his presence still and for ever there, as a guide in difficulty, a light in darkness, and a help in trouble. And does it not teach the sinner, burdened with his guilt, lying by the world's wayside wounded, weary, helpless, uncared for by man, that there is no extremity of spiritual distress so great, no corner of God's earth so hidden and dark, that the cry of his anguish cannot reach the ear of the Good Physician, and bring him near to "heal the broken in heart, and bind up their wounds?"

I was a stricken deer, that left the herd
Long since; with many an arrow deep infixt
My panting side was charged, when I withdrew
To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
There was I found by One who had himself
Been hurt by th' archers. In his side he bore,
And in his hands and feet, the cruel scars;
With gentle force soliciting the darts,
He drew them forth, and healed, and bade me live

PROFESSOR GEORGE WILSON.

PART FIRST.

DR. GEORGE WILSON of Edinburgh, one of the most amiable and delightful of men, passed away upwards of a year ago from hundreds who loved him on earth. These, and thousands beside, will be gladdened to find him, though dead, yet speaking, in a most interesting memoir written by a surviving sister. In a magazine intended for Sabbath reading, we cannot enter into all the details of his active and various life, or follow the elastic play of a mind that had, to the last, much that was boyish and feminine in it. Those who have the opportunity of doing so will derive much pleasure and profit from a perusal of the whole; but there is so much in Dr. Wilson's life, especially towards its close, that is so directly fitted to instruct and attract all survivors with the highest kind of instruction and the most enduring and blessed attraction, that we gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity of referring to it. Even as a natural man, the track of this gentle spirit among his fellow-men was like "a line of light" across a broken sea. But this biography reveals, what all did not know, how much and how truly his path was that of the "shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." His last years are full of desires and hopes to engage more directly and fully in the work of drawing others Godwards than his avocations allowed him to do. These aspirations to build the temple of the Lord seemed to have been partially disappointed by a too early death; but the hands of sisterly affection have supplied his "lack of service;" and it was accepted in that it was in his heart, and fulfilled now that he is gone.

He was born (and lived and died) in Edinburgh. Of his earliest years there is no account, his wishes for the "autobiography of a baby" not being likely to be ever realized, and any attempts, (like that of Augustine), to fill up the void by guessing, being abundantly unsuccessful. But as to the boy there is large information. Active, happy, a great walker, a great reader, full of stories, full of observation, full of fun, friendship, good nature, and good-humour, he loved all things about him—relatives, friends, acquaintances, dogs, cats, and white mice. At the age of fourteen, having chosen the profession of medicine, he was apprenticed in the Royal Infirmary, and suffered there some harm and loss. "Ah me!" he says afterwards, "when I recall some of the enforced companions of my apprentice days, I feel that I would make the greatest sacrifices rather than permit a youth dear to me to encounter similar temptations." Yet though he felt this so keenly, or rather because he felt this so keenly, the injury actually done to him seems to have been slight, and he passed through the years of his medical and other studies happily and well. In the words which he himself used with regard to a friend, "The dew of his youth was still upon him. The corrupting breath of the world had not tainted his freshness, or its cold touch chilled him. His eager eyes looked forth on a rich and boundless future. Young men of genius and tastes like his own had become his attached friends. Seniors of the highest repute welcomed him as a pupil. Libraries and museums of the greatest value were open to him daily. His shortest walks were through the streets of a city which delighted his artist-eye, and had a strange fascination for him." During his studies he turned his attention especially to chemistry, on which subject, after taking his degree, he became a lecturer. And now all the hopes of his life culminated, only to be suddenly thrown down. Disease and intense suffering in the foot compelled him to give up all work, and soon after (in the year 1843) it became evident that, to save life, amputation must be performed. Nor was it at all certain that the operation might not itself produce the fatal result, which without it was unavoidable. In this darkness and distress George Wilson first turned to God. "When I was recently struggling in a great fight of afflictions, soul and body racked and anguished, my life hanging in the balance, and eternity in prospect, I prayed to God for light and help, and my prayer was heard and answered." His great and best friend at this time, and ever after, was John Cairns, now Dr. Cairns of Berwick. "I remember," says Dr. Cairns, "with vivid accuracy, the earnestness with which, on the last occasion I saw him before the operation, he spoke of the danger before him, and of the great anxiety, mingled with trembling hope in Christ, which he showed as to his spiritual state. He took the Bible, asked me to read and explain or enforce some passage, and then pray. The remembrance of that day survives while the multitude of other conversations have left only a vague impression of progress and saving enlightenment."

He suffered terribly at the operation, and never forgot the occasion. "The season always comes back to me as a very solemn one; yet if, like Jacob, I halt as I walk, I trust that, like him, I come out of that awful wrestling with a blessing I never received before." So from a slow recovery, as his friend tells us, "he came forth with a spirit strengthened from heaven, to bear the life-long burden of a feeble body, and to accept life on the most disadvantageous terms as a blessed and divine ministry. The inward man had gained infinitely more than the outward man had lost; and, with all his originally noble qualities exalted, there was found a humility, a gentleness, a patience, a self-forgetfulness, and a dedication of life to Christian ends and uses, which henceforth made every place and work sacred."

This was a year, not only of personal, but of relative trials, and while he rejoiced habitually with them that rejoiced, he was ever ready, and often called, to weep with them that wept. Thus, on his first going out, when saying, "I can now walk the streets alone, trusting to my stick only for support. This is a great deal, like a new life to me. Crocuses, and snow-drops, and hepaticas are growing old, and tulips and hyacinths flinging forth their flowers"—he adds, with regard to a cousin dying of consumption, "It would sadden you to hear James dwell on the loveliness of green parks filled with violets and buttercups, and spring flowers, as on things which he will never see. Where he is going he will see 'better things than these,' and these may not be wanting also." A month after, his friend died, and he writes to Dr. Cairns, "I never knew how much I loved him till now, how worthy he was of being loved, how unkind I often was to him. I have tried in vain all last week to get through a little needful work. Had it been hand-work I could have done it; but I had to think and write, and my mind wandered always to the thought of my dear cousin taken away. I can unburden my heart to you, and confess that I have wept more this week than ever before since childhood, without fearing you will think me less a man or a Christian for that." But six years after he was able to say, "If I often feel that a fine ethereal genius like his would have done much to exalt and refine my nature, had we lived together, yet life was to him such a bitter, dreary wilderness, that I could not wish him back, whatever might be the gain to me. To die and be with Christ, was for him, above all my lost ones, far better than any career of earthly life could have been."

Before going on to the ten years of active life that followed, let us take a charming and characteristic description of the cottage near Morningside, where, after these sorrows, he spent the summer. He called it Sleepy Hollow, and says in a letter, "This is a most sweet spot, and no day is more delightful here than Sabbath. I miss the prayers of my brethren much; the sermons far less. Here I have hosts of preceptors, who lift up a stave whenever they have a mind, and I never lift staves at them. The blackbirds begin to know me, and a little bird (name unknown), on a tree above my head, sings a Te Deum laudamus of three notes, of which I never tire. The delight I feel in gazing at flowers and insects, and watching the trees grow, the shadows on the hills, and the changing aspects of the sky, I shall never be able to make any one understand. I can give it no utterance in words. I am sure, however, that it is innocent, healthful, and though I am slow to use solemn words needlessly, even holy, for this garden has been to me an oratory, such as no other place has been. I spent this forenoon reading the story of Joseph and his brethren, onwards to the end of Genesis. It is long since I read it through, and though no part of the Bible is better known to me, or more tenderly remembered in connection with happy childhood (perhaps, indeed, for that very reason), it moved me almost to tears. I felt the hysterica passio, the gulp in the throat, and should have fairly wept had I attempted to read it aloud. The dignity, simplicity, and pathos of the scene have never, I imagine, been excelled, and the wonderful way in which the old romantic story momentarily reveals God himself shaping all its events to the most important, but far-distant issues, and yet leaves the human interest in the tale to go forth unchecked by the awe or even sense of the supernatural, struck me to-day as it never did before. I spent two hours, which fled away, in reading the account and thinking over it, ending with the grand prophecy of Jacob as to the destinies of his descendants, which always seems to me to resound like the triumphal march of an army going forth conquering and to conquer. For the blessing of Jacob on Ephraim and Manasseh I have another and a more subdued feeling. Many a time, when I was a child, and in early youth, has mother invoked on my head and my twin-brother's, as we slept together, the benediction,—'The Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads.' That prayer has been answered in full for one of them, who bade me farewell some twelve years ago, in assured hope of a blessed resurrection, and the other rejoices to know that he is the child of many prayers."

From this period to the close of life, he was an active worker, as a lecturer and a scientific and literary man, under the greatest physical difficulties. "While lecturing ten, eleven, or more hours weekly, sometimes with pulse at one hundred and fifty, it was frequently with torturing setons and open blister wounds;" but with that "unconquerable gaiety of heart" which overflowed everything, he made light of these "bosom friends," as he called them. Besides lecturing to his students, he occasionally gave lectures to educational and religious institutions. "I have too much wrought only at science and literature, hoping to secure a position which would enable me to serve Christ effectually. But many things warn me that my life will be a short one, and that what I can do must be done swiftly." At one of these lectures in Edinburgh, a city missionary "came up to me before the lecture commenced, and said apologetically, 'We generally begin with prayer; have you any objection to our doing so now?' I at once said 'No;' and he offered up (what Scotch prayers on such occasions are not always) a brief, expressive, singularly appropriate prayer, in which he prayed for me as a chemist. I cannot tell you how I was touched. I said in my secret heart, 'I'll give him another lecture for that.' We chemists are generally held to be men who, provided we can tell ink from blacking when asked, do not require moral characters. No doubt, we get our share of the prayers for all sorts and conditions of men, but I want something more. The day I hope will come when, without cant, or formality, or hypocrisy, a class and its teacher will together ask God's blessing on their work before they begin. If we can't be Christians in all our daily work, of what worth is our Christianity?"

There are two very striking passages in the biography, where this most tolerant and loving of men expresses from his heart the sadness he felt in looking out upon those who had no true Christian hope or work. "I rejoice," he writes to his friend Dr. Gladstone, "to hear of your success with the young men. God bless you in your work! It is worth all other work, and far beyond all Greek and Roman fame, all literary or scientific triumphs. And yet it is quite compatible with both. Douglas Jerrold's life is most sad to read. In many respects it gave me a far higher estimate of him morally than I had had before. Indeed, I did not pretend to know nor to judge him, but I fancied him to have been a less loveable, domestic person than he was. But what a pagan look-out! What an ethnic view of this world and the next! He might as well have been born in the days of Socrates or Seneca as in these days, for any good Christ's coming apparently did him. There is something unspeakably sad in his life, and it was better than that of many a littérateur. The ferocity of attack on cant and hypocrisy; the girding at religion, which they cannot leave alone; above all, the dreary, meagre, cheerless, formal faith, and the dim and doubtful prospect for the future, are features in that littérateur life most saddening and disheartening. And the men of science, are they better? . . . Standing in that maddest of all attitudes, with finger pointed to this religious body and that body, as if at the day of judgment it would avail them anything that the Baptists were bigoted, and the Quakers self-righteous!"

To his friend, Mr. Alexander Macmillan of Cambridge, he had written in 1850, "In what you say of Christ and his example, I cordially join. It is a blessed thing, as a friend said to me, to have a creed; not that any man will be bettered by adopting one, unless it is his soul's belief. I mourn, however, over many whom I know, who are always learning, and never coming to a knowledge of the truth; who are bewailing the bigotry, narrowness, and effectlessness of modern Churches, and seeking for some new catholicon to heal all. Far be it from me to defend our religious bodies from many of the charges made against them. Men are both worse and better than their creeds, which are but imperfect standards by which to try them. Religion should be a life, not a doctrine; and if we cannot find what it should be as the former, from the life of our blessed Lord and Saviour, I know not where we shall find it. Often do I think of those startling words, 'When the Son of man cometh, will he find faith on the earth?' If men, instead of fretting themselves because their neighbours are foolish religionists, would leave them and their real or supposed follies alone, and go to Him who is all wisdom, and all holiness, and all love, they would find differences of creed adjust themselves in the light of that love of God, and that love of our neighbour as ourselves, which are the fulfilling of the law. I rejoice that I have a creed with which I can face death and eternity, and which makes this life often a joyous worship, and always a patient endurance. My prayer is for a closer union to Christ my Saviour; to be able to say, as St. Thomas did, with my whole heart, 'My Lord and my God;' to realize to the fullest, his personality and his humanity; and to walk in his steps as a lowly follower, and disciple, and servant. For all my friends, as for myself, I ever ask this blessing."

ELUCIDATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

"Have ye never read what David did? . . . How he went into the house of God, in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shew-bread."—MARK II. 25, 26.

Of the three evangelists who notice the incident of the disciples plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath, and what our Lord said in vindication of them, St. Mark alone brings in the name of Abiathar; the others give simply Christ's appeal to the case of David, as having in a great strait obtained for himself and his companions the hallowed bread of the sanctuary and eaten it. The mention here of Abiathar, and the coupling of his name with the title of high priest, involves the allusion in some difficulty, since the passage which relates the historical transaction most distinctly associates the office of high priest at the time with Ahimelech the father—not with Abiathar the son (1 Sam. xxii.). And in order to explicate this difficulty, commentators have usually resorted to arbitrary suppositions,—such as that Ahimelech probably bore also the name of Abiathar, or that the expression may mean only in the presence of Abiathar, who afterwards became high priest, not that he was at the time in the actual discharge of its functions; while others charge the text with inaccuracy, and assert the passage in the Gospel to be in manifest contrariety with the facts recorded in Samuel. There is no need, however, for betaking to any such unwarranted suppositions or rash conclusions. The passage as it stands admits of a perfectly natural explanation, if only the current language of our Lord's time respecting the priesthood is correctly understood and properly applied.

In order to perceive this aright, it must be known and borne in mind, that between the close of the Old Testament period and the commencement of the New, a marked change had taken place in the affairs of the priesthood, and the relation in which its leading members stood to the Jewish commonwealth. A simply English reader of the Bible can scarcely fail, if reading with attention, to discern certain signs of the change. In the last book of the Old Testament (Malachi), the priesthood as a class appear in a poor and depressed condition,—without political influence, without much even of religious consideration, held in small esteem by the people, and frequently defrauded of their legal dues. But the moment we open the writings of the New Testament we find an entirely different state of things: the priestly class has now risen to the highest position of respect and authority; the people everywhere stand in awe of them; and though the supreme power was wielded by others, yet the direction of local interests, and to a considerable extent the management also of civil affairs, had come to be in priestly hands. This altered and more influential position was the result of the Maccabean struggles, which were mainly conducted by distinguished members of the priesthood, and which were so thoroughly successful in regard to their immediate object, that not only was the practical independence of the nation achieved, but the priesthood became the virtual heads of the commonwealth, and the high priest even bore for generations the name of king. Hence the historian Josephus, in the account he gives of his own life, lays particular stress on his priestly descent, especially by his mother's side, for she belonged to the Asmonean family of the priesthood, which, he says, "had both the office of the high priesthood and the dignity of a king for a long time together;" so that he felt entitled to represent himself as being "of the royal blood." After the conquest of Judea by the Romans, this undue political ascendancy on the part of the priesthood—not warranted by the law, and at variance with the tenor and spirit of its provisions—again gave way, but only in respect to the higher functions of government; and much of the ordinary administration of civil as well as sacred matters remained under their control. As a matter of course, the distinctions among the priesthood themselves underwent a certain modification: the distance practically narrowed itself between the official head of the entire order and those who shared with him in his administrative functions; while the members of this ruling body, the associates and partners of the high priest, necessarily rose above the common ranks of the priesthood, and in some sense occupied the position of a higher grade.

Now, the language in current use quite naturally formed itself after this new state of things; and instead of one high priest, as in earlier times, there were many who, in common parlance, went by the name of high priests. This is disguised to the English reader of the New Testament by the term chief priests being substituted for high priests. But the word in the original is the same; and it is only by its being used in the singular, and in an emphatical manner (most commonly by having the article prefixed—the high priest), that we know it to be meant of him who enjoyed the supreme honours of the priesthood. So used were the evangelists to this application of the term, that it sometimes drops from them in connections in which at first sight it scarcely seems to suit; as at Luke iii. 2, where, among the public personages existing at the time of John Baptist's appearance, we read, "in the days of high-priest Annas and Caiaphas" (so it stands in all the ancient copies without exception, and so it should stand in our Bibles); or again, at Acts xix. 14, where certain exorcists are designated "the seven sons of Sceva, a Jew, high priest,"—high, that is, in the sense of chief, as it is properly rendered in the English Bible: their father held the rank of a chief priest.

To apply all this to the passage before us, we have simply to regard our Lord as using the expression high or chief priest in the more general and popular sense, which it so commonly bore in his day, in order to see the perfect propriety of the language employed respecting Abiathar. It was when Abiathar held the place of a chief priest (there is no article in the original) that David approached the courts of God's house, and obtained the shew-bread. This is simply what he tells us; and when so understood, there is scarcely even the shadow of a difficulty. For although Ahimelech might still more peculiarly and emphatically have been referred to under that designation, yet as we know comparatively nothing of Ahimelech, while Abiathar enjoyed a life-long connection with David, and was manifestly a full-grown man, in the regular exercise of priestly functions at the time in question, it was both natural and fitting that he, rather than his father, should be named. Not only David, who ate the bread, but Abiathar also, who, as a chief priest at the time, had a charge at the tabernacle while it was given, had an honourable standing in the eyes of those with whom our Lord was contending. How could they justly dispute a principle which had received the joint sanction of their greatest king and his most confidential priest? This is what our Lord meant to press,—what his language, when viewed in accordance with the usage of the time, was specially adapted for pressing; and no forced or fanciful suppositions are required to explicate the meaning. THE WORLD HARVEST.

THEY are sowing their seed in the daylight fair,
They are sowing their seed in the noonday's glare,
They are sowing their seed in the soft twilight,
They are sowing their seed in the solemn night;
What shall the harvest be?

They are sowing the seed of noble deed,
With a sleepless watch and an earnest heed;
With a ceaseless hand o'er the earth they sow,
And the fields are whitening where'er they go;
Rich will the harvest be!

And some are sowing the seeds of pain,
Of late remorse, and in maddened brain,
And the stars shall fall and the sun shall wane,
Ere they root the weeds from their soil again;
Dark will the harvest be!

Sown in darkness or sown in light,
Sown in weakness or sown in might,
Sown in meekness or sown in wrath,
In the broad work-field or the shadowy path,
Sure will the harvest be! anon

MEMORIALS OF THE BOLTON FAMILY.*

It is not on the assumption of the distinguished place of Mr. Bolton as a preacher and minister in England or America, that this volume, with its touching "memorials" of a faithful worker and his saintly beloved wife, is now published. We do not object to the biographies of men who were not distinguished. It is a relief to escape from the lives of men of world-wide fame into some of the quieter nooks and corners of human life, and learn how those who were not amongst the stars of their day, shined within their narrower circles a stiller, but not less hallowed light. We have admired the prize flowers of a horticultural exhibition around which were gathered the pride of a country, yet have we never plucked sweeter ones than from the rural ally, or hedgerow, or untrodden downs.

It is too much assumed that biography should limit itself to great men. It were perhaps more true to say that it finds its least instructive function when its subject is the illustrious dead. What we need from the lives that have been lived are examples that will teach us how to live more wisely,—lives that approach to our own in social position, talents, capacities, trials, and opportunities. Great men, like the stars that shine in the high heavens, are too far above us to light our common pathway on the earth. To show how "to do good in the family and in the Church in ways open to all," is the professed design of the Memorials of Mr. and Mrs. Bolton. "Our simple object," says the able and excellent author of the "Memorials," "is to furnish some ordinary accounts of Christian character in the various relations and circumstances of life, some more of those providential displays perpetually occurring in the experience of the Lord's people, some more answers to prayer, some more tributes to the faithfulness of our covenant God—in the full persuasion that, just because they are ordinary, they are more likely to prove useful." The following sketch from the volume will show how truly the writer has accomplished what he proposes to himself, in the memorials of his attached departed relatives.

Robert Bolton, who is the chief subject of these "Memorials," was an American by birth, and was born in Savannah, Georgia, September 1788. He was a descendant of the ancient Puritan divine of that name, whose work, which bears the awakening title of "The Four Last Things: Death, Judgment, Hell, and Heaven," is still read amongst us. Of this well-known ancestor, the characteristic anecdote was preserved in the family, that when on his death-bed he summoned his children around him, and charged them, in the most earnest yet affectionate manner "that none of them should dare to think of meeting him at the great tribunal in an unregenerated state." The father of Mr. Bolton, an extensive and successful cotton planter in the South, appears to have been a man worthy of his descent from the great Puritan. When on a journey, and yet at the early age of forty-five, he was attacked with an inflammation of the lungs, which in a few days proved fatal. On his death-bed he dictated the following letter to his young family, which we cannot abstain from inserting here, it is so remarkable for its calmness and Christian sense, and for the light it throws on the convictions of the good men of the Southern States of that time on their duty to their slaves and their responsibility as owners of property in man:—

"My dear children,—Being about to be called by my heavenly Father to my eternal home, and leaving you in a world full of vice and wickedness, I feel it my duty to enjoin you to remember your God and Saviour while you are young, and to walk in his ordinances. . . . Study the Holy Scriptures; read them with attention, and they will furnish you with a fund of wholesome and saving knowledge. Other books you can read to improve your understanding, but this to improve your heart. Never suffer the poor and distressed to depart from your door with a frown. Remember you are only stewards, and woe be unto those that are unfaithful to their trust! Be kind to your servants: know that they are not your slaves by right, but by custom. God made all free; but man, in his depraved state, enslaves his fellow-man. Therefore it is your duty to make that servitude more a pleasure than a burden. I trust we shall all meet in a happier world through a gracious Redeemer, so at present I bid you farewell."

His will contained the following striking injunctions: "I strictly forbid a public sale of my negroes, either for the purpose of division or for any other reason: if they must be disposed of, they shall choose their own masters. I give to my son Robert my gold watch, that he may know how time passes, and to teach him to improve it. I give to my son James my silver-mounted small sword (a sword that had been presented to him by General Washington), never to be unsheathed but in a virtuous cause. To which ever of my sons may be inclined to much company and drinking I give my portrait, strictly enjoining the unfortunate youth to give it the most conspicuous place in his dining-room, that when he views it, he may recollect that it represents a father who never was intoxicated, and whose detestation of that vice should restrain his sons from the practice of it."

We are not surprised when told of such a man that when captured on the occasion of the British attack on Savannah, 1778, and placed on board a prisoners' ship, he was suffered to escape by the negro guard, who recognised him; and who, to make sure of his safety, not only watched for the proper opportunity to liberate his prisoner, but swam with him across the river on his back.

* "Footsteps of the Flock: Memorials of the Rev. Robert Bolton, Rector of Felham, U. S., and Chaplain to the Earl of Ducie; and of Mrs. Bolton." By the Rev. W. J. Bolton, A.M., Curate of St. James, Brighton. London: Hamilton, Adams, and Co, 33 Paternoster Row. 1860.

Mr. Bolton was old enough at the death of his father to feel the loss, and to recollect how great an impression it made upon his mind. It was chiefly, however, to his mother's influence at that time that his first decided religious feelings were to be traced. After the loss of his father she took him much into her room; and, especially on Sabbath morning before going to church, would ask him to read hymns to her, often saying with a mother's fondness, "What would I not give to see you a minister of Jesus Christ!" This desire she was not destined to see realized. She was too soon for her children called to follow their father, being struck with paralysis about two years after his death, under which she lingered only a few days and expired. On her removal Robert found a spiritual counsellor in the family coachman, a pious man of colour, who, in his zeal, seems never to have lost an opportunity of speaking a word in or out of season to his young master. While Andrew Marshall, for that was the worthy negro's name, was cleaning down the horses in the stable, or driving the family out into the country, there was sure to be something for "Massa Robert" if he were but by his side. "Massa Robert must be a Christian," he would say; "I pray every day for young massa to be good minister of Jesus Christ." These pious suggestions, offered with the utmost respect, and backed by a thorough consistency of character, told upon the youthful mind, and led with other things to Mr. Bolton's early establishment in grace. His father's kindness to his slaves, and labours in their instruction, had the high reward of one of the despised class becoming the instrument of the conversion of the future head of the family. Nor must we omit the fact, mentioned in these memorials, that Andrew was eventually elected the pastor of the first congregation of black people in Savannah; and Mr. Bolton, then in England, had the pleasure of assisting him by sending him out Matthew Henry's Commentary, and other works, which were thankfully received, and well used. Years after this, on revisiting his native place, Mr. Bolton found the old man, then with snow-white hair, holding on his way, having lived down much persecution, and regularly and efficiently serving a congregation of a thousand souls. Being at that time an ordained clergyman of the Episcopal Church of America, he proposed to officiate for him, to which the venerable man, though himself a Baptist, humbly and gladly assented. The place of worship was crowded, and never was there a more attentive audience. At the conclusion of the service, an aged coloured person, who had once been a servant in the family, was heard to exclaim, with the usual animation of her race, "Only to think of my hearing Massa Robert preach, and that to my satisfaction too!"

Many years had to pass in Mr. Bolton's life, and with more than their usual vicissitudes, before the event occurred which we have now narrated. Though he never appears at any time to have abandoned his mother's early and fond thought that he should be a minister of Jesus Christ, his course of youthful training was but partially directed to that object. Being his own master, and possessed of ample means, after studying a while under a tutor at Newark, U. S., he terminated his brief course by a voyage across the Atlantic, embarking in one of his own vessels bound for Liverpool. While making his tour through England, it was his happiness to be introduced to one whose name stood high for half a century amongst her great preachers and evangelical lights. Mr. Jay of Bath was at that time in the full tide of his popularity and usefulness; Burke, Sheridan, and other celebrities had not only listened to, but praised him. Hannah More and William Wilberforce never lost an opportunity of waiting on his ministry. When Bishop Shirley heard him, he pronounced him an extraordinary man, whose commanding energy of manner and weight of style gave authority to what he said, and whose utterances attested themselves to be the result of much thinking and prayer. Into the family circle of this eminent minister our young American traveller found an introduction and a cordial welcome. The affability of Mr. Jay's manners, the cheerfulness of his mind, and the instruction of his conversation, made it a privilege to be admitted into the inner sanctuary of life at Percy Place. He shone no less in private than in public life. Young Bolton felt the atmosphere to be a congenial one. Describing afterwards his own feelings during his stay under Mr. Jay's roof, he says: "Everything in his family pleased and profited me. I saw religion in its loveliest form; and my mind already tending towards the ministry, it seemed to me that which I should desire above all things." A war threatening at that time between America and Britain, cut short the visit of the traveller, and recalled him to his native Savannah. But on returning it was with lingering looks towards the family of Mr. Jay. Whilst at Bath he had been interested in more than the conversation of its distinguished minister. Mr. Jay's eldest daughter had unconsciously drawn to herself the affections of the young American. Of this daughter her father thus speaks in his autobiography: "My first born was a daughter, and named Anne, after her mother. She seemed one of those who are sanctified from the womb; and instead of being averse to any of the duties required of her in her training, she appeared naturally and without admonition to fall in with them. When she was only seven years old, and we went away from home for a few days, the little creature not waiting for any intimation from us, read a chapter and a prayer every morning and evening with the servants." She had a thoughtful, beautiful countenance, the expression of the innocence of her mind, of her truthfulness, serenity, and sensibility. When Mr. Jay in after life heard of any of her acts of devotion and self sacrifice, he would exclaim, his eyes swimming with tears, "Noble creature!" As the crown of her attractions there was in her the grace of a genuine, though retiring piety. This was the wife which Mr. Bolton when in England chose for himself, and which God in his providence had provided for him. When he returned to the United States he wrote to Mr. Jay, making known his feelings and his wishes. The reply encouraged his hopes, provided he settled in England, and he were accepted of his daughter. The following year finds him in England, and the son-in-law of Mr. Jay. His wife seemed just the complement he needed, meeting his wants, sharing his burdens, and encouraging him in every good and holy enterprise. Forty years afterwards he thus affectionately and with the freshness of first love and its youthfulness, addresses his wife during a temporary absence from home:—"From my Wilderness, Monday.—Yes! though there are plenty of roses around me, yet it is a wilderness without my rose, and though I have two or three of your buds with me, it only makes me more sensible of my loss. Well, I must bear it as well as I can, knowing that the change will benefit you, and please the kind friends with whom you are staying."

For a season a course of unbounded prosperity lay before Mr. and Mrs. Bolton. His purpose of devoting himself exclusively to the Christian ministry was for a time suspended. It was judged by Mr. Jay and others that as there was a great need of pious laymen of wealth and influence, that he should establish himself in Liverpool as a merchant. Whilst residing there, his heart and hand were open to assist in every Christian and benevolent work, and his house the ready home of the Christian missionary who might be waiting for the vessel that was to carry him to his distant field of labour. Even then he occasionally exercised the function of the lay preacher, as may be inferred from the following characteristic note of Rowland Hill, addressed to him in January 1819:—"I am truly glad at heart that you have taken again to the work of fighting. It really concerned me when it was supposed you meant to step down from being an ambassador of Christ, to be a mere trading merchant in this world's goods. There is nothing more beneficial to the credit of religion than when persons of independent property can take up the sacred standard, that the world may be convinced that there are some noble souls that can give themselves up to the work of God, for the sake of no other gain than the gain of souls. In this work, my dear sir, may you go on and prosper, and may you have souls for your hire in large abundance. This will be honourable here. Down with the devil's kingdom as fast as you can. While men-made parsons do nothing, God-made ministers shall do wonders."

The mercantile crash of 1820 changed the future course of Mr. Bolton's life. Like others of the Liverpool merchants of that period who went to bed rich and rose up beggars, he experienced that riches take to themselves wings and flee away. Collecting together the wreck of his fortune, secured by a marriage settlement amounting to about £300 a-year, he turned his thoughts, whither all along his desire had been, to the Christian ministry. In this purpose he found his former correspondent, Rowland Hill, ready to cheer him on, as well as sustain him by his sympathy. Writing to Mr. Bolton at this time, he says, "I have been informed that times in America are even worse than with us; and yet that we may be weaned from this present evil world they are not worse than they should be. Such is the carnality of our affection, that when things go well below, we are prone to forget better things above, though we are so positively told that to be carnally minded is death, and to be spiritually minded is life and peace. If you and your family are the worse for these bad times, yet I trust the souls of men shall be the better for it. If instead of being the rich American merchant, you should be the poor humble preacher of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the result will be a blessed one. One single soul called by your instrumentality will ultimately prove a greater treasure than the possession of a thousand such poor worlds as this."

The trial that swept from Mr. and Mrs. Bolton their worldly fortune took nothing else with it. It left to both the peace which an earthly storm could not shake, and the calm energy that could address itself to the duties of their altered position. It was after it had passed over them that Mrs. Bolton records in her diary, "I never felt so much enjoyment in religion as I have done for this past year; so that at times I have said, 'This is no delusion; and I must be interested in it, or I should not be thus happy.' I feel that I can leave all in the hands of my Redeemer and Saviour; and, though I serve him with faltering steps and in much weakness, yet I do endeavour, I do long and pray, to be more holy. This heart, though hard still, is, I trust, softened. Affliction has not been altogether lost upon me." A sphere of ministerial duty was not long of opening to Mr. Bolton. In a small independent congregation in the favourite and picturesque village of Henley-on-Thames, he found his first charge. Whilst hesitating as to his acceptance of the call, he tells us he strangely dreamt that he saw a round tablet, on which was simply engraven, "And now, O Lord my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father, and I am but a little child, and know not how to go out or come in" (1 Kings iii. 7). The text, if not the vision, decided his mind, and he became pastor of the congregation. Whilst labouring amongst its members with fidelity and acceptance, and visible saving fruits, he assisted in carrying the gospel into the neighbouring hamlets, where there was neither church nor chapel, and where the population was growing up in heathenism. Visiting Wargrave, he met with a reception such as Wesley was accustomed to in his preaching tours nearly a century before. Having assembled once and again the people of Wargrave in the market-place for open-air service, the clergyman of the place became exasperated at the concourse, and in a public place threatened to horsewhip Mr. Bolton if he ever met him. A lady hired men "of the baser sort" to put down the "fanatical" movement. Six young men, issuing from a public house, followed by a rabble, bore a bucket of beer and mugs in their hands, and claimed the bench immediately in front of Mr. Bolton, which had already been occupied by some of his hearers. The bench being yielded, they began their drunken songs, and, stepping towards Mr. Bolton, asked him "if he was not dry," at the same time pretending to offer him some beer. When an attempt was made to pray, rotten vegetables were thrown into Mr. Bolton's face, and the hymn that was commenced was drowned in the shouts of these sons of Belial. Notwithstanding this outrage, Mr. Bolton persevered, planted the seeds of a Church in this outcast village, and had the satisfaction, before leaving Henley for the United States, of opening in it a chapel for the permanent preaching of the gospel.

The largeness of his family, and the difficulty of providing for his sons in England, had induced him for some time to contemplate a removal to America. It was a new position Mr. Bolton occupied when, returning to his native land, he found himself the pastor of an Episcopal congregation. Yet it was in harmony with his character. Mr. Bolton was neither Dissenter nor Churchman. He was the zealot of no section, believing with Cecil, as that great man once expressed himself to a lady when told by her that she was about to leave the Dissenters and come into the Church,—"Madam," was his reply, "you are coming from nothing to nothing." Mr. Bolton seemed to have embraced the form that most conveniently and freely at the time allowed of his preaching the word. Finding the Episcopal church in the part of America where he settled vacant, he stepped into it at the call of the congregation, and was re-ordained by the bishop, his only scruple being his submission to the second imposition of hands. A small and beautiful property which he purchased in the vicinity of his charge, and on which he erected a handsome stone edifice, became afterwards well known in New York under the name of Pelham Priory, where Mrs. Bolton and her daughters conducted an educational institution, the aim of which was to lay the foundation of education in vital godliness. In the management of her own large family she was a high example of a Christian mother. As her children were in succession put into her arms, she received them with the command, "Take this child and nurse it for me." She began from the first in the right way by continual prayer. Let some of the expressions in her diary be observed: "Lord, hear the prayer of a mother." Again, "What responsibilities do I feel in my children!" Is she absent for a few days from home?—she writes, "I am absent from my dear children. Lord, teach them by thy Holy Spirit on the morrow." Does she return?—she says, "I have been reading to my dear children an account of one of the loveliest of thy saints, Harriet Vivian, who was to glorify God by her early departure amidst all that could make life attractive." Does one of her sons go forth into life?—she follows him with her prayers: "Our dear J—has left the parental roof, and is now on the wide waters. May his father's God be his God! Lord, preserve him, and make him thine! Oh! the anxiety I feel about our dear children; but this is uppermost, that they may be thine." To another at school she writes: "I send you Thomason's life; do read it attentively. He was a lovely character—pious even when at school. I was so pleased with it, that it led me afresh to pray for you, that such a marked blessing may descend upon our endeavours for you. . . . I often think, too, of what good Bishop M'Ilvaine said to me when visiting us at Henley—'Have you no son who wishes to enter the Church?' I replied, 'I wish I had; it would be the joy of my heart.'" Four of the sons of her prayers and faithful instructions became and now are ministers of the gospel. Of all her children—thirteen in number—she could afterwards say, in writing to a friend, "I know it will rejoice your hearts, and awaken your gratitude to God on our behalf, that all our dear children have given themselves to God. There is not one of them of whom we have not a pleasing hope that they are the Lord's. Think how all this cheers our hearts under all our sorrows." The prayer, with its preamble, so beautifully inscribed by the pious Bishop Meade of Virginia in the family album, on the occasion of his visit to Pelham Priory, had its full accomplishment. "I once met," wrote the good bishop, "with the description of a picture, which set forth the ascension of a happy family to heaven. Deep and wide was the canvas, covering one side of a room, for the family was large. On it might be seen traced father, mother, sons, and daughters, all rising upwards, with hands and eyes lifted towards heaven, and the light of heaven beaming upon them. O happy sight! But, alas! as the delighted eye fell towards the bottom of the picture, what a sight was there! One was there sinking and disappearing; but still, as he sank, his eyes and hands were lifted up towards the ascending ones, and you might almost hear him crying, 'My father, my mother, my dear brothers and sisters, will you leave me?' Ah, wretched sight! When the picture of Pelham family is drawn by a faithful artist, may there be no such unhappy object on which the eye shall fall, but,— "When, soon or late, they reach that coast,

O'er life's rough ocean driven,
May they rejoice, no wanderer lost,
A family in heaven."

Happy mother! that could write, "All our children have given themselves to God." Her life's great work was well accomplished. And yet an important work remained for her on behalf of the families of others. Without interfering with the family character of her own household, one or two, and then others, were joined to her training of her own daughters, until Pelham Priory became, as it continues to be, one of the most important educational establishments in the United States. On the failure of Mr. Bolton's health she returned with him to England. Some years of usefulness were still before her husband as private chaplain to Earl Ducie, in whom he found a congenial Christian spirit. It was not until she could record, "Forty and six years this day (May 8th, 1857) have we been united, and still spared to each other," that the trouble of Mr. Bolton assumed the alarming symptoms that foretold the severance of this long, endeared connection. His death was truly a falling asleep; his end was, like his life, a calm, patient resting in Jesus. Within less than two years she who had shared so largely in his heavenly hopes was reunited with him in their enjoyment. The last entry in her journal of forty-four years was a testimony to the faithfulness of God—"Lord, I feel so overwhelmed at thy goodness to me!"—and her last words to her daughters were the expression of her confidence that the same faithfulness would be extended to them. Calling one of them to her side before she ceased to breathe, she gave to her, and the others standing around, her parting legacy in the text, "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy path."

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

ANDREW FULLER.

PART SECOND.

THE outward life of Andrew Fuller was not very eventful, as we have shown in the first part of this sketch. But his spiritual history is full of instructive incident, and we shall make no apology for going much more into detail in speaking of it.

There were difficulties lying in the way of his getting into the kingdom which few now-a-days are called to encounter. He was brought up, it will be remembered, among a sect of hyper-Calvinists who held, to say the least of it, very unattractive views of the relations of the gospel to the unconverted. In the chapel which he attended, as long as he was reckoned an unbeliever, not a word of any sort was addressed to him from the pulpit. The Church edified itself. The Christians present had bread provided for them. But those that were without were treated as mere spectators, who had no direct concern either in the preaching or in the worship. One consequence of this was that when the boy Fuller (he was only fifteen when the crisis came) was awakened to deep anxiety about his soul's salvation, he could not bring himself to believe in free grace, or in the perfect willingness of Christ to receive him. "As near as I can remember in the early part of these services," he says, "when I subscribed to the justice of God in my condemnation, and thought of the Saviour of sinners, I had then relinquished every false confidence, believed my help to be only in him, and approved of salvation by grace alone through his death; and if at that time I had known that any poor sinner MIGHT warrantably have trusted in him for salvation, I conceived I should have done so, and have found rest to my soul sooner than I did." As it was, he imagined that the sinner required to have some kind of qualification to entitle him to believe; and being conscious that he had no qualification, he was kept struggling in the slough for a considerable time, and was only preserved from giving over the contest in utter despair by the consideration of the unquestionably worse condition into which, in that case, he would sink back. At last he thought of the resolution of Job, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." He paused, and repeated the words over and over again. Each repetition seemed to kindle a ray of hope mixed with a determination, if he might, to cast his perishing soul upon the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation, to be both pardoned and purified. Like Esther, who went into the king's presence contrary to the law, and at the hazard of her own life, he felt, as he tells us, reduced to an extremity. He must run, though he did perish. "Yet," he adds, "it was not altogether from a dread of wrath that I fled to this refuge, for I well remember that I felt something attracting in the Saviour. . . . However it was, I was determined to cast myself upon Christ, thinking, peradventure, he would save my soul; and if not, I could but be lost. In this way I continued above an hour, weeping and supplicating mercy for the Saviour's sake; and as the eye of the mind was more and more fixed on him, my guilt and fears were gradually and insensibly removed."

The reality and greatness of this change were soon made manifest in an unmistakeable way to his own consciousness. How blessed to be able, unaffectedly, to use language like this:—

"Having found rest for my soul in the cross of Christ, I was now conscious of my being the subject of repentance, faith, and love. When I thought of my past life, I abhorred myself, and repented as in dust and ashes; and when I thought of the gospel way of salvation, I drank it in, as cold water is inbibed by a thirsty soul. My heart felt one with Christ, and dead to every object around me. I had thought I had found the joys of salvation heretofore; but now I knew I had found them, and was conscious that I had passed from death unto life. Yet even now my mind was not so engaged in reflecting upon my own feelings as upon the objects which occasioned them."

What adds to the interest of this account is the fact that the victory was achieved without any human help. The boy of fifteen had no Christian friend to assist him in the solution of the perplexing problem raised by the peculiar views of the gospel to which he had been accustomed. Even after his conversion he continued to keep the experience through which he had passed a secret. "My mind was now at rest in Christ," he says, "yet I had never spoken to any one on the subject, nor did I think of doing so for the present." But it is with the love of God in the heart, as it was with the Saviour when he came to a house and "would have no man know it." It cannot be hid; and the new spirit which animated Fuller betrayed itself without his being sensible of it. There was a poor man who used to travel three miles to his place of worship. He was a truly good man,—and the earnest youth, when he began to seek Christ, felt a strange pleasure in being in his company;—I say, a strange pleasure, for though he would run miles to overtake him, when he did reach his side he had nothing to say. In the autumn of the year which witnesses Fuller's entrance into the kingdom, this man became his father's thrasher—an arrangement which he regarded with great delight. He had no intention, however, of being more confidential with him than he had been with others. But whether the thrasher saw some alteration in him as he went about his business, or how it was, he talked to him rather freely, and he then told him all his heart. After that, other Christians conversed with him, and invited him to their prayer meetings. He went, and in course of time took part in their religious exercises; "and," he tells us, "it was in this incidental way, and not from my own intention, that I became known among serious people."

The particular course followed in this instance we could not, of course, commend for general imitation. It is probably best for every one that has been awakened to soul concern, to seek at once the help and advice of experienced Christians; it is certainly best for those who have found Christ to confess him as soon as possible before men. But here, in a very remarkable way, the child was father of the man. In his quietly resolving to fight his own battles—to struggle on along the narrow way without asking aid from man—we see foreshadowed that independence of spirit which appeared afterwards in his refusing to accept anything upon trust, in his studying every subject submitted to him very thoroughly for himself, and in his being satisfied with conclusions only when they were recognised as clear and certain by his own mind. We may safely say that there are very few theological writers, indeed, who took less upon mere authority than Andrew Fuller, or who more completely thought out what they undertook to teach.

From the time of his conversion, which took place in the end of 1769, till the death of his child, which occurred in the summer of 1786, we have the period of greatest fervour in Fuller's religious history. At the latter date, as we shall afterwards see, he fell into what he himself calls a backsliding state, which lasted for two or three years. And when his soul was again revived, and "his youth renewed like the eagle's," his constant activity in the service of the Missionary Society, and, in particular, his ceaseless travels from place to place, if they did not in reality damage his spiritual interests (as we do not believe they did), at least prevented the manifestation of the same fervency of feeling which appeared at the outset of his Christian pilgrimage. This peculiarity in the life of Fuller has been noticed as characterizing the lives of other good men also; and it cannot be doubted that a wrong inference is sometimes drawn from it. When piety, which was intensely and even passionately earnest in youth, sobers down and becomes quiet in old age, it is too often concluded that this is a case, not of progress in the divine life, but of sad and sorrowful decay, when it may be, in fact, nothing of the kind. Fervour of feeling depends in great measure upon temperament; and, as a general rule, it may be expected that extravagant expressions of devoted personal attachment to Christ will be found in the diaries of the young and ardent, rather than in those of persons older and less excitable. Faith and not feeling is the radical and essential element of piety. If there is a manifest decay of the former then that is sure evidence of a falling away. But if all we can say of a man is that he is less fervid than he used to be,—there are so many things which tend to affect our fervour,—that we ought certainly to hesitate before drawing a purely unfavourable inference from that. At the same time, it is a beautiful thing to contemplate, warm and hearty Christian affection; and, in consequence, the first part of Fuller's religious history—the time of his first love—has, undoubtedly, as a study of spiritual life, the deepest interest for us. Let us, then, single out some of its more prominent features.

Fuller was only a boy of sixteen when he became known as a professed follower of Jesus Christ. The temptations, therefore, which assailed him at the outset, were "Boy's Temptations." For example, as the spring of 1770 came on, the young people of the town met as usual in the evenings for youthful exercises; and on the occasion of a wake or a feast, there were special "on-goings." In these the young disciple had formerly taken his part. Now, however, he shunned them as injurious to his spiritual "interests;" and he tells us, that to avoid being drawn into them, or being harassed by even the sound of them reaching his ears, he began a practice which he continued with great peace and comfort for several years. "Whenever a feast or holiday occurred, instead of sitting at home by myself, I went to a neighbouring village to visit some Christian friend, and returned when all was over. By this step I was delivered from those mental participations in folly which had given me so much uneasiness. Thus the seasons of temptation became to me times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." This was, indeed, being more than a conqueror—turning what might have been an occasion of sin into a means of grace. It was a walking in the Spirit, that he might not be seduced into fulfilling the lusts of the flesh.

His ministry at Soham commenced some five years after his conversion, and doubtless this event marked the beginning of a new era in his spiritual history. To one who had already found the greatest enjoyment in theological reading, it must have been peculiarly pleasant to think that the study of divinity would now become part of his business; and such a man could not engage in such a study without more than merely intellectual profit. But this was not the only way in which his new work told upon his soul's interest. If he was soon made acquainted with the joys of a pastor's occupations, he soon learned what were its trials also. His were not common ones. Besides those which all earnest ministers must have more or less, he had those of an unsympathizing people, and of an utterly inadequate temporal provision. The diary which he kept during part of the time he was in this place, and which is given in his biography, exhibits, in a very instructive way, the exercises of his mind under these circumstances. It shows him deeply concerned about the prosperity of religion in his own heart, and tremblingly anxious about the preservation of the ark of God, and the triumphs of the cause and kingdom of Christ in the world. Only one illustration of his singular disinterestedness—his subordination of all selfish considerations to the higher ones of the will of God and the welfare of his people—can we find space here to notice. It has been already mentioned that after having laboured without being much appreciated at Soham for a number of years, he received an invitation to settle in the much more satisfactory town of Kettering. To almost every on-looker his course was palpably clear. He was upon a starving allowance; his services were not esteemed at a very high rate by many; he had no reason to think that, if he remained, matters would materially mend. But it was to him an awfully solemn thing to sever the bond which connected him with his first charge. He feared lest he should run counter in any way to the mind of the Spirit; and it was not till his way was made so plain to himself that it appeared clear that he would fight against God not to pursue it, that he in the end consented to submit to the translation. "Men who fear not God," says Dr. Ryland, "would risk the welfare of a nation with fewer searchings of heart, than it cost him to determine whether he should leave a little Dissenting church, scarcely containing forty members besides himself and his wife."

But one or two extracts from the diary will best enable the reader, who is yet unacquainted with him, to form an idea for himself as to what manner of man he at this time was.

"My soul has been dejected to-day in thinking on the plague of the human heart. Through the glass of my depravity I see, oh, I see the preciousness of that blood which flowed on Calvary! Oh, that the ideas I have had to-night were indelibly written on my heart? But, alas! one hour of sin will, I fear, efface them all."

"Oh, that I could retain the ideas I have had to-day! I thought God was such an infinitely lovely being, that it was a great sin not to love him with our whole hearts. I thought one perpetual flame of supreme love was his natural due from every intelligent creature, and that the want of such love merits damnation."

"Sin, how deceitful! While we may obtain an apparent victory over one sin, we may be insensibly enslaved to another; it may seem to flee before us, like the Benjamites before Israel, and yet retain an ambushment to fall upon our rear."

"To-night, while I prayed to Him, how sweet has Colossians i. 19 been to me. That which has pleased the Father pleases me. I am glad all fulness dwells in him. It is not fit it should dwell in me, nor that I should have the keeping of my own stock. Oh, for some heavenly clue to guide me to the fulness of Christ."

"A hard heart is a symptom of distance between God and us. As the Lord is nigh to those who are of a broken heart, so he is far from those who are of a hard heart."

These examples illustrate the character of this first part of Fuller's spiritual life very imperfectly, but they give, at least we may hope, some general idea of it! They prove, at any rate, the genuineness and greatness of that change which, in the morning of his days, he had the happiness to undergo.

A MISSIONARY SPIRIT.

"EDWARD," said Mrs. Stanley, one morning, "I wish you would take a walk with me this afternoon, to make a call at Mount Vernon."

"Willingly, if I can get my studies over in time."

He did so in the course of a few hours, and they set out together.

"I am glad you proposed this visit, Frances, for in fact I have been reproving myself for having been so long of going. It is sad," he added, "to feel how little real intercourse we ministers often have with our people."

"We have no carriage, you know, my dear, and it is not every day you have leisure enough for so long a walk as this."

"Not every day, certainly; but yet many days when I have not taken it. I fear the true reason is that the Selbys are not attractive or congenial to me. He is cold and stiff, and she too sweet and patronizing, and both, I feel, so worldly in their ideas and tastes. But all this should make a faithful pastor only more anxious to be useful to them, as souls for whom he must give account."

"But Mrs. Selby makes a Christian profession."

"She does, and perhaps I am uncharitable in doubting its reality."

"I feel interested just now about Alice, the eldest girl at home. I have good hopes that she is thinking seriously."

"Indeed? I rejoice to hear it; but what makes you hope so? It is not very long since she was confirmed, and I recollect nothing particular about her then, except that she appeared to know the truth as far as the understanding was concerned."

"Ever since her visit to London last autumn, I have observed a change in her dress and manner—so much more of gentleness and quietness, and in church such real attention."

"Who would have expected such effects from a London visit!"

"She told me she had been latterly there with relatives of her father, who were not gay people, and she spoke with much interest of some week-day lectures, and missionary meetings that they had attended. Last Sunday, I saw that she was weeping, when you preached in the evening on the text, 'The love of Christ constraineth us.' I met the Selbys in going out of church. Mrs. Selby observed in her own way, 'What a fine sermon your husband has given us this evening!' But Alice pressed my hand, and said in a low voice, 'O Mrs. Stanley, how difficult it is to know what our real motives are at times!'"

"Perhaps she is in some difficulty, poor girl, and would be the better for our help and counsel. You must ask her to spend a day with us soon."

Mount Vernon was a pretty villa, situated on a rising ground, which commanded fine views both up and down the valley. Everything in the house and grounds showed at once wealth and good taste.

Mrs. Selby and her daughter were together in the drawing-room when Mr. and Mrs. Stanley were announced. A glance sufficed to show that something unpleasant had been under discussion. The young lady had evidently been weeping, and hardly attempting an apology, she left the apartment as the visitors entered.

Mrs. Selby looked flushed and discomposed, but received her friends with politeness. They talked for some time on the weather and ordinary topics, and then in regard to some absent members of the Selby family.

"I hope you have good accounts," said Mr. Stanley, "of your sons in India?"

"Excellent, both well, and all we could wish. Mr. Selby heard lately, through some friends of the governor, that James, the engineer, is considered quite a rising young man in the service."

"You have, indeed, much cause for thankfulness, in the goodness of God to you as a family hitherto."

"Yes, Mr. Stanley," but, she hesitated, and then went on hurriedly, "we have our trials too. You must have seen that I had been agitated this morning. I cannot conceal from you, and as our pastor you ought to know, that we are grieved and disappointed about Alice at present."

"I am much surprised; surely nothing in her conduct that is wrong, or undutiful?"

"Can you imagine it? she wishes to leave us all, and go to India as a missionary!"

"A missionary! Miss Alice!" both visitors exclaimed, with unfeigned surprise.

"You may well be astonished. With her education, her advantages, to think of throwing herself away in such a manner!"

"It is the post of honour in the Master's service," replied Mr. Stanley, quietly; "but I did not know that Miss Alice had been so seriously impressed as to lead her thoughts in this direction."

"I was aware she had been under religious impressions for some time, and, of course, I rejoiced in it.

But that these feelings should lead her to fancies of this kind I never dreamed of."

"She is surely too young, too delicate."

"Yes, her age, her health, everything, makes it out of the question. I hope you will help us to bring her to more rational views. You may fancy what a trial it has been."

"How long is it," said Mr. Stanley, "since your daughter began to speak of this plan?"

"Some months ago, a proposal of marriage was made to her, in every way desirable, and her father and myself were much annoyed by the unaccountable way in which she refused to accept it. Then I began to suspect some other attachment."

"Another attachment! Then Miss Selby is not thinking of going alone?"

"Mr. Stanley, did you suppose she had quite lost her senses?"

"Such things have been," he replied, "and every year increases the demand for female agency abroad. But certainly, I should not have considered your daughter a suitable or likely person for such a task. To go as the wife of a missionary is quite another affair. May I ask who is the gentleman?"

"Mr. Rivers," replied Mrs. Selby coldly.

"Is that the young man who spent last Christmas with you? I was greatly prepossessed by what I saw of him; but I thought he was intended for the Church at home."

"So did we, of course. Frank had got acquainted with him at Cambridge, and took a great fancy for him, and asked leave to bring him here. Alice and he were a good deal together, but I never thought of anything between them beyond ordinary acquaintance, till her strange conduct in opposing our wishes as to the other matter."

"And has Mr. Rivers decided on going to the missionary field of labour?"

"Yes. We were greatly astonished when Frank wrote to us some time ago, that his friend had given up really good prospects of getting on in the Church, and had placed himself at the disposal of the Church Missionary Society. We wondered and exclaimed at his extravagant, and I may say undutiful conduct, in thinking of leaving his widowed mother and sister in this way. I recollect Alice was silent, and did not seem to enter into the discussion. But it came like a thunderbolt upon me, when a fortnight ago she brought me a letter from him, telling that he expected to be appointed to India, and actually asking her to accompany him!"

"Does his mother object to his leaving her?"

"Well, he says not. I fancy she is an enthusiast like himself; but I consider that no excuse for his deserting her."

"How did you feel, when your eldest son left you for India?"

"I was much affected, of course; but you know he was not my only son. And besides, I should have thought it inexcusable to have allowed my own feelings to stand in the way of his taking advantage of such an opening as it was, such prospects of preferment in the service of his country."

"Perhaps Mrs. Rivers feels in the same way in regard to a still higher service."

"But surely, Mr. Stanley, the young man can be just as useful to the cause of Christ at home. What need of faithful ministers in our own land! We, who are so favoured in this place, can hardly realize the wants elsewhere."

He smiled at the implied compliment.

"True, there is much spiritual need at home; but is there not much more abroad? I think only a glance is needed at a missionary map to settle that point."

"If you think it so important, Mr. S., why were you not a missionary?"

"There are comparatively few, I consider, who are really qualified, physically and mentally, for such a post of duty, and I doubt whether I am one of them. Besides, before I seriously entertained the question, Providence seemed to have appointed my lot otherwise."

"I am sure we have reason to congratulate ourselves that it was so."

"But you must consider, that to go as a missionary, or a missionary's wife to India, is not going to a savage land, nor even to the India of earlier years. You must not allow your fears for Miss Alice to be grounded on the experience of Harriet Newell or Ann Judson. May I take the liberty of asking what reply you have made to Mr. Rivers' proposal?"

"My husband was at first really angry, more so than I have often seen him. But poor Alice was in such distress that I was softened, and at last got him to be so also. He would hear of no engagement, but allowed that if Mr. R. got a good living in this country, the thing might be thought of. I really considered this great kindness, for Alice was always a favourite with her father, and he hoped she would have made a good settlement. Charles Rivers, though a gentlemanly, agreeable young man, is of no family, and has only got through his studies by assistance from friends."

"And what has been his reply?"

"That we have not yet learned; it was only yesterday Mr. Selby gave Alice leave to write."

At this moment some new visitors were announced, and the Stanleys were not sorry for the excuse to take leave. They discussed the subject as they walked home.

"I shall be really anxious, Edward, to hear the decision of that young man. What will you expect?"

"It will entirely depend upon whether or not he has the true missionary spirit. If he has, he will go to India, though it should be with a breaking heart. If not, he will allow himself to be persuaded that he can be as useful at home, and remain there."

"And could you blame him? Surely the temptation would be great, and surely there is abundant room in our own land for the employment of all a Christian pastor's time and energy."

"True, and I desire to blame or judge no one. But still I repeat, if young Rivers does this, it shows he has thought of the missionary life without the real missionary spirit."

"And what do you consider that to be?"

"When a believer, who has himself experienced the power of grace and the joy of faith in Christ, has such an overpowering sense of love and compassion for those who have no man to care for their souls, as will lead him to use every effort, to make any sacrifice, in order to be instrumental, directly or indirectly, in conveying to them the glad tidings of salvation."

"But may not this be felt at home?"

"Certainly, but it will then lead to earnest effort in behalf of the home heathen. For it is towards the heathen, those who are in real ignorance of saving truth, and have no one to instruct them, that this longing compassion is peculiarly extended. Many a true missionary in heart has never been beyond his native land, his native town even. But he will be praying and labouring there, not among those who hear the gospel every Sabbath, but those who are living without hope and without God. Such a missionary was Sarah Martin, while still a dressmaker, and John Campbell, while still an ironmonger. Many a useful and honoured servant of Christ in the ministry has little of this spirit, according to my view of what it implies. In his efforts, plans, prayers, he generally 'dwells among his own people.' He seldom, comparatively speaking, makes the heathen the subject of earnest wrestling with God, or pleading with men. He is, perhaps almost unconsciously, fearful of lessening the interest and exertions of his flock in behalf of home concerns, by bringing before them, in real earnestness, the state of the destitute millions of India and Africa. He is a faithful pastor, but not a missionary."

"Edward, would you have made a good one?"

"Not in many respects, at least for the foreign field. I want some essential qualifications, mental and physical. My health and nerves are not sufficiently strong, and I have no talent for acquiring languages. It is a great mistake to suppose that piety and zeal alone are enough to qualify a man for becoming a useful messenger to the heathen,—a mistake for which the Churches of Christ have sometimes dearly paid. A really efficient working missionary, even in our own land, requires to have strong health and cheerful spirits, a physical constitution which can stand fatigue and endure privations, and a spirit that can hope and bear up against discouragement or disappointments; together with much of what we call tact, judiciousness, and knowledge of human nature. Then in foreign lands peculiar talents are called for besides, especially that of learning to speak and write a new language with facility. But the true spirit may be felt in the heart, and proved in the life, in many a case where much direct effort is impracticable."

"Who do you consider the first of modern missionaries?"

"I have long thought that veteran hero, Dr. Judson of Burmah. And you remember his motto, Devoted for life. I have often contrasted his conduct with that of others in our own day, who enter the missionary service for a term of years, and afterwards, without any very imperative call of health or duty, return to home and private life. I cannot understand this. I cannot understand how any Christian, who has once learned to speak of Jesus in a foreign tongue, can be content to speak of him in English, to English hearers only."

"Then you consider the claims of the foreign field greater than those of home?"

"I do, upon the few whom God has qualified to entertain the question, when choosing their own department of labour. And this not because souls in one place are of more individual value than in another, but because the proportion of those destitute of the knowledge of salvation is so immeasurably greater abroad, and that of fitting labourers there so deplorably few. Perhaps not one Christian would be a suitable and efficient missionary abroad, out of twenty who might work usefully at home. Therefore, how the twentieth, who feels that Providence has qualified him for either service, and who has liberty of choice, can hesitate in his decision, if he truly desires to serve Christ with all his powers, I cannot comprehend. Yet some of those, at whose conduct I have wondered, may after all be more devoted and more blessed than myself. Only I repeat, they cannot have what I consider to be the missionary spirit."

"Poor Alice Selby! will she feel thus?"

"It does not at all follow that she is a missionary in heart, poor girl, though willing to become the wife of one. Probably young Rivers has not made a prudent choice in this matter, and it may be well for him if his wishes are disappointed."

"I have had a visit from Miss Selby this morning," said Mrs. Stanley one afternoon to her husband, as he returned from a walk, some days after their visit to Mount Vernon.

"Have you? Did she speak of her own affairs?"

"Yes, quite frankly. And the result is what you will approve of. She read to me part of a really beautiful letter from her friend, in which he says, that though his heart will ever be hers, he feels he could not be happy even in her society, if for the sake of that alone, he drew back from the vows he has plighted of special service to his heavenly Master."

"Poor girl!"

"She said she knew it would be so, and could not desire it otherwise. But she was, of course, much depressed, and spoke with tears of her fears that her own religion was not sincere, and that not love for Christ and souls, but attachment to a fellow-creature, had been the motive for her late conduct and wishes. I told her there was nothing sinful in the latter feeling, and that the reality of grace in her heart would be proved and tested by the way in which she bore this trial, and sought to serve the Lord still, in the sphere of home duties and opportunities."

"You spoke truly. If God intends these young persons for one another, he will in his Providence remove present obstacles, and meantime this disappointment may be much blessed to them both. But Rivers has decided rightly and wisely. For what has our Lord himself said, 'There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or riches, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake and the gospel's, but he shall receive an hundred fold now in this time, and in the world to come eternal life.'"

a. c.

IN DUE SEASON YE SHALL REAP IF YE FAINT NOT.

TRULY it is often the waiting for this due season that we feel so disheartening; we would so like to see the good effects of our labour now, to get the harvest whenever we have sowed the seed. But all good is slow in progress, and it must be in faith on the word, "Ye shall reap if ye faint not," that we go on. This slow growth of good applies to our own progress in the spiritual life as much as to our endeavours to benefit others by word or deed, temporally or spiritually, and often when impatient at our own inability "to do the things that we would," we feel as if it were hopeless to strive any longer. Nay, in due season we shall reap, so faint not. Then remember that although you do not see any good arising from your labour, you are not therefore to conclude that no good is doing. Some seeds are longer in springing up than others, but they are not lying dormant; they are slowly, very slowly it may be, germinating, but they will appear above ground in "due season." It may be that you will not see the fruit of your work; sometimes, you know, God takes this method of "hiding pride from our eyes," but it is not lost labour for all that. You may be but the means of preparing the way, and another may come and seem to do all the good, but your part was as necessary first as his was last; "one soweth and another reapeth."

You say "that it is most discouraging to find that you have done harm where you wished to do good, and that sometimes you feel as if it were so difficult to do any real good that you are tempted to give up attempting it." Many a time, indeed, we are reduced to the thought that if we ourselves have derived benefit from making efforts for others, that is all we can say. Well, is not that something? first, a little humbling, very good for us, but not pleasant, I grant, and then some good to ourselves in the way of self-denial, consideration for others, and the desire to help them, so it has not been all harm that has resulted from our unsuccessful efforts. Then you cannot deny that you do every now and then get a little encouragement to go on ; why, only remember how many you may have been the means of stirring up, both by your example and by interesting them in your sick poor, so that they, too, are entering the field of useful labour, and you may thus feel encouraged and cheered on. The little beginnings of good seem too trifling to count, but they widen, and spread around, and include in their circle both the helpers and the helped, for it is indeed "more blessed to give than to receive." As has been well said, "we may do our least actions as we sow small seeds, knowing that a self-multiplying power is in them. Dorcas is no more, but the influence of her example is gone into all the earth. Instead of working with one pair of hands in her solitary room, she is now sitting in a thousand places, making garments for the poor with many thousands of hands." I can give also my full sympathy in your confessions of finding too often that it is dull work, that you fear you are losing your interest in it, and that you feel you are indeed wearying in well-doing. Perhaps you do need a little rest and variety, and when thus weary, why should you not take it ? But even when conscious that you are not weary, but simply uninterested, and therefore apt to get spiritless, do not reproach yourself too severely for this. There is necessarily a good deal of what may be called routine work about everything we undertake, and it is not possible to feel the same interest in it as in other parts of our occupations, but it must be done, nevertheless, and somebody must do it ; so take heart again, and remember that by undertaking the dull tasks occasionally, or even regularly, you may perhaps be setting free others to get on with more important and imposing parts of the work, others better fitted to do them than yourself. After all, these are but secondary motives, and cannot at all times be turned to for encouragement, and for reviving our flagging energies. We need deeper as well as higher sources from which to draw, and may we not find them in the messages sent by our Lord to the Churches in the opening chapters of Revelation ? The oft-repeated "I know thy works," may well cheer our hearts, when we thus learn that our Saviour himself looks down with interest on what his servants do ; and the high and holy motive he ascribes to the Church of Ephesus may well be our strength in days of despondency. "For my name's sake thou hast laboured and hast not fainted," for the love you bear to him, for the honour of his name, not for the praise of men, not for the gratitude of those you served, not even for the reward of seeing your work crowned with success, but "for his name's sake thou hast laboured." Well may those whose motive this is turn again and again to the blessed words, "I know thy works, and thy labour, and thy patience," and draw thence solace and strength. Whatever your work be, he knows it ; conscious you are that "you have but a little strength," he knows that too ; or, it may be that sometimes all you can say is that you "have borne and have patience," he knows that it is so, and since it is all done or suffered for "his name's sake," fear not that you shall ever find this reason fail you as a reviving cordial and an animating motive ; and doubt not that even the cup of cold water given in his name shall not go unrewarded.

Perhaps one reason for your present discouragement may be, that you expected to find it always easy and pleasant to work for your Lord, and are angry at yourself for the sloth and selfishness that too often make duty a burden. You feel that since you dare so seldom say, "For thy name's sake I have done it," so you have no right to the comfort of thinking that he knows your works. But look again at all these gracious messages and warnings, and see if it is pleasant easy work there commended. Is it not rather sympathy expressed for labour, work, service, patience, and not fainting ? and are not all the gracious rewards promised to "him that overcometh," and how can we overcome without striving, how win a victory without fighting !

I feel that in thus endeavouring to encourage others I have "drawn the bow at a venture," but even if my words are not what you require, and fail to cheer you, I cannot have erred in giving you these passages of Scripture to think upon. Often have I felt when able to visit among the poor, how feeble and insufficient were all my attempts to speak a word in season, but it always was a comfort to recollect that if I had read a passage from God's word, or even quoted a text from it, I might then plead the promise, "My word shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish that whereunto I sent it." So let the command and promise I began with, and the gracious words of sympathy and counsel I end with, be refreshing springs to you ; and when you drink thereof, may you indeed "run and not be weary, and walk and not faint."—Homely Hints.

AN UPRIGHT LIFE.

WHAT a safeguard is there in a really unblemished life, in its contact with other men ! How brave it makes a man, how fearless, how undaunted in word and action, to have on the armour of righteousness ! He shall not be afraid of evil tidings : his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord. He will not have to remind himself, when duty calls, "I cannot say that, lest I open myself to such a retort." He will not have to consider with himself, when duty calls, how he can avoid provoking such or such a taunt, or rousing against himself such or such a recrimination. He can go on his way, bearing a manful and perhaps a powerful testimony for the right and against the wrong ; he can lie down and rise up, he can walk abroad and take his rest, none making him afraid ; above all, he, if he be also a Christian in his heart, can command for his Master's cause that tribute of silent (or not always silent) respect, which the world itself, in our land and age, has ever ready for the man whose consistency it has tested and not found wanting.

Some may hear me to-day, who are still young enough to maintain or to lose this first armour. Young men, boys, yes children, can understand this at which I am aiming. I charge it upon you, that you indulge in yourselves no vague peradventures that, after going a little way, or for a little while, wrong in moral matters, matters of deceitfulness and truth, of undutifulness or obedience, of debt or honesty, of vice or purity, you may recover yourselves, and be good men and good Christians in time to live, or at least in time to die. Be quite sure of one thing, and remember it, God helping you, all your life long, that no person who has ever fallen into definite sin can be quite the same ever again; that his sin will most certainly find him out; find him out in weakness, or find him out in suffering, or find him out in shame; so that he will regret it to the very end of his days, even if, by God's great grace, he does not perish in it for ever.—Vaughan.

TENDER TIES.

WE all have tender ties to earth and time. Children it may be, or brothers, both in the flesh and in the spirit, are twined closely round our hearts. We are needful to them. This is felt on both sides now, and will be felt more tenderly when the hour of separation is drawing near. How shall that pang be softened to both parties, —to him who is departing, and to those who remain? In one way only: the desire to depart and to be with Christ will do it, and nothing else will. How good it is,—how necessary to have that hope and trust now! How dreary to be drifting down toward those dark and tempestuous narrows before the anchor of the soul has been thrown within the veil, and fastened there on Jesus!

Paul's "strait" is the only easy position on the earth; oh, to be in it! If you are held by both of these bonds you will not fear a fall on either side. Although your life, instead of being in your Father's hands, were at the disposal of your worst enemy, in his utmost effort to do you harm, he would be shut up between these two,—either to keep you a while longer in Christ's work, or send you sooner to Christ's presence. That were indeed a charmed life that should tremble evenly in the blessed balance;—this way, we shall do good to men; that way, we shall be with the Lord.—Arnot.

HOW SAFE!

How safe is a sinful man who has simply, wholly cast himself on Jesus! The Redeemer loves his own with a love that cannot die. He that keepeth Israel slumbers not nor sleeps. The sun even in his absence holds up the earth all night, and at his coming also brings the day. So Christ keeps a soul intrusted to him while it lies in darkness, and then dawns on that darkness with the light of life. The love of a Saviour unseen reaches as far and holds as firmly as the law by which central suns grasp tributary worlds. His coming is like the morning; as sweet and as sure.

Fear not, little flock; the good Shepherd knows his sheep all by name. He is absent, but he thinks of you. He feels your weight, and bears it. He longs to have you, and will not want you. He remained on the mountain-top only until his disciples fully felt their own need; and then he brought deliverance. Let none refuse the consolation on the one hand, or the reproof on the other, on the ground that the danger and the deliverance were both seen and temporal things. Our Redeemer became bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, that he might come closer to us, and that he might come closer to him. The transactions of that night on the Sea of Galilee and the mountain by its shore reveal the heart of Jesus more clearly than his coming to the world, or his intercession in heaven, because they are bodily human, and palpable to sense. The longing of his human heart that night towards his absent brethren, and his goings, as God, upon the waters to find and save them, mark the line on which his love is running still. The compassion which he felt and the help which he rendered to these poor men are graven here as with a pen of iron and the point of a diamond, that I, in this latter day of time, may know his readiness to pity and ransom me. These lines show how the heart of our Redeemer lies. In that direction his love goes out, and it goes to the uttermost. To-day he is as able and as glad to save from a deeper, darker sea.—Ibid.

A MARTYRDOM.

TREAD lightly on his ashes; for he fell*
Heart-full of love to God and all mankind!
Little it needs the Muse his fate should tell,
In lofty ode or elegy refined,
To touch the soul and move the ingenuous mind.

His chosen was to fix the bridal morn;
Her fleet, light step already traced the dew,
As to the moorland trysting-place she drew—
Blythe as a lark sprung from the braided corn—
To list his voice, and low-breathed vows renew
To him whose love and troth full well she knew.

The spoiler came before her, and she found
Her lover stark and cold—the fell deed done—
His spirit fled, his blood upon the ground,
His Bible next his heart; for he was one
Who feared his God and bore a grudge to none.

Far thence the slayers, all unmoved in aught,
To other deeds accursed struck their way,
The while, poor soul! with anguish deep o'erfraught,
Prone by her lover's side she sank to pray—
Wild waverings, unrevealed till the great JUDGMENT-DAY!
Songs of the Covenant Times.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.

MANY years had passed since a rumour which had gone abroad through the hill-country of Judah had drawn the eyes of the dwellers in that sequestered region to one of its households. The echoes of that thrilling "Benedictus," which had marked the infant son, of a venerable priest as a child of wondrous destinies, and encircled his brow with a nimbus of mystic glory, had long died away. Zacharias and Elisabeth, after rejoicing for a season in the light which had blessed the evening of their days, have departed in peace, and from the quiet home of his childhood, he who had been greeted as "the prophet of the Highest," has gone forth into the strange world beyond the upland valley, has vanished from the eyes of the hamlet, and perchance been forgotten, — forgotten in the village as the memory of that other Child, with whose birth his own had been linked so strangely, is by this time in the Temple which had heard the "Nunc Dimittis" of Simeon. These two lives—how far sundered all this long interval of thirty years had they been; how diverse in their outward aspect and colouring do they appear to us as we look back upon them now! The one, sombre, visionary, companionless, spent in wandering amid the rocks and woods of the desert, and by the mountain brooks of Judah:—the other, a gentle and beautiful home life, passed in lowly, cheerful service, winning to itself day by day the favour of men by its meek and virginal holiness, known and loved in all the dwellings of Nazareth. Yet each was thus in training for the special work to which he had been consecrated from his birth. The spirit of the mission given to each was stamped upon his life from its beginning, moulding his nature to the element it was to work in,—the one, to stand apart from men, withdrawn from the sweet charities of life within the circle of his rigid vow, moving their souls to fear by his isolation and passionless severity,—the other, to go forth amongst them in kindly sympathy and frank-hearted fellowship, their companion alike in genial and sorrowful hours, entering into their dwellings, sitting at their tables, watching by their sick-beds, weeping at their graves (Matt. xi. 18, 19).

The long preparation is over, and suddenly the land is startled by the cry of warning, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand!" At first it is but a rumour amongst the peasant folk, in the thinly-peopled districts along the course of the Jordan, of the mysterious stranger that has appeared no one knows whence, of his wild ascetic look, his coarse and shaggy attire, his flashing eye, his solemn, fervent, heart-thrilling words. Then as it spreads from village to village, crowds are thronging to the spot,—the sacred ground on which for centuries some old moss-grown stones had marked the scene of Israel's passage through the river. The neighbouring towns send forth their eager population, and ere long in the streets and temple cloisters of Jerusalem the fame of the great preacher is common talk, and men gather with rapt attention round one who has seen him, and can repeat some of those terse and weighty words which in their vivid imagery seem to glow with prophetic inspiration. It was a vast and strangely blended congregation that must in those days have been gathered there, —peasants and citizens, Roman legionaries and Jewish tax-gatherers,—shepherds from the hills of Gilead, sun-browned vine-dressers from the fruitful levels of Jericho, fishermen from the Sea of Galilee,—priests and lawyers from the Temple schools, the Pharisee with his sacred amulet and deep blue fringes, the Sadducee with his hard, cold eye and sceptic sneer,—the gray-bearded Essene from his convent among the Dead Sea ravines, leaning on his palm-staff, side by side with the dissolute Herodian, who wore his loose-girt tunic in the style of Antioch or Corinth, and here and there some wayfaring Samaritan in the skirts of the assemblage,—all looks rivetted on the man in whom one of the old hermit-prophets seemed to stand in living effigy before them. No wonder that as they felt the spell of his burning words, one amongst those ancient messengers of Heaven, the luminaries of that glorious past when Israel was a nation, should be specially recalled—the man who of all had left the deepest impress of his character on the traditions of his people, who had confronted a king in his hour of evil triumph, and called down fire from heaven on the Altar of the broken covenant. So must Elijah have stood that day before the awe-struck tribes on Carmel, the same trace of an austere life in deserts imprinted on his wasted features, the same fire of fervid zeal burning in his eyes, the same oracular grandeur and majesty in his words, charged with the burden of menace and doom. Only that here there was something more—words of gracious promise and hope recurring like an undertone in the graver strain—the coming or presence of One who was to do a blessed work on earth—the announcement of the kingdom of the Messiah, for which all true Hebrew hearts were longing as the restoration of their national freedom and glory. And thus, as they gazed on the preacher of repentance in his mantle of camel's hair and leathern girdle, and the wild unshorn locks of the Nazarene vow, it was not strange that the last words which a prophet had ever spoken in Israel should come into many a mind, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." This must be he—the great Elijah whom our fathers knew, whose footprints once were seen on the shore of Jordan—the hero-saint for whom the law of death was suspended, made immortal for this, that as the herald of deliverance he might come down amongst his people on the banks of the sacred river whence the fiery chariot had borne him up to heaven.

How deep and general this impression was may be inferred from the fact, that a deputation of the Sanhedrim, "priests and Levites," was sent from Jerusalem to put the question, "Who art thou? art thou Elias?" He said, "I am not." Not the man Elijah—the ancient prophet renewing his ministry in a second miraculous avatar, as they deemed—but the Elijah-prophet of whom the last Hebrew seer had said, "Behold I will send my angel, and he shall prepare the way before me, and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the Angel of the covenant." In the spirit and power of Elijah the messenger had come; by no other words could the style and aim of the Baptist's mission be more fitly characterized. It was a ministry of awakening, of conviction, of revival,—one that should startle the conscience into voice, and move a pulse of spiritual emotion in the heart, and break down the hard and stubborn soul in contrition for its sin, and then, by a peculiar rite, set upon it the seal of the baptism of repentance—the preparation for that remission and purifying which could only come from Him who was to baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. A work in its own nature incomplete and initiatory—its crowning ordinance typifying another baptism without which it could have no spiritual force, its inner grace only meant to quicken the soul into expectation of that highest grace which was to speak the word of redemption, to seal to the penitent the divine fact of forgiveness, and his adoption into the elect family of God. Baptism had been known in the Jewish Church before, but only as the lustral rite by which proselytes had been received into its communion, one that never was administered to a freeborn son of Israel. In the Baptist's ministry it acquired a new significance. It became the vestibule that led from the Hebrew temple to the Church of Christ; he who stood there in a dim religious light confessed his sin, and in token of his true repentance the waters of baptism were sprinkled on his brow, but not till Jesus found him there and said, 'Thy sins be forgiven,' and clothed him in the white robe of a new discipleship, could he pass within into marvellous light, and with a conscience cleansed by the blood of sprinkling, stand in the midst of the congregation singing praise to God.

Viewed in this aspect, it is evident wherein lay the peculiar dignity and sacredness of the Baptist's work. It was the border ground between the two dispensations, where the light and darkness were divided. Standing on the partition line between the law and the gospel, he may be said to be the last of prophets and the first of evangelists. Like a prophet, his first word was, He is coming; like an apostle his last word was, He is come! In him the whisper of prophecy swelled into clear utterance and far-ringing vibration like the voice of a silver trumpet. And he who had begun his career of pure and single-hearted service with the herald's proclamation, Prepare ye the way of the Lord! was honoured first to unfold to the eyes of men the scroll of the evangel, and read its opening words. It was his to make the sacred announcement which holds, as in a heading of illuminated capitals, the whole truth of the gospel—words signalized by constant allusion as the italics of inspiration—the text from which Peter preached the sermon of Pentecost, and Paul discoursed in the shadow of the Parthenon—the truth before which lying creeds and proud philosophies fell down and gave up the ghost,—BEHOLD THE LAMB OF GOD, WHICH TAKETH AWAY THE SIN OF THE WORLD.

The Christ was no longer a symbol hidden under veils of mystic imagery, but a living presence, the Word made flesh, and dwelling among us full of grace and truth. Looking on "Jesus as he walked," the Forerunner said this,—unmasked the Antitype in whom the oldest and deepest symbol of faith, the blood of sacrifice, found interpretation. In that hour the temple, with its smoking altars and its ancient priestly orders, vanished away, and on its site Jesus stood alone, uplifted on the cross of redemption. Thus, amid the departing shadows of the old economy, the herald-prophet stands towering in his simple grandeur over all the prophets who went before him, like one of those lofty mountains round whose side the mists of morning fold and cling, while high up in purer air their peaks are touched and brightened by the first rays of the rising sun.

Having uttered the name of Jesus, the Baptist felt that his earthly work was done. He had borne witness of that light. He had abased the proud and exalted the lowly with a glorious hope, making a level path through the land for the chariot of the King, preparing a people for the coming of the Lord. He might have received honour from men, had he cared for it. No slight temptations were his to swerve from the straight and rugged line of duty that had been traced out for him. Had a spark of earthly ambition been in that true and stainless nature, any desire for the making of a splendid name, or starting on what men call a brilliant career, the enthusiasm of disciples, the favour of the multitude would have kindled it into a flame, amid the acclamations of a nation, the prophet of the wilderness, might have swept on in a triumphal progress from the banks of the Jordan to the gates of Jerusalem. There was a time when the people were in expectation, and "all men mused in their hearts of John whether he were the Christ or no." And then he answered, "I indeed baptize with water, but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose. He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." He was "a burning and a shining light," and men "were willing for a season to rejoice in his light." Yet more gladly than ever man rejoiced in a great renown did he feel himself eclipsed by the growing brightness of the Light of the world. Singular in the distinction that he was the only prophet whose coming prophets had foretold, he professed to be nothing more than a Voice, not caring that his own earthly name should be spoken by the lips of men once he had uttered the name of Jesus, nor that their glance should linger on him for a moment after he had pointed them to Him.

Thus "John fulfilled his course." His ministry rung the gospel into the world; and as the summoning Sabbath bell ceases its proclamation once the worshippers are gathered within hearing of the preacher's living voice, the lowly son of Zacharias, having drawn together a multitude of contrite, suffering, weary souls to hear the Apostle of grace and truth, silently passes away from the sight, and, if it may be, from the memories of men. "He must increase, but I must decrease." He had heard the Bridegroom's voice, and his joy, therefore, was fulfilled.

It is not probable that the public ministry of the Baptist extended over more than a few months. There is good ground, at least, to conclude that it closed within the year. He was but shown to the people and withdrawn. Very different the manner of its close, and of his disappearance from open view, from that in which the great Eremita, his predecessor, closed his ministry and his life together. For the horses of fire and chariots of fire that whirled the Tishbite up in a mist of glory, we see sudden and portentous shadows descending on the Baptist's path, days of adversity and peril, a time of lingering captivity amid the prison glooms of Machærus. A strange, and as it might seem to us a mournful contrast between his early and his later days is this exchange of the solitude of the wilderness for the solitude of the dungeon. We think of the noble captive languishing in the darksome vault, for the free air he had breathed as he roamed the Judean woodland, and quenched his thirst from the mountain brook in those years of youthful inspiration, doomed to stagnate and droop amid close, unwholesome vapours, shut up and shackled within iron wards and walls of stone. It stirs us almost to tearful emotion to think of him as there, that elected servant of the Highest in the grasp of a licentious tyrant—the man with God's oil of consecration on his head the victim of one of those base and grovelling natures to whom God sometimes casts the crowns of earth—to think of a life like his closing there and thus. Looking at the outward side of things, men might have pronounced it a failure, a wretched and impotent close to a magnificent beginning. They might point to the preacher on whose lips thousands had hung, who had been borne so high on the springtide of popular favour, stranded there in the cold and dreary eve of life, with the tide ebbd from him, silent, powerless, forsaken, pining away in a felon's cell. But we may measure what the world calls failures by what it calls success. There were two brilliant successes and two notable failures recorded in history about this time. To Tiberius Cæsar came the imperial purple and orb,—to Herod, the diadem of Galilee;—to John the Baptist, the axe,—to Jesus Christ, the cross. Surely God thinks little of crowns and sceptres when we see to whom he leaves them, much of affliction and suffering when we see for whom he reserves them.

We may be sure that no dungeon grate could keep the light of heaven from shining into his heart. The praying soul has always its windows open to the Jerusalem above. The celestial visions and voices which had come to him in his sleep under the mountain cedars or on the desert stones could still visit and refresh the captive in his slumbers. The foot of the ladder on which angels come and go, has rested as often on the stone floor of earth's prisons, as on the marble pavement of its temples. If suffering for loyalty to an earthly king could inspire the worlds, how much more truly might they be spoken by the fettered confessor whose only crime is loyalty to his God:—

"Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for a hermitage.
If I am happy in my love,
And in my soul am free;
Angels alone who soar above
Enjoy such liberty."

The heavy shadows of captivity might dim his eagle eye; but we know that they could not dull the unquenchable fire of zeal that burned in his fearless soul. Once and again the Tetrarch of Galilee quailed before the man who sternly rebuked his sin, whom neither smiles nor frowns could tempt nor terrify into silence. The echoes of that warning voice from the dungeons beneath his feet rang through his guilty conscience, as he sat at the banquet with his lords and high captains around him, and his paramour at his side, with a clearness that the music and revelry could not drown.

It has been sometimes thought that in the circumstance of his sending two of his disciples to Jesus with the inquiry, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" there may be traced the effect of disappointment depressing the Baptist's spirit, and clouding over his faith for a time. It would be hard to believe that John could have a moment's doubt of the Messiahship of Jesus, whom he must have known, on hearing of his mighty works, to be the chosen one on whom he had seen the Holy Ghost descend and abide. We cannot doubt that the mission was intended for the confirmation of the faith of his disciples, though it may be that John had some hope of drawing from the Saviour's lips a fuller declaration of His divine character and work than He had as yet given. John may have wondered that the kingdom of heaven, of which he had said so much, had not been more openly proclaimed, and the eyes of all Israel turned to the Redeemer, but his faith in Jesus as the King of Zion, the bringer of salvation, could not waver for a moment. The answer of Jesus, in which he referred to the miracles that were the seals of his ministry (for "John did no miracle"), and especially to the fact that to the poor the gospel was preached, while it brought out into clearer prominence the spiritual glory of His kingdom, was meant to gladden the longing heart of the Forerunner with tidings of the hope, and peace, and joy it was silently bringing to the souls of men.

With such a message from the lips of Jesus the Baptist could willingly die. That night, in Herod's inner prison, he could sing his "Nunc Dimittis" more joyfully than ever. He had fulfilled his service—he had heard the Bridegroom's voice—he was needed no more on earth, and the sooner death could come the more welcome it would be, as the angel of deliverance, bidding him rise up, unfastening his chains, leading his spirit past all earthly wards and barriers, and out by the iron gate that opens on the broad and shining street of the city of God.

Yet a few days more, and as the revel was at its height in the royal hall, the drunken satrap found himself in a rash moment committed to his crime, bound in conscience to keep to a wanton the word which he had broken to his God. The grim headsmen went and returned—swiftly had he done his bloody work—but, unseen by him and them, the fiery chariot had in that brief interval descended and risen again from the martyr's dungeon door. By the hands of weeping disciples the lifeless form of their master was taken up and laid in a tomb. Where we know not: somewhere in the mould of Canaan, where so much hallowed dust has mouldered, there was given him a sepulchre; but the spot is as profoundly hidden from us as the grave that God made for Moses among the hills of Moab,—as the tomb that held the body of the Holiest One that ever died on earth. The tomb may be unmarked when the name is to be held in everlasting remembrance. And such reverence, and honour, and love wait through ages on the memory of the son of Zacharias. Never from the Christian mind can time efface the name of him who poured the mystic waters on the head of the Redeemer, who first pointed the eyes of the beloved disciple to his Lord, who, in the words he spake to him by the Jordan, is a Voice crying for ever, in the wilderness of the world to sinful and weary souls, Behold the Lamb of God!

"Verily, I say unto you, among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: NOTWITHSTANDING, HE THAT IS LEAST IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS GREATER THAN HE." The greatest of those born of women is, as such, less than the least of those who are born of the Spirit. The highest prophet's seat in the earthly temple is lower than the lowest in which a little child sits in the Kingdom of Grace, for he sits there at the feet of Christ.

J. D. B.

PROFESSOR GEORGE WILSON.

PART SECOND.

AFTER his appointment to the chair of Technology, he writes that he purposed "to slave less, and now only help religious meetings, or strictly professional ones," and adds, what may be regarded as a full account of his life during all these years, "I live from day to day, feeling no hold upon life, but happy many times, and for long hours, although my temperament is not one which even the choicest mercies could rob of its native inquietude and sensitiveness. But all is well. I have great holes in my heart, and dreary voids in my affections; but on this side the grave they cannot be filled, and I will work as hard as I can till the manumission comes." These words express comprehensively the real nature of the man, which lay under, and fed as from deep fountains, the unfailing geniality and kindliness of his manner. The "native inquietude" of which he speaks most men would not perceive in him; but his biographer justly remarks that excitable temperaments like his cannot but have times of depression. "My roving fancy," he tells John Cairns, "is ever building castles in the air, or digging dungeons in the nether depths. Well! well! there is a cure even for that, and for the benefit of poor dreamers like me it has been written that 'neither height nor depth' shall be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord. You need not tell me I am wrong in my exegesis; if I were right, I should not say it to such a dweller in the Interpreter's house as you. But I am right so far as regards myself, at this present moment."

The effect of advancing years and of middle age on such a temperament is beautifully and instructively touched in a letter to the same friend of his heart, "I met this day-week a lady whom I have not seen since I was some seventeen, nor was there anything to bridge over the long space between our two meetings. It has set me to meditate a great deal, this glimpse of myself at seventeen, with all that filled the years onwards to thirty-two obliterated; and I realize better than I might otherwise have done, what a changed being I am. I lament not the loss of my vivacity, for I had more than enough of that volatile ingredient, and can well afford to let some of it evaporate. One thing, however, does alarm me, the fear, namely, lest I should settle down into a sombre, prosaic mortal, leading a dawdling, semi-valetudinarian, coddling life, which were worse even than the alternate and unequal rises and falls of my youthful, wayward moods. The fires of my heart, which once blazed, are all burned out, or deliberately extinguished; and without making vows, which would be foolish and even sinful, I feel every day the circle of my imaginative roavings shorten its diameter, and the thirst of my earlier ambition cease, although, like the thirst of a fever-patient, it has never been slaked. All this is well, if the empty heart be filled by Him who should from the first have been its occupant; but I have seen in others, and I fear in myself, an exchange of dissipation of mind for unprofitable idleness, and this the more that my mode of life carries me out of the busy current, in which I formerly at least struggled to swim, and my health has embayed me in a side pool, little influenced by the tide."

Do we wish to know what made George Wilson the most beloved of men in his native city? His biography makes it plain enough, "he loved much." His own many afflictions did not bruise his heart, but it bled at every pore for the distresses of others, even as it gushed forth rejoicingly in their joy. Perhaps the most touching things in this book are his laments when feeling as if "all the brave, and young, and fair were dying, and a mere wreck like me allowed to float on." "I have given up making idols," he exclaims; "they are all taken away. Harry (a cousin's child) I thought of as full of life and energy; and destined, with that remarkable mechanical genius of his, to become great, and good, and famous, long, long after I had found rest in the grave. He was so beautiful—the most beautiful boy I ever saw—so loving, so lovable, what had Death to do with him? Was I not here and others, who had digged for death as for hidden treasure, and could even rejoice at the prospect of going to be with Christ, which for us is far better than a dying life here, that he should be summoned and we left! I have asked myself the same question regarding the death of Mackenzie, and still more regarding the loss of Edward Forbes, whose death is universally felt to be a public calamity. But I can find no answer, and expect none on this side the grave. I am learning, I hope, more and more to trust God, and to put faith in Christ; and to leave these, and a thousand other black mysteries to be explained, if God please, hereafter, and if it does not so please him, to be left unexplained." And the year before his death, while rusticated at Innerleithen, beside "the rippling Tweed and the quiet hills," and preparing the memoir of a friend of whom he says, "I loved him far better than ever I told him," he writes, "The reading of Ed. Forbes's papers continually brings before me the fate of my fellow-students, and often saddens me beyond endurance. I would lose heart and hope myself but for the hope of an endless and blessed life beyond the grave; yet is not the life of Christ enough to show us that on this earth sorrow and suffering are the appointed rule for most (I do not say for all), and may we not suffer with him that we may rise in glory with him also? May the blessed Saviour lead us in his own bleeding footsteps to the rest that remaineth for the children of God!"

His own end was now approaching, unknown, yet continually anticipated by one who was "dying daily" even in a physical sense. Full of genial activity, and exuberant fun, and active kindness, as usual, he went on from day to day feeling the light of truth shining brighter and warmer on his face. On his return to town at the commencement of a session, he writes to Dr. Cairns, the friend who had been and was so much to him:—"Greatly do I desire to see you, greatly wish to have a long, long talk about heaven and earth, the world that is, and the world that is to be. . . . Come to see us as soon as you can, and give me the benefit of a long Christian gossip with you. The way of life grows, blessed be God, clearer and clearer to me, and I know Christ better and better, though there is much darkness and despondency still, and weak faith, and downright sin. But I am thankful for much light and peace, and hope for more."

In writing to his friend, Daniel Macmillan, he had quaintly expressed the various effects of affliction, "The furnace of affliction puffs away some men in black smoke, and hardens others into useless slags, and melts a few into clear glass. May it refine us into gold seven times purified, ready to be fashioned into vessels for the Master's use." And like the effect of affliction is that of the habitual prospect of death. In a letter to the same friend, in 1848, he says, "I have been reading lately, with great sadness, the Memorials of Charles Lamb and the Life of Keats. There is something in the noble brotherly love of Charles to brighten, and hallow, and relieve the former; but Keats's death-bed is the blackness of midnight, unmitigated by one ray of light. "God keep you and me from such a death-bed! We may have physical agonies as great to endure. It is the common lot. I feel that our heavenly Father can better choose for us than we can for ourselves, of what we should die; but I pray our blessed Lord and Master to be with us in our last fight with the last enemy, and to give us the victory. If he does, what shall pain be but like other bitter medicines, the preparative for the unbroken health of an endless life?"

To many men the constant gazing into the face of the last enemy would have acted as an extinguisher of faith and love; by the grace of God it was not so to him. "Amid much thoughtlessness and forgetfulness of God, and many sins which exact their own punishment, and many which seem far too light to me, though in God's eye they are not light, I have a rejoicing feeling that a greater peace of mind and surer hope in Christ are mine, than was the case some years ago. If it please God to grant me longer life, my prayer is for more freedom from engrossing earthly cares, that I may do more to serve my blessed Lord and Master. And if I am not to live, may I die able to say that I know in whom I believe."

In November 1859 the inflammation which had so often seized upon his lungs returned unappeasably, and he sank into lassitude and prostration. A great craving for quiet and stillness marked the last hours. The twenty-third Psalm, and the promises of the Apocalypse "to him that overcometh" were read to him; then, by his own desire, passages from various secular papers. His friend, Dr. Cairns, now arrived, and prayed with him, while he said in great weakness, "I am in the hands of a good and kind Redeemer. I rejoice in that every way;" and the only smiles that were seen on his face. In those days of prostration were when his dearly loved friend put the question, "Is all peace?" His last articulate words, in answer to his sister's whisper, "You are going home, dear," were, "I've been an unworthy servant of a worthy and gracious Master," and then the last change appeared on the countenance, and the low breathing sank insensibly into peace. "Kneeling around the bed, a thanksgiving was offered, that for him the Saviour's prayer was answered, 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am;' and then the pent-up agony broke forth, for, to each had this beloved one been dearer than life."

We have allowed Dr. Wilson to speak so largely in his own words that there is no occasion to draw any moral from his life. Three things only we may note; but the illustration of them we shall again intrust to himself. The first is that that Christian life, which seemed to the onlooker mere sunshine and geniality, began in a view of the other and darker side. Was this a false thing or a wrong? "They accuse Christians of a selfish caring for their own souls. They forget that in this world every man must take wages; that no amateurs are permitted; that invisibly beside us stand at every moment the Lord of Light and the Prince of Darkness, to press into our hands the wages we have earned, whether we will or no; and that beyond the gates of death they will appear in their own persons and give us the last instalment, those abiding wages which shall multiply themselves through eternity."

Then, secondly, what was the character of the life into which, thus redeemed from death, he entered? "In spite of many disheartening and even distressing things, and cares, and fears, and sins, I have tasted so largely of the mercies of God; the all-attractiveness of the blessed Saviour's character, and the perfection of his example, have risen more recently into such prominence before me; and the sense of a higher presence, enabling me to enter into communion with God, and to pray acceptably unto him, has so filled my heart, that the things of this life arrange themselves according to a new perspective, and seem much smaller and further off than they did before."

So while, according to his own pithy expression, he was "resigned to live" and prepared to die, he also commended Christ to the love and faith of others. He did it by the daily beauty of an unselfish life, expanding continually in the soft sunshine of love, and he did it also in words such as we have here already recorded, or as he addressed to the students of that medical science which he so much loved. "I adjure you to remember that the head of our profession is Christ. He left all men an example that they should follow his steps; but he left it specially to us. It is well that the statues of Hippocrates and Esculapius should stand outside of our College of Physicians, but the living image of our Saviour should be enshrined in our hearts. . . . He is not ashamed to call us brethren. May none of us be ashamed to call him Lord! May we all confess him before men, that he may confess us before the angels in heaven!"

For those who survive, such exhortations as these remain, that we may follow in the steps of the redeemed; but for the faithful dead there is what may be best uttered in the words of a profound and noble poet of ancient days:—"For you is paradise opened, the tree of life is planted, the time to come is prepared, plenteousness is made ready, a city is builded, and rest is allowed, yea, perfect goodness and wisdom; the root of evil is sealed up from you, weakness and the moth is hid from you, and corruption is fled into hell to be forgotten; sorrows are passed, and in the end is showed the treasure of immortality." s.

ELUCIDATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

No. II.

"Jesus answered, I have told you that I am he. If therefore ye seek me, let these go their way: that the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none."—JOHN xviii, 8, 9.

A FEELING somewhat akin, perhaps, to disappointment, will be at times experienced by thoughtful readers, when looking at this alleged fulfilment of a word of Christ—as if our Lord's interposition to save his disciples from the mere outward violence of a Jewish rabble, belonged to a lower territory than that which was referred to in his intercessory prayer, when he spake to the Father of having kept those whom the Father had given to him. The words themselves, indeed, which he uttered on the occasion, taken in their original connection, seem plainly to point in a higher direction. "Those thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled." In that sense in which Judas had not been kept, the others were kept; but had not such keeping respect to the soul, rather than to the body? Was it not as regards the possession of spiritual life that he was lost, while they were kept? Undoubtedly it was; and even the bodily destruction which Judas shortly afterwards brought upon himself was but the consequence and sign of that deeper and more fearful destruction which had already passed over his spiritual being. But if so, how should the evangelist have so readily coupled with a provision for the temporal safety of the disciples the profound saying of Jesus? Why might they not have been taken with their Master here, and yet not been lost in the sense meant in his declaration?

There are occasional passages in the Gospels, and in none more than in the Gospel by John, in which application is made of portions of Scripture to events or circumstances, which have an apparent superficiality about them—an outwardness that looks rather like the symbol of the proper accomplishment, than that accomplishment itself. Yet it will always be found in such cases, that the specific accomplishment indicated is a perfectly valid one, as far as it goes; and not only so, but that it is of such a nature as, when thoughtfully considered, virtually infer whatever more of depth and inwardness can justly be associated with it. Take as an example the application made in the next chapter of this Gospel of Zechariah (xii. 10.), "They shall look on him whom they pierced." The evangelist refers to this passage in connection with the piercing of our Lord's side by the soldier's spear, at which there came out blood and water. He does not say precisely, that in the one there was a fulfilment of the other; he merely says, that it had been so written in a particular Scripture; but this undoubtedly implies, that he regarded the Scripture as properly bearing on the subject, and that in the bodily piercing there was a true, as well as palpable realization of it. Yet the merest child in spiritual discernment must see that the meaning of the prophecy reaches far deeper—points to the piercing of the Redeemer's soul with unutterable anguish, by the sins which brought him to the accursed tree. But did not the actual piercing of his side also imply as much? It did not stand alone, but was the closing act of the most fearful tragedy ever enacted on the earth,—in the course of which the very heart of Jesus had burst under the mighty burden of guilt and wrath that lay on it. So that the piercing of the body was at once the sequel and the sign of a profounder piercing, which went along with it, and in the one the other was reflected.

It is somewhat after the same manner that the passage before us has commonly been interpreted. The merely outward and corporeal preservation of our Lord's disciples has been viewed as, at least, a certain keeping of them, and a proof that whatever more was needed or might be implied, in the word of Jesus to the Father, would be afforded. So, for example, it is put by Tholuck, "A friendly solicitude was shown by our Lord for his disciples in the midst of his own danger, so that in this respect also John means to say the word of our Lord received a fulfilment. It is impossible that the evangelist could have been ignorant that spiritual protection is the subject of the language of the passage; but he means to say, that the words had providentially their fulfilment in this sense also." Yet as thus stated, it can scarcely be said to be an appropriate sense—not, at least, a sense so related to that which is conceived to be the strictly proper one as to form a necessary portion and a fit symbol of it. It may, however, be so viewed, and we have no doubt was so viewed by the evangelist himself, when he represented Christ as seeking here for his disciples what was necessary to the fulfilment of his own words regarding them. He might, and, we believe, did see, in their brief outward separation from him, the requisite condition of their spiritual preservation; and it was less for safety from bodily peril, than for security against spiritual apostasy, that liberty was obtained for them to go away.

Let us endeavour to realize the peculiar circumstances of the time. It was, no doubt, a terrible disaster to the cause of Jesus, that he, the Great Shepherd, should be smitten by the rod of ungodly men, and his little flock scattered from him. But how much worse still had it been, if the violent tempest which then burst forth had not been so far restrained in its fury as to allow them to be scattered—if it had swept them also away to the place of trial and condemnation! Jesus himself was thoroughly prepared to stand the fiery ordeal that awaited him. His omniscient eye perceived clearly beforehand what was approaching; and, supported by the might and holiness of Heaven, he could receive without faltering or dismay the shock that fell on him. But it was otherwise with his disciples. From the abiding weakness of their faith and the carnality of their views, they were sure to faint in the conflict. The most courageous and intrepid amongst them, when only hanging around the borders of the struggle, was betrayed into the most shameful denials of his Master. And what, then, might have been expected if he and his fellow-disciples had been mercilessly swept along in the current—exposed, like their Master, to every mark of shame and insult, and called by an infuriated mob to make their choice between recantation or death? Who can doubt as to what, in such a case, should have been the issue! They would assuredly have been lost to the cause of Jesus; the adversary would have triumphed over them. Their safety at that perilous moment lay in their flight. And that Jesus should have so far controlled the tumultuous elements around him as to say with effect, "Let these go their way," was but adopting the necessary precaution to keep them from falling, and thereby securing the fulfilment of his own word.

That the evangelist, then, should have made such an application of the saying of Christ, when rightly considered, was an evidence, not of a superficial, but rather of a profound look into the nature and tendencies of things. And the occasion itself, saying and fulfilment together, what a striking proof does it not afford of the watchful care and fidelity of the Shepherd of souls! It exhibits, by means of an instructive example, the provision he makes for the spiritual safety of his people, and how, even when apparently leaving them to their fate, he is secretly bending the current of events so as best to work out his purposes of grace in their behalf. All the saints, it tells us, are in his hand; still in it, and faithfully kept by it, when to outward seeming, and, perhaps, also to inward sense, it appears to be quitting its grasp of them. But viewing the matter in another aspect—in the connection so strongly marked by the evangelist between the spiritual safety of the disciples and the outward ordering of Providence to secure it—there is involved for all Christ's people a call to the exercise of a vigilant and cautious spirit in respect to temptations. It is true, a living faith can rise above the most adverse and trying circumstances in providence. But circumstances still have a most potent influence; they too often tell with a most disastrous effect; and it is the part of true Christian humility and wisdom to be ware of going needlessly into situations which, from their nature, are sure to put faith to a perilous test. Even that is not enough ; for it is often things of comparatively little moment in themselves which form, practically to us, the turning-point of life in the wrong direction. Though weak in other respects, they may, in respect to our state of mind, be attended with results the most pernicious. Let our prayer, therefore, ever ascend to God that he would order our lot according to his own infinite wisdom, so that we may not be led into temptation, but delivered from evil.

ST. JOHN OF THE GOLDEN-MOUTH:

A PROTESTANT PILGRIMAGE TO HIS SHRINE.

In degrading them into demi-gods, the Romish Church has really bereaved the Church of her saints. When I begin to adore them, I cease to enjoy with them the fellowship of the Holy Catholic Church ; I no longer look into the heart of a man, who has thought, and felt, and lived like me, compassed about with infirmities like mine. The Reformation has restored her saints to the Church, bidden us seek spiritual fellowship with their spirits in their recorded thoughts and words, taught us to travel in spirit to their true and only shrines, the works in which, though dead, they ever speak. Let us not wantonly exclude ourselves from this privilege ; let us continue in practice to sing, among the "glorious things" said of Zion, the city of our God, that this man and that of the world's true heroes, of God's true saints, was born there. The present article is intended as a memorial of one of these, John, for his eloquence surnamed Chrysostom, or Golden-mouth ; as represented by his little treatise "On the Priesthood," and to some extent representing the age he lived in.

The great orator of the ancient Church was born in 354, the same year with Augustine, the greatest of her doctors. This was not the only point of correspondence between the star of the East and the star of the West. Chrysostom and Augustine both were born of noble parents ; both at an early age were bereaved of their fathers ; both enjoyed the inestimable blessing of the guardian care of truly Christian mothers, though Monica, the mother of Augustine, has far eclipsed in fame the reputation of Chrysostom's mother, Anthusa. John received the best education, secular and sacred, that the age could furnish, and gave early indications of that genius which he afterwards laid as a living sacrifice on the altar of God. While yet a youth, he devoted himself to a monastic life, and buried himself alive in a cave of the desert. At the end of two years, in his twenty-seventh year, he was made a deacon ; and four years after, a presbyter of Antioch, his native city, where and when his bright career as a preacher began. Twelve years after this (398), in his glorious prime, he was translated, much against his will, to the patriarchate of Constantinople. In this lofty position he distinguished himself, not only by his unwearied labours and unrivalled power as a preacher, but by the fervour of his benevolence, spending his wealth and his life in succouring the distressed, and of his zeal for the extension and purification of God's house, sending missionaries to the heathen, and rousing the deadly enmity of the imperial court and of the degenerate clergy, by his unsparing denunciation of prevalent corruptions, and his efforts to restore the ancient discipline of the Church. He was consequently persecuted for righteousness' sake, was twice unlawfully deposed from his office, twice tyrannically banished from his flock, and died at last in exile in the fifty-fourth year of his age, A.D. 407. His work "On the priesthood" belongs to the earlier period of his life, when he was a humble presbyter at Antioch. But our notes on the book will refer to the whole life of which it represents a part.

It is a significant fact, that a large portion of this work on the priesthood is occupied with the subject of preaching. The work of preaching occupied a corresponding place in the lives and labours of Chrysostom, Augustine, Athanasius, Ambrose, Nazianzen, and other true saints and bishops of that age. Of the eleven folio volumes of the Parisian edition of Chrysostom's works, almost the whole is filled with sermons and other public discourses. The Council of Trent has declared that preaching is the chief work of a bishop. This declaration is not mere impudence, rising to sublimity ; it represents a traditional impression made upon the mind of the Church by the labours of her fathers, and still continuing to linger long after the bishops had ceased to preach.

It is interesting to observe, from Chrysostom's instructions on this noble office, that in his day as in ours the preacher had to be on his guard against the temptation to "fine preaching,"—a temptation presented by the thirst of unspiritual minds for mere theatrical amusement—a thirst which is gratified by the stage tricks and clap-trap of pulpit rhetoricians. For this "fine preaching," Chrysostom, like St. Paul, and all truly great Christians, great orators, great men, cherished a just disdain ; although his own compositions have not escaped the reproach of being tainted with the meretricious taste of a degenerate age. He recommends a noble and masculine simplicity, as became an admirer at once of St. Paul and of Demosthenes. As the basis of all good preaching, he demands a vigorous and cultivated intellect, capable of grappling with the contrivances of the age—capable of dealing with the manifold weaknesses and wants of the heart, and filled with the word of Christ. He combats the fanaticism which would have neither cultivation nor learning in the preacher, by the truth, that as speech and reasoning are the only instruments by which a man can reach and move the souls of men, the preacher ought to possess these instruments in their utmost possible perfection ; somewhat in the strain of him who answered the statement, "God has no need of my learning," by the counter-statement, "God has no need of your ignorance." He rebuts the objection drawn from the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. ii. 1, 2), by showing that what the apostle disclaims is the vain, artificial eloquence and philosophy run after at Corinth, and that, in point of true eloquence and wisdom, and an earnest employment of every legitimate weapon of argument and persuasion, the magnanimous apostle has never been surpassed.

Above all, we note the precepts and practice of this prince of preachers regarding the matter of preaching. While instructing the preacher to "keep abreast of his age," he appears to have no idea of anything to be preached but the word of God. He pronounces a fervent eulogy on Paul, as being, by his "adamantine" epistles, the pillar and ground of all the Churches. He largely quotes from Scripture to show that not only the preachers of his own age, but even the evangelists of the apostolic age were bound to search the Scriptures, as the bread of the Church's life. And the practical conclusion of his argument for the culture and furnishing of the mind is: "See, then, that the word of Christ dwell in you richly." His own discourses amply illustrate his precepts. These discourses, like those of his great contemporaries in the pulpit, were, for the most part, a running commentary on portions of Scripture; somewhat like the voluminous commentaries of our first reformers. We fear that this laudable practice—of exposition of paragraphs of the Bible—does not now prevail to nearly the same extent among the Churches of the Reformation. Again, Chrysostom's expositions were real expositions; he was one of the reformers of exposition, from the absurd allegorizing of Origen and his school, who brought out of Scripture just what they chose to put into it. He faithfully and honestly endeavours to find out, and to say with all his might, just what the word of God has given him to say; and his renown as a preacher rebukes the folly of those preachers who are not contented with the plain truth as God has given it, who disdain the labour of Grammar and Lexicon, of comparing spiritual things with spiritual, and grasp at the fame of originality, or at rigid completeness of system, by corrupting the divine word with arbitrary fancies and interpretations of their own devising. But another remark suggests itself in this same connection. The Church of Rome forbids the use of the Scriptures to the people; commands her doctors to interpret them only in her sense, and declares that the only authentic edition is the Vulgate. Chrysostom and his contemporaries press upon all men the duty of reading the word of God for themselves, publicly lecture to the people over large portions of Scripture, and, like Protestant ministers, are determined in their interpretations wholly and solely by the word of God itself. As to the Vulgate, in Chrysostom's time it was completed, probably by Jerome. But for three hundred years before, this only authentic edition, with its hundreds of errors, was not in possession of the Church. Poor Church, she had only the original Scriptures, as they came from the pen of inspiration! It is not in the least likely that Chrysostom ever used this "authentic" version; for aught that we can learn, he never saw it or heard of it; and, if he had had it in his hands, we know that rather than rest upon an indifferent translation in a foreign language, he would read the Greek originals in his mother tongue.

He instructs the preacher to make himself master of the controversy with Jews and Manichæans. There is no mention made of the pagan religion, only of a pagan philosophy. Ten years before Chrysostom was born, Christianity was established in the Roman empire by Constantine the Great, and paganism ceased to be the religion of the state. When Chrysostom was a boy at school, an attempt was made to re-instate the old religion by the Emperor Julian the Apostate. The attempt proved a failure. And, under a series of Christian emperors, Christianity triumphed more and more widely, so that, before the end of our author's life, the old religion was professed only by isolated individuals, or by the rustic inhabitants of secluded villages and hamlets (hence, as is well-known, the name of pagan, "villager").

But while the old paganism was thus disappearing before the advancing triumphs of the Church, a new paganism was springing up in her bosom. The lifetime of Chrysostom witnessed the definitive adoption of most of those corruptions in doctrine and practice which constituted the half-religion, half-poetry of the middle ages, which was condensed into a theological system by the Council of Trent, and which prevails to this day in the baptized paganism of the Greek and Roman Churches. It is true that the peculiar pretensions of the Bishop of Rome to a universal supremacy had not yet been heard of, and would have been listened to with a smile of derision. Some time before this, a Bishop of Rome had been severely dealt with by Saint Cyprian, for appearing to claim a superiority over one of his brother bishops. Pope Zozimus, a contemporary of Chrysostom, was compelled to retract the sanction which, in his ignorance, he had given to the Pelagian heresy. Chrysostom himself, as Patriarch of Constantinople, occupied, along with the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, a position in relation to the Romish bishop of brotherly equality and independence; although, at the first, there was conceded to the Bishop of Rome a certain precedence in rank, as having his seat in the old imperial city. Soon after, however, as the new Rome began to eclipse the old, the patriarchs of Constantinople began to claim the precedence; one of them went so far as to call himself "universal bishop"—an appellation which was rebuked by Pope Leo the Great, as a plain proof that the man who adopted it was Antichrist. Yet the lifetime of Chrysostom witnessed the extinction of the liberties of the Christian people and ministry, under the ecclesiastical tyranny of the episcopate, which order, by a just retribution, was itself subjected to the occasional tyranny of the emperor and his officers. Thus we learn, from the little book before us, that in his early life the presbyters were elected by the people; we know from other sources that the bishop had not altogether ceased to be simply the permanent moderator of presbytery, first among equals. But before the end of our author's life, the free voice of the people and the free action of the presbyters, had been finally suppressed; and the emperors had not only called two of the four great councils of the fourth and fifth centuries, but had begun, in many respects, directly or indirectly, to assume a controlling power over the peculiar officers and functions of the Church.

The worship of the Church had been corrupted by the introduction of image-worship and saint-worship, the latter in avowed imitation of the pagan worship, and intended to wean pagans from their demi-gods by presenting a set of demi-gods in the Church; generally, the worship of the Church had degenerated into a sensuous "will-worship." In the treatise before us, Chrysostom speaks of a religious order of widows and virgins, now represented by our nunneries. One of its six books is devoted to the subject of Monachism, as a recognised institution of the Church, invested with peculiar sacredness and sanctity. He himself, as we have said, was a monk for two years. One of the most interesting passages in his work is its account of the pathetic pleading of his mother, when she discovered that the cruel system was likely to bereave her of her only son.

Soon after, he gives us a curious illustration of the power of a false system in blinding and enslaving a truly noble Christian heart. He entrapped his dear friend Basil into the ministry by a lying trick, which a man of the world would blush to own in our day; and yet which Saint John Chrysostom acknowledges, not only without blushing for the meanness, but with unconcealed self-gratulation. He himself was entrapped by a similar trick into the patriarchate of Constantinople. It is singular, that, of the two detailed commandments of the second table which admit of no exception (the 7th and the 9th), the one has been set aside by the practice of men of the world, and the other by the practice and theory of a corrupted Church. As worldlings have always looked on impurity as a venial folly, so the Church had by this time taught and practised the detestable maxim, that lying is not only lawful, but laudable, if it be for the glory of God and the good of the Church. Chrysostom shared in the sin and shame of his age. But his flight and concealment of himself when he was elected to the ministry, and his invincible repugnance to come to Constantinople, we must in justice ascribe to the personal virtue, the Christian humility of the man.

With corruptions in the practice of an age or Church are associated, all but invariably, corruptions in doctrine. In the days of Chrysostom, the Church had deeply corrupted the whole saving doctrine of grace. Her great controversy regarding the person of Christ appears to have done nothing to purify her faith regarding his redeeming work. The heresy of Pelagius, which Augustine had to combat soon after our great orator was laid in his grave, was but a systematic development of errors that had long been mingling with all Church doctrines and institutions. The evangelical church-historian delights to find evidence in Chrysostom's works to show that he did believe and preach the gospel. And so, no doubt, he did; so did all the true saints of the Church. But the gospel, the evangelical system proper, of salvation only by grace, did not as at the Reformation boldly appear as the sum and substance, the life and soul of what they believed and proclaimed. Even Augustine, the doctor of grace, never appreciated as Luther and his brother reformers did, the due place and value, as the sun of Christian theology, of the doctrine of justification by faith. And, though the truth appear by glimpses in the writings of his illustrious contemporary, yet, in the whole strain of his life and his teaching, it too plainly appears that he groped in the advancing twilight of the dark age of the Church; that he attached an undue importance to ceremonial and other works of man; that he had but a clouded and imperfect view of the sole, sovereign efficacy of the grace of God in Christ. Thus, for example, as we have seen, he became a monk. On the very title page of his treatise, we see that he regards the Christian ministry as a priesthood; and in the body of the work we find that he regards that ministry not only with a holy reverence, but with a superstitious awe; and speaks of it as if it were invested with a true sacerdotal power of mediation between God and men. And along with this popish ritualism we find in him traces of popish Pelagianism. Thus, in his argument for the use of cultivated reason in preaching, he appears to forget that the preacher's reason is only an instrument, that the power is only of God. In rebutting the objection from the words of St. Paul, he not only employs the argument already noticed, but also this: That the case of Paul is not in point, because he had the power of working miracles, and the miracles themselves compelled conviction and assent—as if a true faith could be produced without the inward illumination of the Spirit, as if we had not the promise of that Spirit as truly as Paul the preacher.

But he was a true and noble saint of God; his new birth is one of the glorious things said of Zion; his sins have now been cleansed, his vision has been cleared, and the word which he searched and preached on earth, he beholds and praises in the cloudless light of the Jerusalem above. This is the conviction wrought in us by a review of his actual character, and deeds, and words. It is easy for us in our brighter light to detect his errors. Do we emulate his virtues? his unwearied labours? his heroic love? With our brighter faith, can we show a brighter practice, a brighter evidence of being born into the city of God?

OUR DORCAS MEETINGS.—No. VI.

EMPLOYMENT OF TIME—MENTAL IMPROVEMENT.

I EXPRESSED my hope, at our next evening meeting, that my young friends had been endeavouring, during the past fortnight, to keep the subject of our last conversation in view, and reduce to practice some of the hints I had given them. Some smiled, others looked down, none took courage to speak, till Fanny, with a blush, told me she had been rising half an hour earlier than formerly every morning.

"Well, that is a good beginning; you have gained seven whole hours for some useful purpose; and I believe you will have spent them well, for we value whatever has cost us trouble to attain, and in these cold mornings the effort of rising even half an hour sooner would be considerable at first. So I am sure you would have grudged to make it for any trifling purpose."

"Papa has been wishing me to read Milner's Church History this winter, and I did not think I had time for it; but now I have begun it before breakfast."

"A most excellent occupation for the time you have thus 'redeemed.'"

"And Miss Morton" (looking at one of the girls) "has begun to knit a purse for her brother, in the time between prayers and breakfast, when she used to do nothing; and she says it is half finished already."

Of this also I highly approved, and one or two other little efforts and plans of a similar kind were mentioned and talked over.

I then read our Lord's parable of the nobleman and his servants (Luke xix. 12-27), and made some remarks upon it, showing, among other things, how the pound might be understood as signifying our time, which, in a certain sense, is distributed alike to all; for to every one it may be said, while life is prolonged on earth, "Are there not twelve hours in the day?" For this gift each one must render account at last, and the judgment pronounced on the servant who made no effort to improve his share, may teach us that even mere idleness, or inaction, which some consider a trifling fault, is a positive sin in the Master's sight.

I then referred to what I had previously said of the double aim which we ought ever to have in the employment of time—our personal improvement, spiritual and mental—and the duty of usefulness to others and to the cause of Christ.

"I do not intend at present," I said, "to dwell much on the point which yet I feel to be the most important of all,—that of spiritual diligence and progress. From our valued minister, on Sabbath, and at his own class, you receive instructions in regard to eternal concerns better far than I could give. Our meetings here are not, strictly speaking, for religious instruction, though I desire to keep it also in view. Let me only solemnly remind you, dear young friends, that while many things which we speak of together here, are useful, desirable, agreeable, deserving and claiming your attention, yet one thing is needful—to have an interest in Christ secured for eternity! Oh, let this be your first, your chief concern. Let other things be set aside till this is settled; let everything else be neglected rather than this. And recollect that after you have cause to believe that, through grace, you are indeed 'passed from death unto life,' you are not to rest there, but to seek, by the diligent use of all God's appointed means, to grow in grace and in knowledge.

"At present I shall take it for granted that you are giving personal religion the first place in your regard, and shall rather speak of how, as Christians, we ought to improve time for cultivating and strengthening those mental powers which God has given us. A well-informed, well-regulated mind,—what a treasure that is! and one which, by God's blessing on your own efforts, the busiest and humblest among you may possess.

"Let us look for instances in Scripture where mental cultivation was added to spiritual graces. Can you give me one?"

"Moses."

"Yes; he was 'learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians.' He had every advantage of early education, as far as mental accomplishment was known in those days, and he profited by it. And he must often have reaped the benefit, when called in after life to govern and direct an ignorant and self-willed people."

The next example given was David.

"David's must, indeed, have been a singularly gifted and attractive mind. His education was probably much less intellectual than that of Moses; and much less time had been bestowed upon it, as at a very early age we find him engaged in 'keeping the sheep.' He appears to have especially excelled in what we now call the fine arts—music and poetry. And how greatly has the Spirit of God made use of these his natural and acquired endowments, when fully sanctified and consecrated, for the delight and consolation of the Church in all after ages! But I think you have not yet mentioned the highest Scriptural example, in a mere man, of mental cultivation."

"Solomon."

"Yes; the intellectual attainments of Moses were added, in his case, to the more elegant accomplishments of his father David. In commerce, architecture, natural history, as well as poetry and music, he was equally at home. No wonder that 'his fame was in all nations round about,' and that from 'all people' he had admiring visitors. And although we are told that this 'wisdom and understanding and largeness of heart' were in a peculiar manner the gift of God, we have no reason to suppose that this was bestowed in any supernatural or miraculous way, without the ordinary means of diligent study. Alas! we might read some sad though profitable lessons from his latter history; but on this I shall not now dwell."

I then showed how, from these and other Scripture examples, including that of our Lord himself, who in his human nature condescended to "grow in wisdom" as well as in stature, it appears plain that Christians ought not to despise mental acquirements and accomplishments, but should cultivate them as God gives opportunity. And I pointed out the cheering truth, that while all personal attractions of a merely external kind, dependent on youth and health for their continuance, must soon fade and lose their power to please, the resources and enjoyments of the mind may be constantly increasing and acquiring new powers of giving pleasure and benefit to ourselves and others, to the very close of life,—so long, at least, as God sees good to preserve our faculties entire. What delightful instances of this are often found in aged Christians; and how marvelously the soul is sometimes permitted to assert its superior nature, and triumph over bodily weakness and decay! Nor can we doubt that in this as in other things we are sowing seed in time to be reaped in eternity. For all our mental faculties, and the use we have made of them, we must render account at last; and the blessedness and glory in the Father's house will be apportioned to each child of God, according to his capacity of receiving them.

"Women," I said, "are naturally more in danger of wasting time and thought on trifles than men are. It is our duty to be much occupied with what, in one sense, are 'little things;' it is our temptation to be engrossed by them, so as to neglect nobler objects of attention. With regard to all subjects which it is suitable and desirable for us to study, our minds are, I believe, quite as capable of cultivation as those of the majority of our brethren. I have no wish to see any of you philosophers, lawyers, doctors; but I earnestly desire that each of you may become, according to your station and circumstances, an intelligent, well-informed, or accomplished woman, and thus possess unfailing resources for the future, of enjoyment to yourselves and usefulness to others, whether Providence appoint for you the state of married or single life."

We then had some conversation on the wonderful nature of the human mind—its various properties, faculties, affections—the will, the understanding, memory, conscience, &c., &c. The train of thought suggested seemed new to most of my young friends, and as they listened and asked questions, the usual work of the evening was almost at a stand. But I had neither the ability nor the desire to lead them far into the depths of moral philosophy, and so returned to a more practical view of the subject.

I gave, as formerly, a few special directions of a simple and practical kind.

1. Do not be discouraged by difficulties in the pursuit of mental improvement. I know that some of you will be ready to tell me, "I have no time,"—"I have small abilities,"—"I have a bad memory,"—"I have no money to buy books,"—"How can I attend to my mind, when occupied constantly in working with my hands?" and so on. There may be much truth in all this, and yet no reason for discouragement, far less despondency. It is amazing what can be done—what has been done, in numberless instances—when the mind is fairly roused and set to work, in the "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties." Why should not any of you succeed, as others have in the same, or in worse circumstances? The old saying holds true still, "What man has done, man may do." Keep in mind what we said last evening in regard to "redeeming the time," and especially its corners and fragments, which may be all some of you can have to dispose of for intellectual improvement, and of giving such real attention to whatever you are engaged in as will enable you to make much use of a little while. Recollect that although education, in the true meaning of the word, may continue all through life, and you should never consider yourselves too old to learn, yet youth is as it were the season of spring in the mental world, most favourable for exertion, when the seeds of truth and knowledge are to be diligently sown, when memory is strongest, and the energies most at command. Never forget, as I have said before, "the power of littles;" and though what you may be able to read or to learn appears small from day to day, you will soon find, on looking back, that your progress is real and satisfactory.

2. Inquire in earnest in what you are most deficient, and aim steadily at improvement there. If you really desire to gain useful knowledge, be not afraid to look your own ignorance in the face, nor ashamed to confess it. Perhaps, from early disadvantages, some of you may be behind others in the very rudiments of education. Such I would entreat to endeavour at once, by every possible means, to regain the lost ground. Without a thorough power of reading and writing easily, and a fair knowledge of ordinary arithmetic, you can never hope to make a good figure in any station of life, and mental improvement, if not impossible, will be hindered at every step. A friend lately wrote to me that she had been much vexed by the folly of a young woman, who, after having been a year in her service, was discovered to be extremely deficient in both reading and writing. In the kindest way the lady spoke to her on the subject, advised her to lose no time in beginning to learn, and offered to give her a lesson as often as she wished. The girl seemed grateful, but evidently excessively annoyed that her ignorance had been found out, and was so afraid of her fellow-servants suspecting how she was employed, that it was only occasionally, in the most private manner, she would come to her mistress for a lesson. Of course, it was impossible in this way to do much; and when, at the end of another year, circumstances made my friend make a change in her establishment, the poor girl had made but little progress; and thus, by her own false shame, had lost an opportunity of improvement such as it is not likely she will ever again have in her power.

But I hope few, if any of you, are wanting in the foundations of education. Then consider what other subjects you are least acquainted with, as history (that of Scripture first), geography, natural history, &c., and try how you can best increase your information on these points. As to what are commonly called accomplishments, probably few of you may have leisure to acquire them. Yet music, vocal at least, is now brought in a great measure within reach of all; nor can there be a more delightful recreation, in its proper place, for those who possess a good voice and ear. But with regard to music, drawing, or the study of a new language, I would advise you to think well before you begin, because, unless you have a decided taste or talent for such pursuits, time in your position may be much better bestowed than in acquiring an imperfect knowledge of them. The study of the works of God, what we call natural history or science, all of you should keep in view; and so much is now written and spoken regarding this in a cheap and popular way, that any one who desires it may now acquire a degree of knowledge which not many years ago was only within reach of the wealthy and the learned.

3. Be careful how and what you read. For the most of you, whose school days are over, and who have not leisure to attend classes and lectures, books must be the great means of acquiring new information. Be careful, be prayerful in your selection. And if, unknowingly, you have begun an author whose sentiments you perceive to be sceptical, unscriptural, or immoral, close the book at once, however fascinating in other respects. For to read on would be voluntarily to take poison into your mind and soul, from the deadly effects of which you might be long of recovering. Make a strong effort to resist the attractions of fiction, and give your time to books of real value. The periodical literature of our day is thought by many persons to be carried too far, and in danger of destroying habits of steady, solid reading; but for those who have only a small amount of time or money at command, it is a great comfort to be able to secure so much information in so cheap and portable a form as can be found in our standard publications of this kind. But in regard to these, also, I would say, whether religious or literary, read them steadily and thoughtfully, not merely glancing them over.

4. Be ready to learn something anywhere, and from any one you meet with. I do not mean as a regular lesson; but it has been well remarked that we can hardly come in contact with any person who is not, on some subject or other, intellectual or practical, better informed than ourselves;—and by taking a little pains to find out where lies the knowledge of our companion, we may be quietly increasing our own store. Of course this is especially true in regard to the young, and a humble, intelligent mind, will gain much by recollecting and acting upon it.

5. Learn to think—no easy task afterwards, unless begun and persevered in during youthful years. Endeavour, with divine assistance, to disentangle your mind from the crowd of trifling, unconnected ideas and imaginations ever passing through it, and to fix your thoughts, from time to time, on some matter of real importance. Even for the busiest among you, such opportunities will generally be found in the course of each day, when, though your hands may be occupied, your thoughts are lawfully at liberty. Nor need you be at a loss, surely, for a subject of profitable consideration.

I might say much of the way in which writing may be applied to the same object, by such as have leisure for it.

6. Remember that no efforts, in this or any other cause, will succeed without the blessing of God upon them; that we can only expect this blessing while in the path of duty; and that the duty of seeking our own mental improvement must often give way to others of yet higher claims. No book written by man, however useful in itself, will be made a blessing to you, if for it the Book of God is neglected. No course of study, however desirable, is right for you to pursue, if, in order to do so, the immediate claims of home, of whatever kind, must be set aside. But recollect, for your encouragement, that self-improvement may often be much forwarded by what seem unlikely means, and that the pearls of knowledge will be found in many unexpected corners by those who diligently seek them. c. c.

THE LEAVEN OF FALSE DOCTRINE.*

"Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—MATT. xvi. 6.

THE danger against which Christ warns the apostles is false doctrine. He says nothing about the sword of persecution, or the open breach of the ten commandments, or the love of money, or the love of pleasure. All these things no doubt were perils and snares to which the souls of the apostles were exposed. Against these things, however, our Lord raises no warning voice here. His warning is confined to one single point,—“The leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.” We are not left to conjecture what our Lord meant by that word “leaven.” The Holy Ghost, a few verses after the very text on which I am now dwelling, tells us plainly that by leaven was meant the “doctrine” of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.

Let us try to understand what we mean when we speak of the “doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.” Without a clear understanding of this point the whole paper you are now reading will be useless.

The doctrine of the Pharisees may be summed up in three words,—they were formalists, tradition-worshippers, and self-righteous. They attached such weight to the traditions of men that they practically regarded them as of more importance than the inspired writings of the Old Testament. They valued themselves upon excessive strictness in their attention to all the ceremonial requirements of the Mosaic law. They thought much of being descended from Abraham; they said in their hearts, “We have Abraham for our father.” They fancied because they had Abraham for their father, that they were not in peril of hell like other men; and that their descent from him was a kind of title to heaven.

* From “Beware of False Doctrine.” An Invaluable tract by Mr. Ryle.

They attached great value to washings and ceremonial purifyings of the body, and believed that the very touching of the dead body of a fly or gnat would defile them. They made a great ado about the outward parts of religion, and such things as could be seen of men. They made broad their phylacteries, and enlarged the fringes of their garments. They prided themselves on paying great honour to dead saints, and garnishing the sepulchres of the righteous. They were very zealous to make proselytes. They thought much of having power, rank, and pre-eminence, and of being called by men, "Rabbi, Rabbi." These things, and many such-like things, the Pharisees did.

All this time, remember, they did not formally deny any part of the Old Testament Scripture. But they brought in, over and above it, so much of human invention, that they virtually put Scripture aside, and buried it under their own traditions. And of this sort of religion, our Lord says to the apostles, "Take heed and beware."

The doctrine of the Sadducees, on the other hand, may be summed up in three words,—free-thinking, scepticism, and rationalism. Their creed was one far less popular than that of the Pharisees, and, therefore, we find them less often mentioned in the New Testament Scriptures. So far as we can judge from the New Testament, they appear to have held the doctrine of degrees of inspiration. At all events they attached exceeding value to the Pentateuch above the other parts of the Old Testament, if indeed they did not altogether ignore the latter. They believed that there was no resurrection, no angel, and no spirit. They tried to laugh men out of their belief in these things, by supposing hard cases, and bringing forward difficult questions. We have an instance of their mode of argument in the case which they propounded to our Lord of the woman who had had seven husbands, when they asked, "In the resurrection whose wife shall she be of the seven?" And in this way they probably hoped, by rendering religion absurd, and its chief doctrines ridiculous, to make men altogether give up the faith they had received from the Scriptures.

All this time, remember, we may not say that the Sadducees were downright infidels,—this they were not. We may not say they denied revelation altogether,—this they did not do. They observed the law of Moses. Many of them were found among the priests in the times described in the Acts of the Apostles. But the practical effect of their teaching was to shake men's faith in any revelation, and to throw a cloud of doubt over men's minds, which was only one degree better than infidelity. And of all such kind of doctrine—free-thinking, scepticism, rationalism—our Lord says,—"Take heed and beware."

Now the question arises, Why did our Lord Jesus Christ deliver this warning? He knew, no doubt, that within forty years the schools of the Pharisees and the Sadducees would be completely overthrown. He that knew all things from the beginning, knew perfectly well that in forty years Jerusalem, with its magnificent temple, would be destroyed, and the Jews scattered over the face of the earth. Why then do we find him giving this warning about the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees?

I believe that our Lord delivered this solemn warning for the perpetual benefit of that Church which he came on earth to found. He spoke with a prophetic knowledge. He knew well the diseases to which human nature is always liable. He foresaw that the two great plagues of his Church upon earth would always be the doctrine of the Pharisees and the doctrine of the Sadducees. He knew that these would be the upper and nether mill stones, between which his truth would be perpetually crushed and bruised until he came the second time. He knew that there always would be Pharisees in spirit, and Sadducees in spirit, among professing Christians. He knew that their succession would never fail, and their generation never become extinct,—that though the names of Pharisees and Sadducees were no more, yet their principles would always exist. He knew that during the time that the Church lasts, until his return, there would always be some that would add to the word, and some that would subtract from it,—some that would stifle it, by adding to it other things, and some that would bleed it to death, by subtracting from its principal truths. And this is the reason why we find him delivering this solemn warning. "Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."

And now comes the question, Had not our Lord Jesus Christ good reason to give this warning? I appeal to all who know anything of Church history, Was there not indeed a cause? I appeal to all who remember what took place soon after the apostles were dead. Do we not read that in the Church of Christ there rose up two distinct parties,—one ever inclined to err, like the Arians, in holding less than the truth,—the other ever inclined to err, like the relic worshippers and saint worshippers, in holding more than the truth as it is in Jesus? Do we not see the same thing coming out in after times, in the form of Romanism on the one side, and Socinianism on the other? Do we not read in the history of our own Church of two great parties, the nonjurors on the one side, and the latitudinarians on the other? These are ancient things. Time and space make it impossible for me to enter more fully into them. They are things well known to all who are familiar with records of past days. There always have been these two great parties,—the party representing the principles of the Pharisee, and the party representing the principles of the Sadducee. And therefore our Lord had good cause to say of these two great principles, "Take heed and beware."

But I desire to bring the subject near to you at the present moment. I ask you to consider whether warnings like this are not especially needed in these times in which our lot is cast. We have, undoubtedly, much to be thankful for in England. We have made great advances in arts and sciences. We have much of the form and show of morality and religion. But I ask anybody who can see beyond his own door, or his own fireside, whether we do not live in the midst of dangers from false doctrine?

We have amongst us, on the one side, a school of men, who, wittingly or unwittingly, are paving the way into the Church of Rome,—a school that professes to draw its principles from primitive tradition, the writings of the Fathers, and the voice of the Church;—a school that talks and writes so much about the Church, the ministry, and the sacraments, that it makes them like Aaron's rod swallow up everything else in Christianity;—a school that attaches vast importance to the outward form and ceremonial of religion,—to gestures, postures, bowings, crosses, piscinas, sedilia, credence-tables, rood screens, albs, tunics, chasubles, altar cloths, and many other like things, about which not a word is to be found in the Holy Scriptures. When we examine the proceedings of that school, there can be but one conclusion concerning them. I believe, whatever be the meaning and intention of its teachers, that upon them has fallen the mantle of the Pharisees.

We have, on the other hand, a school of men who, wittingly or unwittingly, appear to pave the way to Socinianism;—a school which holds strange views about the plenary inspiration of Holy Scripture,—strange views about the doctrine of sacrifice and the Atonement of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ,—strange views about the eternity of punishment, and God's love to man; a school strong in negatives, but very weak in positives,—skilful in raising doubts, but impotent in laying them,—clever in unsettling and unscrewing men's faith, but powerless to offer any firm rest for the sole of our foot. And whether the leaders of this school mean it or not, I believe that on them has fallen the mantle of the Sadducees.

These things sound harsh. It saves a vast deal of trouble to shut our eyes and say, "I see no danger," and because it is not seen, therefore not to believe it. It is easy to stop our ears and say, "I hear nothing," and because we hear nothing, therefore to feel no alarm. But we know well who they are that rejoice over the state of things we have to deplore in some quarters of our own Church. We know what the Roman Catholic thinks. We know what the Socinian thinks. The Roman Catholic rejoices over the rise of the Tractarian party. The Socinian rejoices over the rise of men who teach such views as those lately set forth about the atonement and inspiration. They would not rejoice as they do, if they did not see their work being done, and their cause being helped forward. The danger, I believe, is far greater than we are apt to suppose. The books that are read in many quarters, are most mischievous. The tone of thought on religious subjects, among many classes, and especially among the higher ranks, is deeply unsatisfactory. The plague is abroad. If we love life, we ought to search our own hearts, and try our own faith, and make sure that we stand on the right foundation. Above all, we ought to take heed that we ourselves do not imbibe the poison of false doctrine, and go back from our first love.

I feel deeply the painfulness of speaking out on these subjects. I know well that plain speaking about false doctrine is very unpopular, and that the speaker must be content to find himself thought very uncharitable, very troublesome, and very narrow minded. Thousands of people can never distinguish differences in religion. To them a clergyman is a clergyman, and a sermon is a sermon, and as to any difference between one minister and another, or one doctrine and another, they are utterly unable to understand it. I cannot expect such people to approve of any warning against false doctrine. I must make up my mind to meet with their disapprobation, and must bear it as I best can.

But I will ask any honest-minded, unprejudiced Bible reader to turn to the New Testament and see what he will find there. He will find many plain warnings against false doctrine. "Beware of false prophets."—"Beware lest any man spoil you by philosophy and vain deceit."—"Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines."—"Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God" (Matt. vii. 15; Col. ii. 8; Heb. xiii. 9; 1 John iv. 1.) He will find a large part of several inspired epistles taken up with elaborate explanations of true doctrine and warnings against false teaching. I ask whether it is possible for a minister who takes the Bible for his rule of faith, to avoid giving warnings against doctrinal error.

Finally, I ask any one to mark what is going on in England at this very day. I ask whether it is not true that hundreds have left the Established Church and joined the Church of Rome within the last thirty years? I ask whether it is not true hundreds remain within our pale, who in heart are little better than Romanists, and who ought, if they were consistent, to walk in the steps of Newman and Manning, and go to their own place. I ask again whether it is not true that scores of young men, both at Oxford and Cambridge, are spoiled and ruined by the withering influence of scepticism, and have lost all positive principles in religion. Sneers at religious newspapers, loud declarations of dislike to "parties," high sounding, vague phrases about "deep thinking, broad views, new light, and the effete weakness of certain schools of theology," make up the whole Christianity of many of the rising generation. And yet, in the face of these notorious facts, men cry out, "Hold your peace about false doctrine. Let false doctrine alone!"—I cannot hold my peace. Faith in the Word of God, love to the souls of men, the vows I took when I was ordained, alike call on me to bear witness against the errors of the day. And I believe that the saying of our Lord is eminently a truth for the times, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—Rev. J. C. Ryle.

"HE SAVED OTHERS."

WHEN scorn, and hate, and bitter envious pride
Hurl'd all their darts against the Crucified, Found they no fault but this in him so tried ?

"He saved others !"

Those hands, thousands their healing touches knew ;
On withered limbs they fell like heavenly dew ;
The dead have felt them, and have lived anew :

"He saved others !"

The blood is dropping slowly from them now ;
Thou canst not raise them to thy thorn-crowned brow,
Nor on them thy parched lips and forehead bow :

"He saved others !"

That voice from out their graves the dead hath stirred ;
Crushed, outcast hearts grew joyful as they heard ;
For every woe it had a healing word :

"He saved others !"

For all thou hadst deep tones of sympathy—
Hast thou no word for this thine agony ?
Thou pitiedst all ; doth no man pity thee ?

"He saved others !"

So many fettered hearts thy touch hath freed,
Physician ! and thy wounds unstaunched must bleed ;
Hast thou no balm for this thy sorest need ?

"He saved others !"

Lord ! and one sign from thee could rend the sky,
One word from thee, and low those mockers lie ;
Thou mak'st no movement, utterest no cry,
And savest us.

—The Three Wakings.

THE COMMON SALVATION.

WHEREFORE is this called the common salvation ?—
Three reasons may perhaps be assigned for this.

1. It is in that which all the sacred writers, notwithstanding their diversity of ages and gifts, are agreed in teaching. The Old Testament writers understood it less than the New ; but they all died in the faith of it. They "testified of the sufferings of Christ, and of the glory that should follow. To him gave all the prophets witness."

2. It is that which is addressed to sinners in common, without distinction of character or nation. The messages of grace under the Old Testament were principally addressed to a single nation ; but under the gospel they are addressed to all nations, to "every creature." The gospel feast is spread, and all are pressed to partake of it, whatever has been their previous character.

3. It is that in which all believers, notwithstanding their different attainments and advantages, are in substance agreed. There may be great darkness, imperfections, and error, and many prejudices for and against distinctive names ; but let the doctrine of the cross be stated simply, and it must approve itself to a renewed heart. A real Christian cannot object to either of these things which may be considered as belonging to the common salvation—to the necessity of it, the vicarious medium of it, the freeness of it, or the holy efficacy of it. Let us therefore "give all diligence" in attending to "the common salvation."—A. Fuller.

ALL NEED SUPPLIED.

My soul is like a hungry and a thirsty child, and I need his love and consolations for my refreshment ; I am a wandering and lost sheep, and I need him as a good and faithful shepherd ; my soul is like a frightened dove, pursued by a hawk, and I need his wounds for a refuge ; I am a feeble vine, and I need his cross to lay hold of and wind myself about it ; I am a sinner, and I need his righteousness ; I am naked and bare, and need his holiness and innocence for a covering ; I am in trouble and alarm, and I need his solace ; I am ignorant, and need his teaching ; simple and foolish, and I need the guidance of His Holy Spirit. In no situation, and at no time, can I do without him. Do I pray ? he must prompt and intercede for me. Am I arraigned by Satan at the divine tribunal ? he must be my advocate. Am I in affliction ? he must be my helper. Am I persecuted by the world ? he must defend me. When I am forsaken, he must be my support ; when dying, my life ; when mouldering in the grave, my resurrection.

Well, then, I will rather part with all the world, and all that it contains, than with thee, my Saviour ; and, God be thanked, I know that thou, too, art not willing to do without me. Thou art rich, and I am poor ; thou hast righteousness, and I sin ; thou hast oil and wine, and I wounds ; thou hast cordials and refreshments, and I hunger and thirst. Use me then, my Saviour, for whatever purpose, and in whatever way, thou mayest require. Here is my poor heart, an empty vessel ; fill it with thy grace. Here is my sinful and troubled soul ; quicken and refresh it with thy love. Take my heart for thine abode ; my mouth to spread the glory of thy name ; my love, and all my powers, for the advancement of thy honour and the service of thy believing people. And never suffer the steadfastness and confidence of my faith to abate, that so at all times I may be enabled from the heart to say, Jesus needs me, and I him, and so we suit each other."—Old German Author.

CORNELIUS THE CENTURION.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT,
Author of "Illustrations of the Book of Proverbs," &c.

... "Peter, who shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved."—Acts xi. 14.

ASSUMING that our readers are already familiar with the facts of the centurion's history, we invite their attention to some lessons from his life.

I. Cornelius, at the date of Peter's mission, was lost by sin, and not yet saved through faith in Christ. An angel is sent to Peter, and Peter is sent to Caesarea, for the express purpose of offering salvation to this man; if he had been already saved by his alms and prayers, there would not have been so much ado to save him. "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."

When Noah with his family had entered the ark, and the door had been shut behind him by God's own hand, it would have been impertinent intrusion for man or angel to come and tell the trusting patriarch how he might be saved. When Moses and the children of Israel were seated high and dry on the rocks of the Red Sea's eastern shore, singing in chorus the hymn of victory to God their Saviour, it would have been out of place to have disturbed their music by a cry of alarm or an invitation to a place of safety. Go to the lost with such a counsel; these men are saved, and do not need your help! If Cornelius had been already saved no such message would have reached him from heaven; when such a message comes, it shows that he still needed salvation.

This fact, so clear from the whole narrative, is in the circumstances very significant and very important. This was no common publican or sinner. Before the angel promised a minister, or the promised minister came to preach, he was "a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway" (Ch. x. 2). Here is a man who possesses all the qualifications of a saint, if a saint can grow indigenous on this earth, without a seed sent down from heaven. He was devout in spirit, exemplary in the training of his children, beneficent to the poor, and constant in his religious duties. Here is a model man for all who think that we can be justified in our own righteousness. A better specimen of humanity you can nowhere find; yet God's word bluntly treats him as a lost sinner, and forthwith proclaims to him how he may be saved. There is no escape from the force of this case. It effectually shuts out all human merit. In presence of this word every mouth must "be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God." If this man could not stand at the judgment-seat until his sins were blotted out in the blood of the Lamb, how shall we appear with our own sins or our own goodness marked to our account?

The first necessity for the fallen, is to know that they are lost. As long as any one thinks he is rich, and increased with goods, and in need of nothing, he will not buy of Christ gold tried in the fire, that he may be rich; and white raiment, that he may be clothed (Rev. iii.). There is such a thing as being "shut up unto the faith," and a blessed imprisonment it is, like the shutting of Noah within the ark when the flood was coming on; but there must be a shutting out before there can be a shutting in. He who is not shut out from all trust in his own righteousness cannot be shut in to the righteousness of Christ. The difficulty of attaining a thoroughgoing, practical conviction that, if God should mark iniquity we could not stand, is greater, in some respects, where the sins are less gross. The open outrageous vices, although they may not be more sinful, are more manifest than the strong heart rebellion of a carnal mind. Hence the experience, renewed from age to age in the history of the Church, that publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of heaven more readily than smooth and sombre Pharisees. A child or a savage realizes easily and completely that yonder mountain, which lifts its head to heaven, is matter; but cannot comprehend that the air, which encircles the mountain-top, is matter too. An educated person knows that the air is as truly matter as the mountain—that you can no more put your hand where air is without first pushing aside the air, than you can put your hand where a stone is without first pushing aside the stone. It is in some such way that those who are childish in spiritual perception take in more easily the thought that vice is sinful, than that the evil thoughts and godless bent of the carnal mind are sinful; but wherever the education of the renewed has advanced some stages under "the ministration of the Spirit," the more ethereal and less palpable alienation of heart is as readily felt to be sin as the transgressions which must be repressed by human laws. Cornelius is sinful; the sinful are lost, unless and until they are saved through faith in the Redeemer.

II. How might this lost man be saved? By words. Strange! when the loss is so deeply real, and so terribly substantial, that the deliverance should be accomplished by words—by articulated air! We must closely examine this point ; how and in what sense do words save the lost ?

It was natural for Naaman, with his hardy intelligence as a practised soldier and patriotic love for the rivers of Damascus, to toss his head in contempt at the Jordan as the proposed healer of his leprosy ; but he had no positive belief that any healing virtue lay in the waters of Abana and Pharpar,—he merely meant to pour contempt on the proposal to wash out a leprosy by the water of any stream. There is a class of self-confident scholars in the present day who sneer at the proposal to cure sin by words, precisely as Naaman sneered at the proposal to wash out a leprosy by water. They have no confidence in any doctrines external to the man's own mind ; they trust to principles that are inherent in his nature, and spring up within himself. They despise words, and all that can be conveyed by words, as incapable of saving the man.

Beware of gliding into the mist here, and so losing your way—losing your life. Words become life or death, when God employs them as vehicles to convey his commands. "God said, Let there be light, and there was light." Jesus cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus come forth ;" and he that was dead heard and obeyed. Words called worlds into being, and brought the dead from the tomb : beware how you despise words ! But these, you say, were the words of God our Creator and Redeemer. Yea, they were, and thereon depended all their power. But may not He make known his word in the world still, and may not he employ human lips and human ears as the channels through which it shall flow ?

Even in the ordinary experience of life men are saved or lost by words—the words of their fellows. When a blind man avoids a precipice and turns into a path of safety at the warning voice of a benevolent passenger, he has been saved by words. When the various portions of an army, at a critical moment, make a combined movement, by the orders of its chief, conveyed through the lips of bold young men who gallop with them through the battle-field, they are extricated from impending ruin, and conducted to a place of safety by words. Words, false or meaningless, will not save, however reverently they may be received ; and, on the other hand, words that are true and divine will not save those who despise or neglect them ; but "the word of the truth of the gospel," honestly received, saves those who receive it.

A great ocean steamer, at the dead hour of midnight, is rushing through the water with a race horse speed, bearing in its capacious bosom a miscellaneous throng of men, women, and children, some asleep, some at work, some at play. Two words, Breakers ahead, pass quietly, but clearly from the watchman at the bow to the master on the gangway ; then three short syllables, Starboard hard, ring out from the hardy throat of the master, as from a brazen trumpet ; as soon as these sounds fall on the steersman's ear, the helm is thrust suddenly to the side, and the ship bounds clear of the rocks, only leaping a little higher for a moment in the surf that tumultuates round their root. Those words that passed away as breath on the breeze saved five hundred warm human bodies from a cold bed that night on the ocean's bottom.

The world with its teeming freight of humanity is rushing on like that ship through this sea of time. Mankind, like the globe to which they cling, are, as regards their own sensations, still and stationary ; but in the unseen, unfelt reality, sweeping forward like smoke on the wind. All are always in motion. A lost world, if it be let alone, will one day strike, and sink, and die. God, who is rich in mercy, did not leave the world to its fate. He sent his Word to save it.

Truth, like a spirit, is invisible until it put a body on ; and words are the body in which truth incarnates itself, in order that it may be known and felt. They may be spoken by human lips, or exhibited on a printed page, or sent along a wire in throbs of electric light—it matters not what form the words may assume, as it matters not what may be the colour of the ink in which the letters are written ; in every form they are the body in which a spirit dwells. Evil spirits also become incarnate in a body of words. The devil and his agents give words whereby men may be lost. The lie is an evil spirit, and it seeks a body that it may have power to destroy. When the enemy comes in like a flood the Spirit of God lifts up a standard against him, by embodying saving truth in a form of sound words. The whole word of God is the body which the ministering Spirit employs in his quickening and sanctifying work. Take heed how ye hear. The missing of a word may be the losing of a soul.

III. God's hand in Providence is ever at work, bringing the saving word into contact with lost men. Usually the process is conducted behind the scenes in secret, but now and then, as in the history of Moses in the Old Testament, and the history of Cornelius in the New, the curtain is drawn aside, and the whole machinery exposed to view that we may learn the method of the divine government. The centurion is dwelling quietly in his own house at Cæsarea ; he is training his children and servants in the right way, as far as he knew it ; he is finding out every frail widow and every naked child in the neighbourhood, supplying the necessary food and clothing from his own stores as long as they last, and begging from his friends when his own resources fail. Within his own spirit, meantime, he is feeling the need of clearer light, and asking it from God in prayer. God in heaven hears this man's cry, and determines to grant his request ; but a complicated machinery must be set in motion ere the water of life reach the thirsting soul. The method is not in this case a whit more complicated than that which is adopted in the daily course of the divine administration. This case is uncovered, as an illustrative specimen ; all the rest are of the same character, although they are concealed from view.

An angel is sent to Cornelius, but does not bear to him the words of eternal life. That is not the place of angels; they are only the errand-goers of our Father's house: send to Joppa for Peter: the words whereby a sinner shall be saved, must be spoken by the lips of a sinner saved already by the same truth. On the other side, at the same time, Peter is prepared by a vision for shaking off the old ingrained prejudice of the Jew, and made willing at last to go in to one of another nation with an offer of the same mercy that himself had obtained, and on the same terms. When speaker and hearer have been thus separately prepared, they meet, and at the meeting the water of life flows from the charged into the empty vessel. The word of salvation, already through grace dwelling richly in Peter, overflowed at the point of contact, and flowed into the open, prepared heart of Cornelius. By that word the lost man was saved.

In the Garden of Plants at Paris a certain rare tree grew for many years. It was a thriving and mature plant. Year by year it was covered with blossom, and year by year the white blossoms were shed on the ground, leaving no fruit behind. After every promise, it remained barren still. At last, one season, although nothing extraordinary had been observed, after the flower came fruit; it swelled apace, and in due time ripened. The tree for the first time brought to maturity self-propagating fruit. They sought, and found the cause. Another tree of the same species, but bearing flowers the counterpart and complement of this, had then for the first time blossomed in a garden at some distance. The small white dust from the flowers of that other tree, necessary to make the flowers of this tree fruitful, had been borne on the feet of bees or wafted by the wind into their bosom, and forthwith they brought forth fruit. This, in the natural department, is the work of that same all-wise God who prepared Cornelius for receiving Peter's word, and brought Peter with the word to Cornelius. The Roman centurion was a goodly tree, spreading out its leaves and opening its blossom to the sun year by year on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, very hopeful, very promising, but bare and desolate, until words, as if wafted on the wind, came from Joppa by the ministry of an apostle, and fell upon the open, receptive, thirsting soul. Life sprang from that union.

Reader, you have passed ten, twenty, or thirty years of life since your understanding opened. If you have, during that interval, passed under the Holy Spirit's ministry from death into life, it is well: hold the beginning of your confidence steadfast unto the end. But if not, think how much has been done to preserve you in the place of mercy, and to prepare you for receiving the truth: think also what a process of preparation may have been going on for many years to provide a messenger, whom you have not seen as yet, to speak in your ear the word by which you may be saved. Be on the watch; lie open; at a time when you think not the hour and the man may come. The word of salvation may come as accidentally, and yet as definitely determined and designed, as the dust which makes the flower fruitful is brought by the feet of unconscious insects, or carried on the bosom of the winds. Beware lest you miss the word which is sent to quicken you.

Machinery boxed in goes round and accomplishes its work as well as if it were all exposed to view. At one extremity the raw material goes in, and at another the manufactured article comes out. This is all that the visitor sees. For once and to instruct a stranger the master may take the covering off and lay bare the intricate accumulation of cylinders and wheels; but soon he shuts the door again. Under cover all the work goes on as steadily as when no eye saw it. Thus has the Author of salvation, in the case of Cornelius and some others, opened up the processes of his providence, which are usually conducted in secret: but to-day and here he as truly works, and as wonderfully, in preparing hearts for receiving the seed of the word, and bringing vessels charged with the seed to scatter it at the right season in the right place. By the ministry, it may be, of angels unseen, or by the ministry of flaming fire and stormy winds unsuspected, or by the ministry of men whom I have never yet met in the body, or by all these together, the word of salvation is brought to me. All things are now ready; be thou also ready, O my soul!

IV. The words which Peter brought to Cornelius were intended and offered for the salvation, not of himself only, but also of all his house. The prayer of the centurion is not recorded. It is written that he prayed, but his prayer is not written. We have the means, however, of knowing what was in his prayer. As you may thoroughly know a man's countenance by seeing it reflected in a mirror, although at the moment a partition wall stands between him and you; so from the answer which God gives to a suppliant, you may learn what that suppliant asked from God. The message sent to Cornelius expressly in answer to his prayer, informs him how both himself and his house may be saved; therefore, we know, Cornelius had asked salvation both for himself and his family. Wife, children, domestics, and that devout soldier who waited on him continually, bulked largely in the supplications of that earnest striver for the kingdom. He prayed in secret, and therefore we do not, in the first instance, know what he put in his prayer; but God rewarded him openly, and by learning what he received we learn what he had prayed for.

If I am told in general terms of a mother that she has gone to the studio of a photographic artist to obtain a portrait of herself; and if the question afterwards arises, Did she sit alone, or did she group the children round her feet and hold the infant on her knee? I do not know, for I was not there: but show me that glass which the artist has just taken out from a vessel of liquid in a dark room, and is holding up to the light ; what figures are these that are gradually forming on its surface like hoar-frost on the window in a winter day ? In that glass, dimly at first, like a thought springing in the soul, but anon with greater and greater distinctness, like articulated language on the lips, rises the outline of that matron's form ; and see, the forms of the children variously grouped around her, and the infant sleeping sweetly in her lap ! Ah, I know now, although I was not present at the operation, that this mother sat not alone when the sun in the heavens painted her picture in that glass !

Thus by observing the group that cluster round Cornelius in the answer to his prayer, I learn who were crowding round his heart, and rising to his lips, when he pressed his own necessities before the throne of grace.

There is a lesson here (1) to parents and masters. God has given you the young in charge that you may in prayer bring them to him, and in discipline bring them up for him. Nature's affections are provided as bands at once soft and strong to draw them by. Are there ten in your house—yourself and nine besides—all leprous by a birth in sin ? You, conscious of your disease, come to Jesus for healing ; but if you come alone, he will miss the rest. He is still the same Jesus unchanged, and he will certainly complain. His complaint will be, Were there not ten souls in that house stained with sin, and where are the nine ?

A father and mother in humble circumstances received an invitation one day from one who is their superior, but whom they know to be meek and generous—an invitation to come to a feast in his house, and to bring their children too. They take counsel with each other, and arrive at the conclusion that they will accept the invitation for themselves, but not for the children. Because of a certain bashfulness, and a desire not to trespass too much on their benefactor's kindness, they determine to go to his house, but to leave their children behind. When they arrived at their entertainer's mansion, they discovered, too late, that the generous man was disappointed and grieved. He had set his heart on showing kindness to the little ones, and had made preparations for them. He was deprived of the pleasure of showing the little ones a kindness, and they were deprived of the pleasure of receiving it ; and all this because the parents, not believing in their benefactor's large-hearted love, desired not to trouble him. Bring your household with you when you get access to the throne of grace for yourself in prayer.

There is a lesson here (2) to children and servants. The word that comes to the father and mother of a family is the word that saves also the children, if they receive it. The word is for them too ; but they must beware lest they despise or neglect it. To cleave to a believing father will not save an unrenewed child. Children, when you are brought to the brink of life, your parents cannot keep company with you any further. They cannot go over with you to keep you from fearing in the dark valley, or make you safe in the world to come. None but Jesus can go through with you ; but he can and will. Cling with all your soul's strength, not to your godly father, but to your father's God.

TWO WORLDS.

In God's world strength is lovely,
And so is beauty strong,
And light—God's glorious shadow—
To both great gifts belong ;
And they all melt into sweetness,
And fill the earth with song.

Above God's world bends heaven,
With day's kiss pure and bright,
Or folds her still more fondly
In the tender shade of night ;
And she casts back heaven's sweetness,
In fragrant love and light.

* * * *

Man's world is black and blighted,
Steeped through with self and sin ;
And should his feeble purpose
Some feeble good begin,
The work is marred and tainted
By leprosy within.

Man's world is bleak and bitter ;
Wherever he has trod
He spoils the tender beauty
That blossoms on the sod,
And blasts the loving heaven
Of the great, good world of God.

Man's world is pain and terror ;
He found it pure and fair,
And wove in nets of sorrow
The golden summer air.
Black, hideous, cold, and dreary,
Man's curse, not God's, is there.

And yet God's world is speaking :
Man will not hear it call ;
But listens where the echoes
Of his own discords fall,
Then clamours back to heaven
That God has done it all.

O God, man's heart is darkened,
He will not understand !
Show him thy cloud and fire ;
And, with thine own right hand,
Then lead him through his desert,
Back to thy holy land !

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

A MOTHER'S BLESSING.

TRANSLATION FROM THE GERMAN.

THE important day had arrived on which Ernest C—, for the first time, was to leave his father's house. Hitherto the thought of separation had not been painful, for what young spirit does not hail the prospect of change and novelty? But when this morning, the day of his journey, he opened his eyes, the sudden remembrance, To-day I must depart! stood like an armed man before him, and seemed so terrifying, that he could have wished the whole were but a dream. Yet it was no dream, but a sure and bitter truth. Till now, Ernest had been well instructed under the care of a father and tutor, but the time had come when he must go to the college of a large city to pursue his studies, if he desired to make any figure in future life.

It was early in the morning when he awoke, and all within doors silent. He dressed quickly and went out into the garden. All was lovely without, full of freshness and fragrance,—the white lilies glittering, the roses blushing, under the morning dew; the silence so solemn, that he could only tread softly, as he moved towards the birch copse, where, under an overhanging rock, was his usual place of morning prayer.

Just then he heard the voice of his mother calling him. He started, and hurried back to the house, where a servant told him that his mother desired he should go to her in her chamber.

With deep emotion she came towards him as he entered. She was quite dressed, and appeared to have been long up. She drew Ernest along with her into a recess of the window, and said: "My son, you must now leave your father's house, and the thought that I shall no longer be able each day to pray with you lies heavy on my heart. You know that the heart of man is evil from his youth, and that we live in a world of temptations, which we need a strong arm to help us safely through. That arm is the grace of our Saviour. To his grace I commend you, that it may preserve you to everlasting life. You can repel and resist it, or draw it down by earnest prayer. My son, alike in joy and in sorrow, look up by prayer to the Lord! Do not be content with morning and evening devotions, but apply to the Saviour in every duty, in every difficulty, and he will be to you in the place of father, mother, teacher—he will be to you all in all."

Ernest was deeply moved. He gave no promise in words, but gazed on his mother with a look which her heart well understood. "Come, my son," she said, "let us once more together implore for you the mercy and help of our Lord." She knelt down, and Ernest by her side,—the mother prayed with warmth and fervour, then blessed her son and embraced him. He was not ashamed of the tears which he could not restrain, he felt as if standing on holy ground, and never before had he so strongly felt that parents stand in the place of God.

"Dear Ernest," said his mother, as they rose from their knees, "I must give you a remembrance of this sacred hour—it belonged to the early days of your father."

She took two silver buckles out of her writing-desk, and gave them to Ernest. It was the custom then for both men and boys to wear buckles in their shoes. "Take and wear these," she said, "and when you look at them remember your mother's parting words,—In joy and in sorrow look up by prayer to the Lord."

Ernest took the parting gift; he looked at his mother—she was very pale.

"Never in my whole life," he thought, "will I grieve her again."

The last hour quickly passed, he received the last kiss of his parents, embraced his sisters, then the carriage rolled away, and bore him towards his new home.

This was in the house of a professor,—an earnest, upright man, who most conscientiously devoted himself to the care of the youths committed to his charge, of whom there were always a number under his roof.

Ernest's good abilities and previous instruction raised him at once to a higher class than his age would have entitled him to enter. This brought with it many cares. The boy had need of all his own efforts, and especially of his mother's parting counsel. The work set before him was not easy, but yet not beyond his power. From his earliest years he disliked doing anything by halves, whatever he did must be well done. Before each task he prayed to the Lord, who once gave to Daniel and his friends "knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom," and his prayer was heard.

Ernest was soon the best scholar, and at the same time, from his pleasing disposition and manner, the favourite of all around him. Alas! to be a favourite is what few can stand. When he came to feel secure in his position, when every task seemed to become easy, he no longer sought of God help in each undertaking, for victory appeared sure beforehand. He prayed, indeed, regularly in the morning and evening, but not now from a deep feeling of necessity, rather a sense of duty; and the echoes of his mother's parting words fell more and more faintly on memory's ear.

One day, he and two other boys had accomplished a difficult task so well, that they were as a reward to take a walk wherever they pleased, from four to seven o'clock. "To the Castle Rock!" they exclaimed with delight, and hastened along the way leading to the cliffs, following the course of a noisy stream, whose wooded banks were overgrown with wild plants and flowers. It was a beautiful path, under old noble fir-trees, leading to a magnificent prospect from the heights above. There the youths stood on the highest mass of rock, and gazed below, each in the direction of his father's house,—the thoughts of each different and yet the same, "Oh, how beautiful it is at home!"

And their Father in heaven looked down upon them with his blessing, desiring by this earthly home sickness to make them understand the longings of his children for their heavenly home.

And as they looked around on the beautiful landscape, the plains, the rivers, the mountain chains beyond, and each heart wandered to where its own treasure lay, hark! the evening bell sounded from the vale below, and soft and peaceful as were the tones, the boys heard them with terror. They looked at each other for a moment as if confounded, "they had never dreamed of its being so late," and without another word hurried down the mountain, for punctuality as to hours was one of the professor's strictest rules, any infringement of which was severely punished.

Never had they so rapidly descended from the Castle Rock. But now—to the right or the left? They had still a quarter of an hour—no more, and the right way, by the high road, was long and dusty; the left one, through meadows of long grass, decidedly nearer, but a forbidden path. They stood at the crossing and looked at one another—right or left? Their hearts beat quickly; the voice of God spoke loudly and distinctly within, "To the right!" Ernest, who from childhood had been accustomed to the strictest obedience, made a step forward on the road, and said, "To the right!"

"We shall be too late—it must not be!" exclaimed the others. "Once is nothing!"

Ernest reluctantly turned—his conscience remonstrated, but the dread of punishment prevailed. The boys hurriedly ran through the meadow.

"Whoso offendeth in one point is guilty of all,"—so had Ernest's mother often taught him; these words returned to his mind now, and made each step difficult and painful. Gladly would he have retraced his path, but time, time—it was so late! More than once, when the boys imagined that they heard the step of a ground officer, they crouched down in the long grass, and waited in fear and anguish till all was still again. At length they were nearly to the end of the field, and trod more lightly. Seven could not have struck, or they would have heard it; a few steps more, and they would be at home.

Suddenly Ernest stood still, as if fixed to the spot, and looked at his shoes. "What is it, Ernest—what is the matter? Come on!" called the others to him, but he went back instead of forwards.

"One of my buckles is gone," he said, with a look of distress; "come and help me to find it."

The boys turned back and followed their companion into the field; with anguish of heart they retraced the forbidden road. Oh, must they bear their terror a second time? They sought and sought in vain—the hour of seven sounded. Each stroke of the clock was like the blow of a strong hand on their ear.

"We must go home, Ernest—come; early to-morrow we will come here again and search with you."

But Ernest would not turn back; while he had strength to move and eyes to look with, he must search on. It was the silent messenger from his home, that had ever spoken so much to his heart; could he leave this treasure behind? That were a sin against his mother—any punishment rather than this.

"I cannot turn—leave me; I shall look as long as I can see." So saying he went on further, and the others left him with sorrow and reluctance.

Ernest was now alone. A cool dew lay on the high grass; it was already twilight—all was still, nothing heard but the croaking of frogs in the marsh. There are moments in life when the Lord, for our chastisement, allows our hearts altogether to fail; and such was now Ernest's case. An inexpressible anguish fell on the boy's spirit; it seemed as if he were forsaken and alone in the wide world.

He wandered restlessly on, looking under every flower, alas! in vain—nothing, nothing of his buckle! His distress seemed to increase. "Oh, if my beloved mother were here," he thought, "she would help me to look for it." And with the thought of his mother such home sickness came over him; he burst into tears—yes, the brave Ernest, whom hardly any one had known to weep, sunk on the grass and wept bitterly, feeling as if he were the greatest sinner and the most friendless being on the earth.

Then the words seemed as if spoken to his soul, "In joy and in sorrow look up by prayer to the Lord." His mother's parting words of late he had seldom remembered, and yet seldomer obeyed them. But now he knelt down, and looking up to heaven, prayed "out of the depths" for pardon, for an obedient heart, for the restoration of his lost treasure. And after that prayer he felt that his heart was lightened, his mother seemed brought nearer to him, and he felt nearer to his Saviour.

"How my burden has been taken away!" he thought, and as he rose up his eye fell upon something shining. It was no dew-drop, no pebble, no flower—it was his own silver buckle. Then joy and gratitude filled the boy's soul; he seized his jewel, he sunk down again to give thanks; he had not found that alone, but his mother's heart—yes, he had found his Saviour anew, and he went on his way rejoicing. Now the moment had come when the blessing which the mother laid upon him at parting had started into real life.

As he drew near the house he perceived with joy that in the school-room, where lessons began punctually at seven, there was still no light, though the hour had long since struck. He entered softly, and heard that a visitor having come, the class was deferred till half-past seven. Taking his right place among the other scholars, his being too late was taken no notice of.

Should he keep silence? Was it perhaps the kindness of his God and Saviour which had thus providentially concealed his fault and averted the punishment? Was it an answer to prayer that the professor had no suspicions? Should Ernest say nothing?

No, no, no! "It must be told," sounded in his heart, and rising up before the lesson began, he confessed, and without deep blushes, but frankly and firmly, his having been too late, and his walk through the forbidden meadow, the loss and the finding again of his buckle, and ended with the words, "I ask your forgiveness—I have deserved punishment."

His two companions had stood up unobserved by him, and began, as with one voice, "Mr. Professor, the punishment belongs to us, not to Ernest; he wanted to go by the road, but we insisted on the path through the meadow."

The professor looked lovingly on the three who stood awaiting their sentence. "Boys," he said, "you have done wrong, for obedience is the first and last duty of a Christian, but I see how you have been grieved for it. God has forgiven you, my young friends, and so I also forgive."

Then he took each so warmly by the hand, that each one felt as if his own father stood before him, and gave him the token of forgiveness and of blessing. As soon as the class was over, the three boys were seen going to the house of the city magistrate. They paid the allotted fine, for their trespass on the forbidden ground, from their own pocket money.

That day was soon ended; but the blessing lasted through a long life. Ernest joined himself to the band of many thousand faithful servants of the Lord Jesus Christ, whose unspeakable happiness it is in joy and in sorrow to be able to look up to him who has said, "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened to you."

LIFE LESSONS.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON.

"I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake."—1 JOHN II. 12.

We all like letters. How pleasant is the postman's rap or ring, the sight of the envelope, holding its secrets so tightly, the guess as to whom it is from, the news inside. The Indians call them "talking papers." What millions of them are flying about the world day by day in mail carts, express trains, and steamers! Our text is a part of a letter—a very old letter. The pen that wrote it was laid down eighteen hundred years ago. The author of it was none other than "the disciple whom Jesus loved," who had actually leaned his head on the Saviour's bosom as they sat side by side at the supper table. He had many friends, and when he was separated from them, he sent them this letter; and in it he speaks of little children. He has something to say to "little children," and he gives a curious reason for it. "I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake." Is not that a curious reason for including them in his epistle? What can he mean? I have had some thoughts about it hovering round my mind as doves hover round a trap, and I shall try and catch and cage them for your benefit.

First, I see that this message is not addressed to all little children! Why not? Because there are children whose sins we cannot believe are forgiven. They are careless about them. They enjoy them. They cling to them as insects do to the blossoms of poisonous flowers. Now and then they tear themselves away, but quickly they alight again; or you may compare them to a sponge which, when you squeeze it, becomes dry, but directly it touches the water, it drinks it up as greedily as ever.

And it is of no use to tell such children that their sins are forgiven them. You may as well tell a ragged-school boy, "You are rich," or "You are an angel." He would say, "But how is that, when my pockets are empty?" How is that, when I am only "Tom Brown of Squatter Courtyard?" You might say, "You may be rich if you try, you may be an angel if you are good."

So we may say, "All little children may have their sins forgiven them," but we dare not say to all now, "Your sins are forgiven you." The apostle must intend something different from that. The fact is, he is addressing not so much "little children in our families, but little children in God's family, those who have only just been "born again," and are tender, and need care and nourishment—Christ's lambs. But may we not hope that some of you, my dear young readers, are such? If so, then this message is for you. God, your heavenly Father, says to you, "Your sins are forgiven you."

Secondly, I see that all little children have sins to be forgiven. People have fancied that we are born with hearts white as snow, and that they are blackened afterwards by evil example. But the Bible teaches us that we are born with evil hearts,—hearts filled with the seeds of corruption as the ground is with weed seeds. How soon we find it to be so! How easy it is for us to go wrong, how hard to do right! Whence spring infant tempers, infant falsehoods, infant disobediences? We trace this to our fallen nature inherited through our parents from Adam and Eve. They ate the sour grapes, and our teeth are set on edge. If a bowl of dye be crimson, whatever you draw out of it will be red—if a coat be black, each thread you pull from it will be black. So if our hearts are sinful, whatever issues from them will be more or less sinful. And by-and-by, we are conscious that we sin—we are quite aware that this or that is contrary to God's law, and yet we do it; and these are wilful sins. Had we driven a nail into a wall for every such sin, what a sight that wall would be. But God has remembered them. They are in his book. One stone flung at the Queen would put you in prison—one theft from a shop would blast your character—and one sin is enough to ruin us. But we have hundreds to answer for. If we could recollect them and were sorry for them, they would seem a big load on our backs, pressing us down to the dust. We should be as frightened as Cain was with the blood of his brother upon him. And, indeed, you are afraid sometimes; and sometimes you are unhappy, and sometimes you are ashamed. Here you have three proofs that you have sins to be forgiven,—fear, trouble, shame. And think how these would overwhelm you, if you had to appear before God without any prospect of pardon.

Thirdly, I see that all little children's sins may be forgiven. What a sweet assurance this is! As sweet to us as the tidings of a reprieve to the man who is sentenced to be hung, or as the tidings to a mother that her long lost sailor boy is alive and well.

But how can they be forgiven. If they grieve over them? No. If they resolve to do them no more? No. If they fast and afflict themselves? No. If they pray to God? No. By trusting in God's mercy? No. How, then? Simply by taking Jesus for their Saviour! "Your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake," that is, for Christ's sake. We frequently employ another's name. We ask for kindness, for help, for a favour, because a beloved relative has deserved it for us. It is said that as a poor beggar was going in to petition the king for his rebel son, in the passage he met the king's lovely child. He took him up in his arms and carried him in before the king, and then besought him to spare his son for that lovely child's sake, and the king was melted. So with Christ's name, it is mighty for us to plead; it can obtain instant and entire absolution for the vilest. For he is God's delight, and he has himself borne our punishment on the cross—the just for the unjust. He shed his precious blood on purpose that God might be able to say to each penitent soul, "I forgive you freely." We ought to have been on that cross; but he chose to be nailed to it in our stead. He was bruised and slain in our stead. He can bid you and me gaze at that awful scene, and declare to us that a way is opened to us there to God's love. Nay, it was God's own love which provided that sacrifice on purpose for us to trust in, and be at rest. You are guilty, but Jesus has atoned for your guilt; you deserve hell, but Jesus has endured hell and deserved glory for you. The ship in which you started is wrecked, and you are sinking in it, but Jesus approaches, and offers to rescue you. If you embrace him as your own, if you yield yourself to him, if you ask peace with God for "his name's sake," never doubt but that your sins are forgiven—that all which has caused you fear, trouble, or shame, is blotted out as effectually as if you had not done it. The Hindu crawled for fifty miles in the burning sun across a dusty plain, imploring his gods to accept it for his crimes; when the missionary spoke to him of Jesus' finished work, he burst into tears, and clapping his hands, exclaimed, "Then though I have crawled these fifty miles in vain, I have crawled to the true fountain at last. I might have reached it without crawling an inch, but I would crawl another fifty miles once a-month to have heard of this true fountain."

Fourthly, I see that little children may know that their sins are forgiven them.

St. John says to these "little children," "Your sins are forgiven you." How could he say this? He was holy and inspired, but he could not ascend the skies and unclasp God's book, and discover who were recorded there. But he could behold the daily piety of these little children—their humility, their purity, their gentleness, their labours for God and for each other, and confidently conclude that they were converted, and therefore that their sins were forgiven them. In a school you do not want the governess to point out her best and her worst girls. A day's notice of their behaviour would satisfy you that these were destined for honour, and those for disgrace.

And so here we may know whose sins are forgiven them by their conduct: 1. They will mourn over their sins, as David did in the Psalms, as Peter did when the cock crew, as the woman who bathed Christ's feet did. 2. They will hide themselves in Jesus, who alone can obtain cleansing for them and shelter them from God's righteous anger. 3. They will fight against temptation, because they hate to offend God, and because they shrink from defilement. 4. They are striving to be like Jesus. He is their bright pattern, their divine model, and they desire to be conformed to his image; to be miniatures of him, to reflect on others that radiance which he sheds so abundantly on them. A small mirror may flood a room with dazzling light if only it confronts the sun, and a child may dwell so near to Christ that he or she may be the charm and lustre of their home. Those who have these marks may know that their sins are forgiven them, for these are the fruits of the Spirit, the ornaments of the heirs of the kingdom.

But ere we say farewell, let us inquire, "Are your sins forgiven?"

Fetch up what sins your memory can, and try yourself. Have you ever lamented them? Have you ever sighed and wept on account of them? Have they ever forced you to call to Jesus? Have they ever been acknowledged in his presence? Have you ever found relief there? Have you there seen them to be abominable? and vowed that by his grace you would war against them? Are you now resisting and overcoming them in his strength? What are your answers to these questions? If you can say, though it be but a timid "Yes" to them, then you may certainly assume that your sins are forgiven, and that for his name's sake God views you with unclouded affection.

But if these questions are as Latin and Greek to you, then beware. Then you are still in your sins, and if you die in them, you will awake to nothing but destruction. It may be a trifle to you now, whether or not your sins are forgiven; but it is the most important matter in your whole existence, and I beseech you to attend to it while you can. You should realize that until you are forgiven, you are hanging by a thread over a precipice, or fastened by the devil in a dungeon, from which none but Jesus can deliver you. Now, he is knocking at the door, and saying to you, "Shall I do it? Will you resign your case to me? Will you follow me and be mine?" Oh, speedily may we see you led forth by him unfettered, and hear you whispering to yourself with joyful lips, "FORGIVEN! FORGIVEN!"

THE CAPTIVE WOODCHUCK.

A COUPLE of boys were at it, firing snow-balls, and the hardest they could make, up in a tree. What was that for? What was the mark? A poor little grey kitten, who fled there for safety. At last a snow-ball hit its head; it fell to the ground dead, as I thought. What a shout of delight the boys gave! But while they still continued to pelt it, kitty roused up and tried to escape its merciless enemy. It ran, and they gave chase, and soon all were out of sight. What a noble business were these boys in! "Only a little sport," they called it. But what enjoyment is there in treating such animals with cruelty? What happiness is there in killing them? God has certainly made them with the same beautiful and curious workmanship with which he has made you. He cares for them as he cares for you. "His tender mercies are over all his works."

Did you ever hear about the woodchuck which sometimes breakfasted and dined on the vegetables in old farmer Webster's garden? Well, there was one. It was up in New Hampshire. The farmer had two sons, Ezekiel and Daniel, and Ezekiel set a trap for the woodchuck, and caught him. "Now we'll kill the thief," cried Ezekiel. "You've done mischief enough to die, Mr. Woodchuck, and you shall die."

"No, don't," begged his brother, pitying the poor captive; "take him into the woods and let him go."

The boys could not agree, so they carried the case to their father.

"There is the prisoner," said the farmer; "you shall be the counsel, one for and the other against his life, and plead the case before me. I will be judge."

Ezekiel opened it, arguing against the mischievous disposition of the prisoner and the harm he had already done in the garden. He spoke of the time and labour spent in capturing him, and how, if allowed to live and go at large, he would surely take to his evil habits again, and be wary enough not to be caught a second time; therefore he ought to die. If killed, his skin might be of some value; but making the most of that, it would not pay for the damage he had done.

A pretty practical argument, and calculated to weigh on the old farmer's practical mind. But he turned to his other son, and said, "I'll hear now what you have got to say on the other side, Daniel."

Poor Daniel was afraid his brother had the best of the case. But when he turned his large dark eyes on the poor woodchuck, trembling with fear in the grating of its narrow prison, his breast swelled with pity, he took courage, and looking the judge in the face, poured forth his plea in its behalf. God, he said, had made the woodchuck; he made him to live, to enjoy the bright sunshine, the pure air, the free fields and woods. God has not made him or anything in vain. The woodchuck had as much right as any other living thing. He was not a destructive animal, as the fox or wolf was; he simply ate a few common vegetables, of which they had plenty, and could well spare a part. He destroyed nothing except the little food he needed to sustain his humble life; and that little food was as sweet to him, and as necessary to his existence, as was to them the food on their mother's table. God furnished their own food; he gave them all they possessed; and would they not spare a little for the dumb creature who really had as much right to his small share of God's bounty as they themselves had to their portion? Yea, more, the animal had never violated the laws of his nature or the laws of God, as man often did, but strictly followed the simple instincts he had received from the hand of the Creator of all things. Created by God's hand, he had a right from God to life, to food, to liberty; and they had no right to deprive him of either.

He pointed them to the mute but earnest pleadings of the little creature for its life, as sweet and dear to it as theirs to them; and what might be God's judgment on them, if, in selfish cruelty and with cold hearts, they took that life which could never be given back again?

Daniel saw the tears start in his father's eyes, and run down his sunburnt cheeks. This appeal to his mercy was too much for him; forgetting the judge, he sprang from his chair, exclaiming, "Zeke, Zeke, you let that woodchuck go!"

This is said to have been the great Daniel Webster's first case, when he was only ten years old. It is certainly creditable to both his head and heart. And I hope every boy who reads it will think over the drift of his argument; and if he finds within him a disposition to torment, terrify, kill God's humbler creatures, will remember Daniel Webster's first case, recall his words of mercy, and "let the woodchuck go."—Child's Paper.

CHILDREN AND THE REVIVAL.*

EVERYWHERE the Gracious Rain, in its descent, has visited the little ones. All the books and periodicals I have read about the Great Awakening, tell of fruit gathered from among them. There was a little orphan maid, for example, of whom an Irish minister was told that she had been brought under conviction. He visited her. His first question was, "When did this work of grace begin in your soul?"

* From "The Gracious Rain: Where It Fell, and the Good It Did." By Rev. Norman L. Walker. T. Nelson and Sons.

"Several weeks ago," she replied.

"What brought you to think?"

"Just felt I was a great sinner, and needed Jesus."

"Have you got him?"

"Yes."

"How do you know?"

"God says the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin."

"Are you resting on that word of His?"

"O yes, sir."

As additional reasons of her being forgiven, she said she now loved the Bible, which she did not do before; loved prayer, felt it sweeter, &c. She was next asked what she prayed for.

"For the blood of Christ to cleanse my sins away, and the Spirit of Christ to renew and sanctify my nature, and that He would be a father and mother unto me."

During these answers tears fell fast; but at the last allusion to her orphan situation, a convulsive sob shook her little heart, and the shower from her eyes came on heavier. It may be easily supposed there was no one present unmoved. As a last question, she was asked, "Was there any particular text, more than another, her soul was now reposing on since she found peace?"

"Yes."

"What?"

She raised her hand over her eyes—it seemed vain to try to stem the flowing spring-tide—and in broken sobs repeated, as well as choking utterance would let her,—

"I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus or Lord."

Who can doubt that that little one was taught of the Spirit?

"Little Anna is now the happiest child I have," says a father. "Formerly she seldom sat down to a meal without crying because it was not good enough, and now she eats with thankfulness whatever she gets."

"I asked a little girl," writes another person, "whom I had seen sob and pray some weeks before, if she observed any change in herself of late?"

"Yes," she said, "I do."

"What is it?"

"Why," said she, "before Christ was no concern to me, and now he is never out of my thoughts."

Even if such cases as those we have thus given were few in number, it would make the history of the movement which led to them well worth recording. But they are not few in number. Fruit of the same kind has been produced in wonderful abundance. And all the more may we claim for the subject the earnest attention of our readers, that the heavens are not shut up. The Rain is still falling, and anxious souls are still pressing into the kingdom.

"Weary sinners, weeping sinners, broken-hearted, see, they come! Lo! behold the dead arising from the darkness of the tomb. Blind, they grope amidst the shadows; waiting by the way, they cry,

'Give us light, O Lord, to see thee, for we hear thee passing by!'"

"LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION."

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

It was only the Friday before Christmas, and as Ally Campbell rose from the breakfast-table with a very pompous air, and never answered when Aunt Nancy and mother both asked him a question, sister Bertie, standing on tip-toe, knocked vigorously upon his curly head, and cried, "What's the matter up in the garret?"

The fact is that the "garret," as teasing Bertie always called her brother's brain, was quite a reception room, this morning, and had as many pleasant thought guests as it could well hold. Indeed, they rather jostled against each other, and as Allan walked briskly down to his employer's store, they all tried to speak at once, though in the most good-natured manner possible. And this is the way they ran on—

"How very kind in Mr. Maybrook to pay your quarter's salary before Christmas. To be sure two pounds ten shillings isn't so very much, but it will buy a great many things, after all. Now Bertie shall have that crimson scarf she has been wishing for so long, and Aunt Nancy shall find on her table the prettiest reticule in the city, and mother, dear mother shall have the beautiful books she has spoken of so very often, and would not buy, because it took so much to pay the doctor's bill after Bertie was sick so long in the autumn."

"But," said another thought, "what are you going to do about your coat, with your wrists coming down half-a-foot beyond the sleeves, and such dreadful patches on the elbows?"

"You can get a splendid warm coat," cried another thought, "for thirty shillings, and then you'll have money enough left to buy your presents. Mr. Maybrook will pay you to-morrow night. Monday you will buy all you want, and Tuesday, O!"—But there he was at the store, and as he entered with his pleasant, glowing face, Mr. Maybrook kindly put his hand on his shoulder, and said—

"Good morning, my young man, did you slide down on a sunbeam?"

The day passed happily, as busy ones almost always do, and Ally's active feet scarcely knew a moment's rest. They sold so much that day. Beautiful sets of china, vases, and pitchers. Ally guessed from the pleasant faces of the buyers that they were intending to make some presents too, and were thinking of the delightful surprises they should give their friends.

So the day wore on till tea time, and it so happened that Mr. Maybrook and all the clerks were out at once, leaving Allan alone in the store. As he walked up and down, still busily engaged with his pleasant thoughts, he noticed that one of the very expensive vases had been left carelessly on the floor.

He drew near to look at it. How beautiful it was with its delicate flower-wreaths floating and dissolving in the almost transparent china. He heard Mr. Maybrook telling a gentleman the price of it that very day, and it was more than he earned in the whole year. What if it should be broken! It ought to be on the shelf, and Ally, taking it up carefully, almost reverently, began ascending a little ladder to put it in a place of safety. Alas! in some way the ladder was not firm—it tottered, slipped, and Ally, in an involuntary effort to save himself—dropped the precious vase! There was a crash which made his heart stand still. Then looking down in a bewildered way, he saw only a heap of worthless bits of china in place of the exquisite vase. He closed his eyes to shut out the sight. "It cannot, cannot be," he thought passionately to himself. A moment before the beautiful vase stood before him all perfect, and now it could not be possible that such a terrible misfortune had happened to him. He had been dreaming. He would open his eyes and see it there yet, all glowing with its violets and roses, looking as if they were twined around moonlight. But oh! he opened his eyes, and it was too true!

Now succeeded another conflict in his troubled mind. How should he ever dare tell Mr. Maybrook, who, kind as he generally was, had never been known to excuse what he called—carelessness. Indeed, to teach his young clerks good habits, he often made some deduction from their wages, in proportion to the value of the article broken.

Ally knew, with a despairing heart, that this loss would be greatly felt by Mr. Maybrook, and perhaps his whole quarter's salary would be withheld.

"It would be too hard, just at this time," said Ally, unconsciously speaking aloud. "I cannot, cannot give up all the presents I have thought of so long. What a very sad Christmas it would be! Oh! couldn't I say that Snap ran against it, after John left it on the floor?"

Snap heard his name, and coming up, rubbed himself affectionately against Ally. "No, no, Snap, I won't say anything against you, poor dog," cried Ally, almost with a sob. "But John really did leave it on the floor, and he ought to bear half the blame. I suppose it would just break his heart to get in trouble with Mr. Maybrook, for he's weak and sickly yet after that hard fever. No, I won't tell of him, but oh! what shall I do? I believe," he continued, after a few moments of painful thought, "I believe I won't say anything at all about it. Perhaps it will never be missed," and with nervous haste, Ally began to gather the pieces, and throw them in an old box under the counter. It was just accomplished when Mr. Maybrook came in.

"You may go to your tea, Allan," said he, not noticing his flushed, anxious face; and Ally, snatching his cap, rushed from the store.

He had walked but a few steps, when he heard a voice behind him. "Al, Ally Campbell," and turning, he saw Jasper Adams, a boy he greatly disliked. "I say, Al," cried the boy, "we want you to-night after the store is shut up. We're going to have such a time changing people's signs, and carrying off door-mats, to say nothing of leaving a note for that dreadfully good old maid, Miss Gaston, telling her that a poor man has broken his leg, the other end of the city, and they want her to come right down. How her old bones will creak over these slippery side walks. It'll be great fun!"

"No fun at all!" cried Ally, indignantly. "Do you think I'd do such a mean thing? I won't go, and you mustn't, either."

"You'd better preach to me, Allan Campbell," cried Jasper, angrily. "I know something about you, and you're no better than other boys."

"What can he mean?" thought Ally, as he hastened on, his guilty conscience sending the blood rushing to his throbbing head. "I'm sure I try to do right, and I never take pleasure in such shameful things as—"

"Think of the broken vase," cried conscience. "You are meaning to deceive Mr. Maybrook, and if he asks any questions you intend to tell a lie. The vase is just as much lost as if you had stolen it, and taken it home. The least you can do is to confess your misfortune, and make what reparation you can."

"Oh, I cannot tell him," groaned Ally, and although the night was very cold, his breath came so quick and hard that he unbuttoned his overcoat, and threw it back. At last he reached his home, but he had no appetite for tea, and Bertie's clear voice, singing a Christmas hymn, made him very wretched indeed. He hurried to bed, that he might not hear kind Aunt Nancy saying, "He gets too tired, poor child," but he could not sleep, and the next morning could eat no breakfast.

All day long he trembled for fear something would be said about the vase, and conscience kept continually saying, "You're just as bad as a thief—you're a thief!" "To-night I shall get my money," thought Ally, "and next week perhaps I'll tell him." Then conscience not only called him a thief, but a coward too. Oh! what a miserable day it was, and at last the crisis came.

The gentleman who had looked at the vase before, came in to say that he had decided to take it. In a few minutes there were hasty inquiries for the missing article. Ally wished the ground would open and swallow him, but no, in a moment came the dreaded inquiry—

"Do you know anything of it, Allan?"

"No, sir," rose to Ally's lips, but the words seemed to choke him. Then making a mighty effort, he said—

"Mr. Maybrook, may I speak to you a moment in the back office?"

Mr. Maybrook followed him in, and the truth poured forth in one vehement flood.

Poor Ally! His employer was very angry. It was such a great loss. The most beautiful vase in his store!

"You have been very careless," said he, sharply. "That vase was worth more than your whole year's service. You need expect nothing this quarter, sir," and he left the boy with his head drooped upon the table in an agony of grief and disappointment.

The gentleman did not fancy any other vase, and Mr. Maybrook was in great ill humour all the evening.

As Ally sat leaning his heavy head upon his hand, just before it was time to go home, Jasper Adams entered the store.

"Al," said he, "I've come to ask a favour. Lend me half-a-crown."

"I can't," replied Ally, "I haven't a farthing."

"Well, then," said he, lowering his voice, "just take it out of old Hunk's money drawer—he'll never know it."

"What," cried Ally, almost with horror; "do you think I could do such a thing? never! never!"

"Well, you are a hypocrite! I suppose you didn't know I was looking in last night when that vase took such a tumble, and you swept up all the pieces so carefully, and hid 'em away." Ally coloured. "Now, I'll tell you what it is, Mr. Honesty, if you don't give me that money I'll tell Mr. Maybrook."

"You may spare yourself that trouble," said Allan, quietly. "I've told him myself."

A look of surprise and vexation swept over Jasper's face. "I hope he made you smart for it," said he, malignantly. "I bet you don't get one farthing this quarter." Ally's looks of pain showed him he had guessed the truth. "Well, you're a great fool, and the queerest boy I ever knew."

That night, Ally could no longer hide his trouble, and told it unreservedly to mother, Aunt Nancy, and Bertie, from the beginning down to Jasper's last taunt.

"Do you think it was foolish, mother," asked he, anxiously. "You would not say I was queer?"

Bertie threw her arms around his neck.

"Yes, you were queer, you foolish Ally, almost as queer as an angel, but I love you just the same," and she laughed merrily.

"You won't have the crimson scarf now, Bertie," said Ally, regretfully.

"Never mind that," cried Aunt Nancy, exchanging tearful smiles with mother. "With honest hearts, and clear consciences, we shall have a very 'merry Christmas' after all."—Congregationalist.

THE LITTLE SNOW SHOVEL.

THE front yard had a thick coat of snow on, when Lewis put on his greatcoat and comforter, shouldered the new big snow shovel, and went out to clear a path to the street. The storm was over, and as the bright morning sun shone on the snow-capped twigs, rails, and posts, they sparkled with a thousand brilliants.

"See him, mother," cried Mary, who stood at the window watching Lewis, and enjoying his somersets in the snow before beginning the more serious business of shovelling. Mary thought it was delightful; she thought everything Lewis did delightful. Lewis in her eye was a hero of heroes, and she never was happier than when she could do some service for him. Lewis knew it, and though he didn't mean to do any serious wrong, he sometimes used his power rather harshly, like too many boys with their sisters.

The sun, the snow, and Lewis proved almost too tempting for the little girl. She wanted to go out too.

"Is it not rather biting for a little girl who is not very well?" asked her mother.

"I won't play in the snow, mother," said Mary; "let me have Lewis' little shovel, and go out and help him."

"Perhaps he doesn't want you," said her mother, quite willing to throw a hindrance in the way.

Mary did not believe that, so she said, "Please do, mother."

Mary had been sick, but she was better, and her mother thought, maybe if her little girl was well wrapped up, the clear winter air might be good for her; shovelling, too, would help to keep her warm and glowing. So the mother put on her little red hood, cloak, mittens, and tippet, and put into her hand the small wooden shovel which Lewis had outgrown, and out Mary skipped as happy as a snow-bird.

Lewis was well along with his path; he prided himself on his paths. Down she bounded to him, with the little shovel in both hands.

"I come to help you, Lewis," she cried in her loving tones, at the same instant scooping up the light snow. It scattered, and flew back on the clean path.

"Get out!" cried Lewis hastily. "I don't want girls bothering me. They are more plague than profit."

"Shan't I help you, Lewis?" asked Mary timidly.

"No," answered the boy, with a boy's unthinking roughness. "You are a real bother. You are always in my way. Stand back, won't you? What are you out here for? and what business have you with my shovel? Always getting my things."

Mary stood back. Lewis took no notice of her, but kept shovelling vigorously on, as if he were working on a wager. The disappointment was almost too much for the little girl. She slowly backed into the house, and threw herself into her mother's arms.

"Lewis doesn't want me," she sobbed, and the tears ran fast and thick down her little cheeks. Mother tried to comfort the little girl grievously hurt.

After a while Lewis came stamping in. Seeing where his sister was, and the tear in her eye half blurring the look of affectionate reproach which she cast on him, "Why, what's the matter with Mary?" he asked.

"I am afraid you hurt her feelings," said mother.

"Our Mary is getting to be a real cry-baby," he said, marching off, but with a small twinge in his conscience. Oh, if Lewis had only known it was to be his last chance of being kind to his dear little sister and making her happy! That night the scarlet fever set in, and after ten days Lewis saw her no more.

A miserable boy was he. "If I had only been kind to Mary. If I'd only said, 'So you shall help me, Mary,' and showed her how to shovel," he repeated to himself again, and again, and again. "If I only had; if I only had" This is remorse, conscience biting back again.

The sight of the little shovel quite upset him. Once he took the axe to chop it up, and get it out of his sight; but he could not do it. Mary held it last in her dear little hands; and after a long, long while, when the bitterness of his sorrow was past, he loved the little shovel for her sake. Lewis is a man now, and he would part with everything he owns rather than that; and many a tear he still sheds over it.

A LESSON IN OBEDIENCE.

"Jack! Jack! here sir! hie on!" cried Charlie, flinging his stick far into the pond. Jack didn't want to go: it wasn't pleasant swimming in among the great lily leaves, that would flap against his nose and eyes and get in the way of his feet: so he looked at the stick and then at his master, and sat down, wagging his tail, as much as to say, "You're a very nice little boy; but there was no need of your throwing the stick in the water, and I don't think I'll oblige you by going after it."

But Charlie was determined. He found another switch, and by scolding and whipping, forced Jack into the water and made him fetch the stick. He dropped it on the bank, however, instead of bringing it to his master; so he had to go over the performance again and again, until he had learned that when Charlie told him to go for the stick, he was to obey at once. Charlie was satisfied at length, and, with Jack at his heels, went home to tell his mother about the afternoon's work. He seemed quite proud of it. "It was pretty hard work, mother," he said, "Jack wouldn't mind at all until I made him; but now he knows that he has to do it, and there will be no more trouble with him, you'll see."

"What right have you to expect him to mind you?" asked his mother, quietly.

"Right, mother? Why, he is my dog! Uncle John gave him to me, and I do everything for him. Didn't I make his kennel myself, and put nice hay in it? Don't I feed him three times every day? And I'm always kind to him. I call him 'nice old Jack,' and pat him, and let him lay his head on my knee. Indeed, I think I've the best right in the world to have him mind me!"

His mother was cutting out a jacket. She did not look up when Charlie had finished, but going on steadily with her work, she said, slowly, "I have a little boy. He is my own. He was given to me by my heavenly Father. I do everything for him. I make his clothes and prepare the food he eats. I teach him his lessons and nurse him tenderly when he is sick. Many a night have I sat up to watch by his side when fever was burning him, and daily I pray to God for every blessing upon him; I love him; I call him my dear little son: he sits on my lap and goes to sleep with his head on my arm. I think I have the 'best right in the world' to expect this little boy to obey me; and yet sometimes he does not, unless I make him as I would have to make a dog."

"O mother!" cried Charlie, tears starting to his eyes, "I knew it was wrong to disobey you; but I never thought before how mean it was. Indeed I do love you and I'll try—I really will try—to mind you as well as Jack minds me."

"Dear Charlie," said his mother, "there is a great difference between you and Jack. You have a soul. You know what is right because you have been taught from the word of God; and you know, too, that the devil and your wicked heart will always be persuading you to do wrong. That is a trouble which Jack cannot have, but neither has he the comfort you have; for you can pray to our dear Saviour for help, and he will teach you to turn away from the wicked whispers of Satan and to love and obey him alone. When you learn to do this, you will not find it difficult to be obedient to your mother; for it will just be the same as obeying God, who has said, 'Honour thy father and thy mother;' and where we truly love it is easy to obey."—S. THE CUP OF COLD WATER.

Mrs. BURTON sat sewing one evening; it was quite late, but still she sat, as mothers often will, making and mending little garments, long after the restless limbs which wear and tear them are relaxed in sweet repose.

Knowing that all the household but herself had gone to rest, she was a little startled to hear, at that late hour, a slight noise in the kitchen, as of some one fumbling around in the dark. Taking a light, she went out, and was surprised to find there her little boy, about six years old. "Why, Arty, my son!" she exclaimed, "what are you doing down here in the dark?"

"I want some water for Johnnie, mother—he wants a drink," said Arty. Johnnie was his little brother, who slept with Arty in a room next to their mother's.

"Well, my dear, you should not have come down in the cold, all undressed; why did you not call and ask for it?" said the mother, but she did not wait for an answer, for Arty was shivering, and his teeth chattering with the cold. Hastily filling Johnnie's cup with water, she threw a shawl around Arty, and took him up stairs. Poor little Johnnie did indeed want a drink. His mother found him sitting up in bed, evidently quite feverish. He stretched out his hands eagerly for his cup, and so did Arty too.

"Please let me give it to him, mother," he said; and she allowed him to do so, wondering at his earnestness. Having held the cup for his brother to drink, he clambered into the bed beside him, and Johnnie threw his arm around his neck, which made Arty look up at his mother with a happy smile.

Mrs. Burton prepared some cooling medicine for Johnie, and came often to look at him through the night. He was very restless for a while, but towards morning he seemed better, and slept quietly.

Johnie did not go to school, as usual, with his brothers and sister the next day. He amused himself quietly with his blocks for a time, when the rest were gone; and at last, when tired of play, he curled himself up upon the sofa, and fell asleep. As his mother sat beside him, she recalled to mind Arty's earnestness about the drink of water, and resolved to ask him what it meant. She had not long to wait, ere she heard the sound of merry voices approaching, and Arthur and his sister Mattie burst into the room in great glee, having been racing to see which should get in first.

Their brother Frank followed, complaining in no very gentle tones, because they had left the gate and doors for him to shut.

"Arty," said his mother presently, when they had become quiet, and were gathered around the fire, "why did you so much wish to get the water for Johnie yourself, last night!"

"Because, mother," said he, "I thought of such a sweet text that I heard last Sunday!"

"What was it, dear? can you remember the words?"

Arty thought a moment, and said, "It was about giving 'a cup of cold water to the little ones.' I don't remember it all, but I thought Jesus would be pleased.

Here Frank looked up from his book and laughed. "O Arty!" he said, "did you think it meant a real cup of water?"

Arty blushed at this; but his mother looked reprovingly at Frank, and asked, "What does it mean, my son?"

It was now Frank's turn to blush; but, as his mother waited for him to answer, he at length said, "I supposed it meant being kind in any way."

"You are right," said Mrs. Burton, "it does, but do you not think, Frank, it would be well for us all to remember and act upon our Saviour's words, so far as we understand them? This was what Arty was trying to do, I think. But now, my little boy, I will read you again the verse which you tried to remember; here it is:—'Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward'" (Matt. x. 42.)

"It is a sweet verse, isn't it, mother?" said Mattie, who had come also to hear.

"Yes, dear, it is a precious verse! But, Arty, we need not wait until some one actually needs 'a cup of cold water,' in order to gain the promised blessing. Jesus said, 'Whosoever shall give a cup of cold water only;' he meant to teach us that he would see and remember every act of kindness done for his sake—that is, for the love of him—even so small a thing as giving a drink to one in need. "Every day and hour, my dear children, brings us an opportunity of speaking a kind word, or doing some loving deed, for Christ's sake; and this is the 'cup of cold water' which our dear Lord says shall in no wise lose its reward."

"Mother," said Mattie, softly, "if we keep from teasing each other, for Jesus' sake, is that what the verse means too?"

"Yes, Mattie," said her mother, smiling a little; "for it would show the working of the spirit of love which the words are meant to teach. I read lately an anecdote of King Herod Agrippa, which reminded me of these words of Christ; would you like to hear it, children?"

The children assented of course, being always ready for a story.

"Was that the King Herod who killed the infants at Bethlehem, mother?" asked Mattie.

"No, dear, Herod Agrippa was a grandson of that Herod. He was the one that killed the Apostle James, and put Peter in prison. Before he was made king, he spent some time in Rome; and while there a careless speech which he made one day, while excited with wine, was reported to the emperor Tiberius. It made the emperor angry, and he commanded that Agrippa should be seized and bound. It was on some public occasion that Tiberius gave this command, and Agrippa was bound even as he was, in his purple garments. The weather was very hot, and as he was led about in chains, awaiting the emperor's orders, he suffered greatly from thirst. Seeing a young slave passing with a vessel of water, he implored him to let him drink. The slave willingly did so, although he, no doubt, ran a great risk in befriending one who was under the displeasure of Tiberius. Having drunk freely, Agrippa exclaimed, 'O thou boy, if I once get clear of these bonds, I will procure thee thy freedom!' And he remembered his promise. Not long after, Tiberius died, and Caius, the friend of Agrippa, became emperor. One of the first acts of his reign was to liberate Agrippa, exchange his iron chain for a gold one of equal weight, and send him loaded with honours to his newly appointed kingdom in Judæa. And now Agrippa obtained the freedom of the slave Thaumastus, who had ministered to him so kindly, and made him the steward of his own estates. And when dying, he commended him to his son and daughter; so that the man held that honourable post in the family of Herod until his death.

"Dear children, if this king, by no means remarkable for virtue, so remembered and rewarded 'a cup of cold water,' what may we not expect from our Lord's promise to those who thus minister unto him?"

"Minister unto him, mother!" said Mattie, "how can we?"

"How can we, Frank—do you know?" said his mother, for Frank's book was closed now, and he, too, was listening with interest.

Frank did know, and repeated, "The king shall say, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." And coming to his mother, he kissed her forehead, whispering, "I will try to remember, dear mother, to give the cup of cold water."

And so do you, my dear little readers, and you will find that every loving, kindly action, which you do for Jesus' sake, will bring you, even in the present time, the promised reward, for it will fill your own heart with sweet peace.

"Little deeds of kindness,
Little words of love,
Make our earth an Eden,
Like the heaven above."

JESUS PIERCED.*

"Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs: but one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water. And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true; and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe. For these things were done, that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. And again another scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced."—JOHN xix. 32-37.

For, dear children, have to do with all this. The soldier was really your representative. The Bible says he was not the only one who was guilty of piercing Jesus; for we read, "They shall look on him whom they have pierced" (John xix. 37); and again, in Rev. i. 7, when Christ comes in the clouds of heaven, and all kindreds of the nations wail because of him, it is said, "Every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him." So you and I may be guilty of the soldier's sin.

Every one of us, indeed, by nature is just like him, for do we not read, in Rom. viii. 6, "The carnal mind is enmity against God?" We may come to church, we may like to read the word, we may call him "our Saviour," and yet lift the spear against Christ.

Do you say, "I never did that?" We reply, the spear may have lain by you quietly; your heart may have been full of dislike to him, though you said nothing.

Sometimes you wished there were no Sabbath, or no God to appoint a Sabbath-day. Sometimes you have wished there were no judgment-day, no hell, and even no heaven, but only earth! And this was just wishing that there were no God; for he arranges all. Sometimes you have wished that a person whom you did not like were dead—well, just so you have done with God, and Christ, and the Holy Ghost! All this is just trying to reach God with the spear. You have tried to forget God and his law, because the thinking on him made you uneasy. This shows the spear!

When your teacher spoke to you about Jesus, and pressed you to believe in him, did you never wish that your teacher would be done with that subject? Did you ever feel quite weary and fretful at being obliged to hear so much about Jesus? This was showing enmity to Christ; it was lifting the spear against him. Did you never break the Sabbath! He is Lord of the Sabbath, and in doing that you aimed at him with your spear. When you refused to obey your parents, when you spoke a lie, you were resisting Jesus—you were thrusting at him with the spear like the soldier, for Jesus commanded you to obey and speak the truth. What if you die with the spear in your hand, and the Judge brings it out at the judgment-seat! If that soldier died in his sin, will it not be awful for him to meet Christ? No worse, however, than for you, if you die without Christ.

You know how the Jews agreed in putting Christ to death, and asked the Roman governor to nail him to the cross. They cried, "His blood be on us and on our children!" They meant by this to say, "If there is any crime in shedding his blood, let us be punished for it, and let our children, too, be punished for it." Now, God took them at their word. He punished them, destroying Jerusalem and the temple, and letting the people die by sword, and famine, and pestilence. And their children, too; for to this day their descendants wander over the earth without a home.

Perhaps you have heard of that little boy who, when he read of the man who struck Christ with the palm of his hand, said, "Did not that hand wither?" He thought very naturally that surely the hand that so wickedly struck Christ must of course be at once blasted.

In the days of the French Revolution, there was an atheist in Paris, who said that he would prove whether there were a God or not. Taking out his watch, he said that he would give God five minutes to prove his existence; for if there were a God, surely he would strike him dead. When nothing happened to him, the foolish man said that there was no God! Poor, blinded man! If God had struck him down, it would not have been God-like; for our God is long-suffering, and though he treasures up judgment for another day, he waits to be gracious now.

Even so here; it was not fire that flashed out from the Saviour's side to consume the man; it was blood and water.

Blood flowed along the spear. Suddenly the soldier sees its point glitter less brightly, and then, lo! his hand is bathed in blood that has flowed along the spear! Now, every Jew knew, as written in Levit. xvii. 11, that "it is the blood which maketh atonement for the soul." Hence this event had a remarkable signification. Jesus is offering his blood to take away the soldier's guilt! For see! the blood that makes atonement for the soul is flowing towards this wicked man! But again, chasing the blood there was a stream of water, and the soldier, with amazement, perceives this too! Now, water is an emblem of the Holy Spirit, who makes us new creatures, and takes away your enmity; for Isaiah xlv. 3 speaks of "pouring water" as the same thing with "pouring the Spirit."

Thus you see the free love of God! What a gracious return he made to the malignant cruelty of his foes!

* From a striking Tract by the Rev. A. A. Bonar, published as one of a very valuable series by Mr. Walker, Montrose.

Instead of revenging their sins upon them, he hastens to forgive! Dear children, think on all this. Do you ever strike back, because some one struck you? Or revile, because some one reviled you? Or resolve to take revenge for a wrong done you? Or try to make one feel sore who has slighted you? This is not God's way. When the soldier pierced Christ, God's return was to give blood and water. Learn to return good for evil, like God.

You may have read an instructive incident regarding a soldier, who had frequently been imprisoned and punished on account of his conduct. One day, on account of a recent misdemeanour, he was about to be called up for further punishment, when it was asked, "Have we tried every means of curing him?" One present remarked, "We have never tried the effect of a pardon." The suggestion was taken, and the sergeant-major was sent to tell the soldier that he was pardoned. The man was amazed! He had been doggedly preparing himself for severe punishment; but, melted by this kindness, he from that day set himself to guard his conduct, and no one had further trouble with him. This is somewhat like God's way with sinners. He gives pardon that there may follow thereon a change of character, as in the case of this soldier. Was there not here first pardon, then reformation? So, when you have got the blood you will also get the water.

WANDERERS AND PILGRIMS.

A LARGE tract of country lay spread before me; upland and lowland, hill and plain. The whole land seemed stirring with perpetual movement, all in one direction:—from the bright hills at its commencement, to the dark mountains at the end. Earth and sky seemed moving, as when an enormous flight of migratory birds is passing by, but earth and sky were really stationary. This movement was one constant tide of human life, ceaselessly streaming across the land.

It began on a range of wooded hills, with their sunny southern slopes, forests and flowery banks, and grassy and golden fields. Down these slopes joyous bands ran fast. As I looked closer, I saw that the movement was not incessant in the case of each individual; only the ceaseless passing of the great tide of life made it seem so. Merry groups paused on the hill-sides, and made fairy gardens, and twined leafy tents where they would sit a little while and sing and dance. But only a little while! No hand seemed driving them on; it appeared only an inward irresistible instinct. Yet soon the bright groups were scattered, and moved down again over the hills, often never joining more.

"Why do you hasten away from these sunny slopes?" I said. "There seems nothing so pleasant in all the land besides."

"Perhaps not," the travellers replied, with a slight sigh; but it ended in a snatch of song as they danced gaily on. "Perhaps not, but we are a race of Wanderers! We cannot stay; and perhaps better things await us in the plain."

"Whither are you going?" I asked.

"We know not," was the answer; "only onward, onward!"

In the plain were buildings of more solid construction, houses and cities. And here I observed many of the travellers would have gladly lingered, but it could not be. Homesteads, and corn-fields, and vineyards, all had to be left; and still the tide of life streamed on and on.

"Why?" I asked.

"It is the doom of our race," they said, sorrowfully; "we are a people of Wanderers."

"Whither?" I inquired.

"We do not know," was the reply; "only onwards and onwards to the dark mountains!"

Slower and slower grew the footsteps of the Wanderers, more and more regretful the glances they cast behind. Slower, yet with fewer pauses. The strange, restless impulse drove them steadily on, until, wearied and tottering, they began the ascent of the dark mountains.

"What is on the other side?" I asked.

"The sea," they said, "the great sea."

"How will you cross it, and what is beyond?"

"We know not," they said, with bitter tears. "But we are a doomed race of Wanderers—onwards, onwards; we may not stay!"

Then first I perceived that, among these multitudes of aimless Wanderers, there was one band who kept close together, and moved with a freedom and a purpose, as if they journeyed on not from a blind, irresistible impulse, but from choice. Their looks were seldom turned regretfully behind them, or only on the dark mountains. They looked to something higher.

I asked them—"Why are you thus hasting on?"

"We are pilgrims," they replied; "we would not linger here."

"Whither are you going?" I inquired.

"Home!" they answered, joyfully—"to a holy city which is our home."

"But how do you know the way?" I asked, for no barriers seemed to limit their path, so that any of the wanderers might join it at any point.

"We know it by two marks," they answered—"by the footsteps of One who trod it once, and left indelible footprints wherever he stepped. And we know it also by the goal to which it tends!"

Then looking up, I saw resting on the mountains where this path ended, a bridge like a rainbow, and beyond it, in the sky, a range of towers and walls, pearl and opal, ruby and golden, such as in a summer evening is sometimes faintly pictured on the clouds when the setting sun shines through them. And the little band chanted as they went, "The doom of our race is reversed for us. We are not wanderers; we are pilgrims. We would not linger here; this is not our rest. Onwards, upwards, to the city!—to the home!"—The Black Ship, with other Allegories and Parables.

THE TREASURY PULPIT.

THE WOMAN OF CANAAN.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"O woman, great is thy faith."—MATT. XV. 28.

THE Scriptures were not written either to amuse our fancy or to gratify our curiosity. Hence they leave us unsatisfied in regard to many things and some persons, we should like to be better informed about. Actors appear on the stage, play some striking part, —and when our interest is awakened, the curtain suddenly drops, and we see them no more. It is true that we may meet again in the other country. Seated in the ever-blooming bowers of Paradise, with the sea of glass gleaming at our feet, we shall relate our own adventures, and hear theirs; how they fought, what trials they passed through, what dangers they escaped, all the providences they met with on their way to the promised land.

Who, for example, has not wished to know what became of the young ruler that sought our Lord, saying, "Good master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" A more amiable, lovely, attractive character we hardly find in history; and our interest in him suggests the question,—Did he perish? Perhaps he did,—a warning to us how near we may reach the kingdom of heaven, and yet come short of it; how too great confidence may wreck souls, as well as ships, even at the harbour's mouth. But Jesus loved him; and we would fain hope that as he followed his retreating steps with loving eye, our Lord said within himself, "How shall I give thee up Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together." However, it is perhaps well that the last chapters of his history are wanting; these blank leaves are full of meaning; they seem written over with such warnings as these,—"It is hard for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven"—"Set your affections on things above, and not on things on the earth, for the things that are seen are temporal, but the things which are unseen are eternal"—"Love not the world, neither the things of the world, for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him"—"Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted; but the rich in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away"—"For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof faileth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth; so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways."

It had been a much more unsatisfactory and serious matter had the story of Joseph ended as abruptly. Take it as it stands, there is no case more illustrative of a reigning providence. Here we see all the links of the golden chain that binds our world to the skies; we can trace, like the impressions of a man's feet on the wet sea sand, all the steps of a presiding providence along the whole course of his history from his father's tents to Pharaoh's palace; we see God's hand weaving the dreams of his young ambition, and guiding him onwards through many vicissitudes of fortune to the day when they were all fulfilled. But what if our last sight of Joseph, his father's darling, man's faithful servant, and certainly virtue's noblest hero, had been the prison scene? A story which is the delight of children, would have been a riddle to the wisest men; and instead of forming one of the brightest examples, it had remained as one of the darkest mysteries of providence, to perplex our minds and try our faith. Sold into slavery by envious brothers, wronged by the master whom he refused to wrong, a sufferer for conscience' sake, thrown into prison because he was a well-doer, how might sneering sceptics have looked into his history, as that vengeful woman may have done into his dungeon, to say, "Joseph, where is now thy God?" We thank God that this history is written out. Like the saints, he was humbled that he might be exalted. The steps of a dungeon became a ladder to the throne. And in raising him to Pharaoh's right hand, and in making him the instrument of saving from famine the family of which the Messiah was to spring, the providence of God shines out from the clouds of his eventful life, clear as the sun from the shadow of a passing eclipse. Verily, he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

We thank God also, and even more, that the story of this woman of Canaan is written out. As it stands, it is one of the most encouraging passages in the Bible; had it stopped in the middle, it had been one of the most discouraging. There are no clouds and darkness around Jehovah's throne more impenetrable, or so dreadful, as in that case had hung over the character of Christ and the cross of Calvary. Had the curtain fallen for ever over that scene where our Lord seems to lift his foot to spurn this poor suppliant away, and to her cry, "Lord, help me," replies, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and give it to dogs," this story, instead of a stepping-stone, had been a great stumbling-block on our way to heaven. It is often difficult enough to persuade some desponding Christians that there can be mercy for them : with this history unfinished, it had been all but impossible. Faith would have staggered under the burden ; it had hung like lead on the wings of prayer ; and the doubting, timid, trembling spirit would have shrunk back, saying, Why should I go to Christ ? I am unworthy ; he shall say to me as to that woman, " It is not meet to give the children's bread and cast it to dogs." Unless this story had been told out to its happy close, where had been our answer, our unanswerable answer, to the despondency which says Christ may not, and to the despair which avers Christ will not save me—this, namely, Show us one instance in all his blessed history of his having refused the prayer of a penitent, or spurned the unworthiest away ? I look on this passage as one of the brightest beams of gospel light—a stream as sweet as any that flows from the Rock of Ages. Under God, how much do we owe to the pen that wrote it out ? Ever blessed be the memory of the blessed woman whose faith, rising to the occasion, riding on the top of the billow, replied, " Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the master's table."

I. Her earnestness is an example, as her success is an encouragement to us.

The time has arrived for Esther to apply the match, and explode the mine beneath Haman. Crying, " O king, if it please the king, let my life be given to my petition, and my people to my request ; for we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish,"—she reveals her own and her people's danger. Struck with astonishment, and fired with indignation, the king rises to demand, " Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so ?" " Pointing to her guest who turns pale at the charge, she says, " The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman !" The king bursts from the chamber ; and Haman, seeing by the glance of his angry eye that " evil is determined against him," seizes the moment to start to his feet and beg his life of Esther. Knowing that the sands of his life are run, unless he can mollify this stern beauty, he casts the ordinary manners and customs of a court to the winds ; throwing himself down on the couch beside her, he implores her to save him. At this moment her husband returns. Goaded to madness at the sight, the cry bursts like thunder from his lips, " Will he force the queen also before me in the house ?" It is enough. In an instant the mutes are at Haman's side ; the muffle is on his face ; the bow-string is round his neck—it tightens—he sinks, and lies, as sinners seeking mercy never lay at the feet of Jesus, a corpse at Esther's feet. Bad as Haman was, the king wronged him ; he put a false construction on that last scene. The imminence of the danger, the instinctive love of life, these made this wretched man earnest ; and earnestness made him importunate—bold, even to familiarity, as a man would, who was falling over some horrid crag, he clutched at the queen.

Earnestness is importunate ; and I am afraid that we sometimes form too harsh a judgment of the poor mendicant who refuses to be denied—repelling him as impudent, who is only importunate. It was no want of respect, nor insolent contempt of our position, or of our rights that made a man, on being refused charity, take rude possession of the open door, and say, as he planted his foot on the threshold, " Sir, I will not go away—I stay, or starve here till I am relieved." Roused by so bold a movement, we looked up to read the sad truth and reason in his face. A languid eye, and the deep hollow in his sallow cheek told at once that his was not the impudence of practised beggary, but the importunity of starvation. He was a stranger in a strange land ; he had left his children moaning for bread—and their mother had none to give them.

And when the spirit pleads at the throne of God, when guilt, flying from justice, is knocking loud and long at the door of mercy, one not in earnest himself may wonder at the language which earnestness ventures to employ. Why should they wonder ? Her loyal subjects, standing at respectful distance, address their sovereign in respectful terms, using courtly language to a courtly ear. But let a royal cortege pass the procession that conducts a felon to the scaffold, as a drowning man who sees a plank float by grasps at life, the felon, bursting from his guards, springs to her side, clings to her robe, to cry, Oh, pardon, save me ! and when to the order, Unhand me, let me go—he answers, No ; I will not let thee go,—who so hard-hearted as to beat this wretch away—so blind as not to see that this is not insolence, but earnestness ?

Even so Jacob, in dread of Esau's vengeance, clung to God ; and wrought up to a state of intensest feeling, as if Jehovah had been in his hands, not he in Jehovah's, hung on him, saying, " I will not let thee go unless thou bless me." How bold this language ! Even so the Psalmist addressed God in yet bolder language. No man more humble than David—no man ever laid a venerable head lower in the dust before the majesty of God—he said, " I am a worm, and no man ;" yet see how this worm rises ! In language which an angel never ventured on, because an angel never felt as he, hear how he speaks to God, " Why withdrawest thou thy hand ? pluck it out of thy bosom. Awake, why sleepest thou. O Lord ? arise for our help ? make haste, O God, to help me." And even so this woman was importunate because she was earnest. If there be any boldness, any forwardness, any obtruding of her case on Jesus, it is to be imputed to this, that—a mother with a mother's heart—she had a daughter grievously vexed with a devil. Be followers of me, she says. Be earnest ! The more the bow is bent, the higher the arrow flies.

II. Observe the trials to which Christ put her earnestness and faith. There were three.

1. His silence.

Men miss many opportunities of being saved—one at least every Sabbath. The castaways who have floated on wreck or raft to some lonely rock or desert island miss none. They never desecrate a sail out at sea, but they kindle their signal fire and raise a flag of distress; rushing down to the beach they shout, and cry themselves hoarse against the hoarse murmurs of the deep. They let slip no opportunity of being taken off; and like them—not like many a sinner—so soon as this woman saw salvation in Christ approaching the coast of Tyre and Sidon, she hastened to meet him. Not saying like us, It will do to-morrow—next Sabbath—some other day—in another year,—she seized the opportunity that might never return, and came to Christ crying, “Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil.” In stories of the sea I have read how the castaways, seeing a ship in the offing, made signals of distress; and in what agonies of suspense they watched her as she went about on this tack and then on that; hope rising as she approached the coast, and sinking as she left it; and how when at length, not seeing or not heeding their signals, she sailed away from their lonely rock, they would throw themselves down on the shore to weep out their anguish. So passed the Saviour by this woman. I know not if he ever turned his head to look on her. If he did, as if he had shut up his compassions from her, as if he had no human sympathies, as if he was not bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh, as if he had a heart of stone, as if a woman’s prayer was not as powerful to stop this Sun of righteousness in his course as was Joshua’s to stop the sun of heaven—Jesus went on his way; he answered her not a word.

Now for the example she sets us; mark that; nor be content to admire, but follow her. To rise from her knees disappointed, chagrined, mortified; to murmur, to complain, He might at least have pitied me,—a broken-hearted mother and her poor child were not unworthy of a kind word, and, if refusal it was to be, of one tenderly expressed—I am mistaken in him—he is not the man or God I took him for;—this, but for her faith and patience, is what she would have done. But she was too bent on having her prayer answered; she had too much at stake; she believed too well of Christ to do so, to be silenced by his silence. Teaching us what to believe concerning Christ, and how to persevere in prayer, knocking till the door is opened, if I may say so, making our hand on the gate of heaven heard loud above its songs, she perseveres. She rises, but it is to run after him, “faint, yet pursuing,” to resume her cry, “O Lord, thou Son of David, have mercy on me; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil.”

2. His apparent refusal.

No more than a drowning man who clings to a swimmer will this woman be shaken off. She hangs on his steps, the most importunate of beggars. Would to God we were as much so!

She becomes an annoyance to his disciples, pursuing them with incessant cries of “Son of David, have mercy on me; son of David, have mercy on me: my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil!” There is no talking or walking with any comfort for this woman; and for the same reason, I fancy, which often leads people to give charity, the disciples espoused her cause—to get rid of her. Send her away, they said, relieve us of her presence; grant her what she asks, and be done with her, for she crieth after us. Quick of hearing, as this falls on her ear, her hopes begin to rise. Paul rejoiced that others preached Christ, even from contention; and so she rejoices when the disciples become her advocates, though from no friendly motives. Apparently moved by their solicitations, Jesus turns to look on her, and is about to speak. Her heart is ready to leap with joy. Alas! she is but lifted up, as is his antagonist by some strong wrestler, to suffer the heavier fall. Christ had answered her not a word—now he speaks; but like the thunder-peal that bursts on the silence that precedes the breaking of the storm, his voice is worse than his silence—his words falling on her hopes like lightning on a tree that, holding up its arms to heaven for dews and rain, gets fire and thunderbolts to blast them. Casting a glance on her, he said, “I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel;” and so saying, passed on. She lies stunned by the sudden blow—struck to the ground.

Shall she venture once more, or, now abandoning hope, yield up her heart to despair, and her poor child to be for ever possessed of this devil? It is difficult, under any circumstances, to quench hope in a mother’s heart—it burns there long after it is extinguished in every other bosom; and where the welfare of a child is concerned, it clings, like ivy, to the very ruins of health or character. And nobly did this woman vindicate a mother’s love, and put honour on the love of Jesus. Clinging with one hand to her daughter, see how she stretches the other out to Christ, as much as saying, I know, I am as sure that you have not the heart to refuse, as that you have the power to help me! What an example to us to continue in prayer, where, as in our own salvation or that of others, the object we have set our hearts on is certainly agreeable to the will of God,—to pray without ceasing, praying “with faith, nothing wavering.”

3. His apparent reproach of her.

“Is this Naomi?” cried the people of Bethlehem, when she who had gone forth with wealth, and husband, and two gallant sons, came back attended by none but a young Moabite, wayworn and weary, bent and grey, sad and sorrowful, attired in the garb of poverty and widowhood. Can it be? Is this Naomi? And we had not been greatly astonished if this poor woman, when these harsh words, “It is not meet to take the children’s bread and give it to the dogs," fell on her ear, had, like one that has received an electric shock, sprung from the ground where she knelt, with clasped hands and streaming eyes, to cry, Is this—can this be Jesus Christ? Was that not to be doubted?—then, Have my ears deceived me? And was not that a strange blow from the hand that was to bleed on Calvary for the chief of sinners—that was to bind up the broken-hearted—that was not to break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax? It was time for her to pray, Lord, help me!—time, poor woman, for God to help thee. And he did it, fulfilling to her, as he will to us—to all who seek him in the hour of mortal extremity, his promise, "As thy day is, so shall thy strength be." "If I," said one, "saw Christ on the other bank, and between him and me a river of fire, I would plunge in to reach him." "And I would fling myself on Christ," said another, "though he stood with a drawn sword in his hand, to receive me on its naked point." Such was this woman's faith, and fondness, and confidence—hers a perfect illustration of these brave words, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." As the eagle flies highest in the storm, rising on the tempest that beats down birds of feeble wing, and sends them to roost in covert of bush and rock, so did this woman. With holy skill, she seizes on our Lord's figure, and turning it to her own advantage, instantly replies, "Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the master's table."

Our Lord's purpose is now gained. It was a gracious one all along. He sought to draw her out, and bring forth that latent faith, the language of which was music to his ear—gratifying the longings of his loving heart, and glorifying the power and grace of God. That purpose gained, he drops the mantle, and revealing himself to her, as he shall to all who will not let him go until he bless them, he crowns her faith with the gracious answer, "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

Happy woman! many say; I wish my faith were great! Would not I give all the world to feel that I had a firm hold of Christ, and that my feet were standing on the Rock of Ages. What with coldness, cares, doubts, deadness, fears, my faith, alas! is not great. Great? There is nothing great belonging to me but my sins. They are great; like mountains great, "my trespass is grown up unto the heavens." Well, who thus bemoans himself, like Ezra or Ephraim, is not singular. God only knows in any assembly of worshippers who is, who has been the chief of sinners. The "Lord, is it I?" will not be left to the lips of harlots and publicans; since the best-knowing their own hearts, know much more ill of themselves than they can possibly do of others, they will be the readiest to say, Lord, it is I; and to regard themselves, not others, as the greatest wonder of saving grace.

When knees are feeble, and hands hang down, and a sense of guilt lies heavy on the heart, let God's people remember, that if their faith is not great while their sins are, there is another thing great besides. The term that describes our sins, still better describes our Saviour. He is greater to save than those are to condemn. What though, as Ezra says, our iniquities are increased over our heads, and our trespasses grown up unto the heavens, in Jesus "mercy is great above the heavens." Finding it to be illimitable, infinite, rising above the highest guilt, fancy comes back on weary wing, and, using the language of an enrapt apostle, sings of the height, and the depth, and the breadth, and the length of the love of God that passeth knowledge. And since the believer's hope does not rest in the greatness of his faith, but in the greatness of Him who is its glorious object, how should we bless God that, though faith is deficient, the Saviour is all-sufficient and that,—Christ made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption—we are complete in him. If we have not this woman's faith, we have her Lord; if we have not the same voice to pray, we have the same ear to pray to. Peter's safety on his return to the boat lay not in the hold he had of Christ, but in the hold Christ had of him. Pale terror on his face, this poor half-drowned man was safer with Christ's arms around him than when, with stout heart and bold step, he planted his foot on the swelling billows, the admiration and envy of his fellows.

O ye of little faith, let me tell you that a little faith is a great power—equal to the task of casting a mountain of sins into the sea of mercy. A slight faith is a saving faith. An immortal seed, it is its nature not to die, but live; not to decline, but to grow. All hail, then, to the smoke that curls up, presage of the living flame; to the feeblest dawn that glimmers in the east, forerunner of the coming day. "He which hath begun a good work in you, will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."

THE STORY OF MY MISSION.*

PART FIRST.

MISSION TO THE COLONISTS.

It was a bold enterprise, characteristic of the spirit of British colonization, when four thousand English families planted themselves on the frontier line of the South-Eastern African colony. In advance of their settlement, yet in close contact, lay the Kaffir tribes,—fierce, war-loving, predatory in their habits, and ready, on any sudden impulse or imagined provocation, to sweep down on the encroaching white man, for plunder or revenge. Far in their rear lay the settlements of the earlier Dutch and English colonists, with Cape Town at the distance of seven hundred miles. No available force was at hand for the defence of the young colonists against the incursions of their restless savage aboriginal neighbours. They were expected to defend what they had freely received, and to make and maintain for themselves a home in the wilderness, with the plough in the one hand and the sword in the other.

* The Story of my Mission in South-Eastern Africa, comprising some account of the European Colonists, with extended Notices of the Kaffir and other Native Tribes. By William Shaw, late Wesleyan General Superintendent in that country. London: Hamilton, Adams, and Co. 1860.

It was in the Parliament of 1819 that the proposal was made for the establishment of a new settlement at the extreme boundary of the Eastern Province of Cape Colony. Fifty thousand pounds was voted in aid of the project. Government hoped, by colonizing, to be relieved from the necessity of defending the frontiers. A commercial crisis at the period inclined many to listen to the promises of a new though distant home. Glowing pictures of the healthiness of the climate and fertility of the soil, concurring with the grant of Government and the pressure of home difficulties, quickly swelled the rank of applicants. Ninety thousand submitted their claims to the Colonial Office to be preferred for the new settlement. There might have been fewer had it been understood they were to be placed as a break-water to stop future Kaffir inundations. Four thousand were ultimately selected and conveyed in twenty-six ships to Algoa Bay. With a rare, but admirable wisdom, and to the credit and honour of the British Government in conducting this enterprise, ample provision was made for the establishment and perpetuation of Christian instruction and ordinances among the settlers. Each hundred families that combined to form one settlement were allowed to choose a minister of whatever denomination they might prefer, his support being guaranteed from the Colonial Treasury.

Amongst the ministers accompanying this emigrant band was the able and intelligent author of "The Story of My Mission." From the first bruit of the undertaking he had penetrated the important relation in which the new colony would stand to the contiguous heathenism of Africa. Whilst taking his place at the head of a hundred Wesleyan families, and prepared to discharge his duty as their minister, he had his eye on an ulterior object to which he hoped to make them tributary, and to which he was ready to yield the energies of his own life. Africa, in the degradation of her children, and in their spiritual bondage, lay before him. Might not the proposed colony become a line of light along her border of heathenism? Might not he and his hundred families of emigrants strike into the dark interior with some rays of gospel truth, or mark off the tracts where others should follow in the evangelization of that land? He hoped that the new settlement would result in the extension of the influence of Christianity among the numerous heathen tribes of South-Eastern Africa. In this hope he took his place in the Aurora with the band of emigrants destined for the new settlement.

It is an hour of intense and conflicting feeling when the emigrant band, crowding the deck, await the signal that is to bear them from their native land and friends.

The boldest is not then ashamed of the tear that is hastily brushed from the eye, or that rolls down the cheek. It is an involuntary tribute to the past and its memories, to the future and its hopes, to the home that is being left, and to the home that lies shadowed in uncertainties on a distant shore. As the Aurora began to float down the river, our author turned his own and the thoughts of his associates from the past and the future to the ever present One. He raised the hymn of Watts, which was quickly sung with a full chorus of voices,—

"The God that rules on high,
That all the earth surveys,
That rides upon the stormy sky,
And calms the roaring seas;
This awful God is ours,
Our Father and our love," &c.

* After a prosperous voyage of three months, the Aurora cast anchor in Algoa Bay. It was night when the place of anchorage was reached. When the morning sun broke all eyes were strained to catch the features of the land of their future residence. In such circumstances the actual has rarely realized the pictures of a fond imagination. Reality sinks before our indulged dreams; and the Eden of hope, as it vanishes, casts on the wilderness a deeper gloom. A visible sadness gathered over the countenances of the emigrants as they gazed on the shore. Far as the eye could reach, from the south-west to the north-east, the sea margin presented a continuous range of low white sand hills; and where a breach in their continuity afforded a peep into the interior, nothing met the view but sterile ground and stunted bushes. A range of abrupt elevated land rising immediately above the landing-place, presented its craggy summits and story slopes, relieved with but few spots of verdure. The scene was dull and disappointing. Not a few began to contrast the waste wilderness before them with the beautiful shores of Old England, and to express the apprehension that they had allowed themselves to be lured by false representations to a country which promised small returns to its cultivators. The necessity for action brought relief to these gloomy forebodings. Preparations had to be made for the journey of a hundred miles to the district of Albany, where the settlements were to be established. Fresh scenes, and the interest of new modes of travelling, restored the healthy tone of the company. The African waggons, covered with white sailcloth tilts, each drawn by twelve or fourteen oxen, urged on by stalwart Dutch colonists, in rather primitive attire, or by tawny Hottentots, with hardly any attire at all—the noise occasioned by the incessant cracking of their huge whips, and the unintelligible jargon of the leaders and drivers, when urging the oxen, or while talking with each other,—all combined to produce in the unsophisticated English mind wonder and amusement. There was little time for musing or brooding regrets on a journey which required the Dutch drivers, in ignorance of English, at every short interval to repeat their expressive sign for a break-neck road, by putting their hands on each side of their face, with an accompanying rapid twist of their heads; and which, as often as the sign was given, required the travellers to alight, who would not imperil their bones in the abrupt descent of their vehicles. It is a true scene from emigrant life, with a touch of deep nature in it, the passage in which Mr. Shaw describes the moment of arrival at their destined home: "Our Dutch waggon driver intimating that we had at length reached our proper location, we took our boxes out of the wagon and placed them on the ground; he bade us Goeden dag, or farewell, cracked his long whip, and drove away, leaving us to our reflections. My wife sat down on one box and I on another. The beautiful blue sky was above and the green grass beneath our feet. We looked at each other for a few moments, indulged in some reflections, and, perhaps, exchanged a few sentences; but it was no time for sentiment; forthwith we were engaged in pitching our tent, and when that was accomplished, we removed into it our trunk, bedding, &c. The other settlers, who had arrived with us, were similarly occupied, and in a comparatively short time the somewhat extensive valley of that part of the Assagaay Bosch River, which was to be the site of our future village, presented a lively and picturesque appearance."

Amongst the colonists engaged in the conversion of this African wilderness into an English home were all variety of professions. There were artificers and mechanics, shopkeepers and agricultural labourers, half-pay officers, persons of education and gentlemanly tastes and feelings, more than one doctor and a poet. Half had emigrated from London and other large towns and cities in Britain; the remainder came from various agricultural villages and districts. Reviewing these proportions, Mr. Shaw records it as the result of his extensive observation, that emigrants thus assorted "are better than a body selected wholly from agricultural districts." The skill of each ultimately became available to all, and the colony advanced the more rapidly from the diversity of the professional acquirements of its members. Those who failed to find employment akin to their tastes or special capabilities wandered into the older settlements, and gave fresh impulse by their numbers and industry to the entire range of the South-Eastern Colony. Notwithstanding the many privations and the great exposure of the settlers for the first three or four years, so high was their bill of health from their open air life, that the medical men who accompanied them from England "left the district in disgust, as affording no opportunity for the practice of their valuable profession." Climatal influences had no corresponding effect on the moral health of the emigrants to relieve Mr. Shaw from the responsibilities of his pastorate. His first and latest care was the religious instruction of the settlers committed to his oversight. A box in the early days of the settlement served for his pulpit, an American flour barrel as the resting-place for the Bible and other books used in public worship. Before and around him the people were seated on stools and benches which they had provided for themselves, and by which they gave to the assembly the air of a regular formed Church, though no walls enclosed them or roof canopied their head. In such a spot and climate the open air Church was not without its dangers. While proceeding, on one occasion, with his address, Mr. Shaw was suddenly interrupted by the alarm, "O sir, there is a puff adder between your feet!" Looking down he saw the creature, one of the most deadly of the South African snakes, lying on the ground close to him. Quietly stepping aside, the dangerous reptile was attacked and destroyed, and the meeting resumed, but not concluded without praise being offered to Him who had preserved his servant from the "serpent's bite." Gradually, as the more commodious house arose for the settler, the church arose for the worshipper. It was felt they could not dwell in ceiled houses whilst the house of God lay waste. In the course of a few years a number of substantial chapels were erected by the Methodist settlers in various parts of the settlement, which became rallying points for the scattered populations, green spots in the waste wilderness.

Not satisfied with providing for the wants of the Albany settlement, it became apparent to Mr. Shaw from an early period that unless his mission could be made to bear on the military in Graham's Town and the outposts, and on the general European population, the extensive South-Eastern district would be left without the means of religious instruction and consolation. At Graham's Town, then but a military post, he received a cordial welcome from two "devout soldiers," both sergeant-majors in the Cape cavalry. Their houses became for a season his home and his church. One of them, who was building at the time a house for himself outside the walls of the garrison, provided a large room for worship. At first the commissioned officers hesitated to enter the Methodist meeting, and to sit in a sergeant-major's quarter with a mixed concourse of private soldiers and civilians; but curiosity, or a higher motive gathered them to listen to the preacher outside the doors and windows of the apartment. Ultimately more than one chapel with numerous members arose at Graham's Town. Others were founded at Salem and at the rising towns and central spots of the Albany district. It was the deep conviction of Mr. Shaw that wherever there was a British colony in juxtaposition with heathen tribes, it was the wisdom of the Church to provide for the spiritual wants of the colonists. The colonists being gained, a fulcrum was secured for the gospel lever in its after operations among the heathen. More than one joyful season of revival rewarded his labours amongst his European brethren. The most remarkable of these was in Graham's Town in 1837, when hundreds of Europeans during these "days of grace," and many amongst the natives, young persons, men, and women, gave the highest evidence of true conversion. The wilderness became a fruitful field, and the fruitful field a garden.

During these seasons there was occasionally witnessed those remarkable physical effects that have so often attended periods of sudden and deep religious awakening. In some there was witnessed the fear, the grief, the irrepressible wailings of penitence; in others the joyous ecstasies of spirits loosened from their bonds. Like a wise spiritual father, Mr. Shaw neither sought to produce nor to repress these outward manifestations. He was satisfied the work was from God, and was willing to allow Him to work in his own way, by the still small voice of the Spirit, or by the thunder, and lightning, and earthquake of his power. With sound practical sense he remarks in relation to these revivals, "That there are many persons on these occasions who, when awakening to an alarming sense of their spiritual condition, from never having been accustomed to train or moderate the expression of their feelings, are apt to be wholly carried away with these emotions of grief or gladness, without giving themselves for the time any concern about the ordinary decorum and proprieties of public worship. I am no apologist for disorder; but I do think a judicious pastor, if properly aided by the most spiritual of the people, will generally be enabled to guide the new converts aright in this matter. The sound judgment of experienced pastors and laymen may always be relied on; but although all mere extravagance and indecorum, whether of word or manner, arising from excited feelings, should be cautiously and promptly restrained, yet cold, unsympathizing professors of religion, no matter by what name called, are not usually safe guides as to what is best to be done at such times to promote alike the honour of Christ and the good of souls." Sunday-school teachers, class leaders, local preachers, not a few missionaries—possessing a remarkable adaptation for the South African missionary field—were the fruit of these revivals. The bounds of the gospel were enlarged, and the European population leavened with a more earnest Christianity. More ample contributions for the support of the gospel followed these seasons. Day and Sunday schools were erected and maintained at the cost of hundreds of pounds annually, and chapels built at an outlay of tens of thousands. In these Sunday schools the religious character of the Sunday school was kept strictly in view. None in South Africa were permitted to desecrate the Lord's day by teaching writing and other branches of secular knowledge. To supply the great lack of the means of ordinary education, meetings were held sometimes early in the morning, or more frequently on two or three evenings during the week; and not a few persons who afterwards held high positions among the farming and commercial classes owed their entire education to these morning and evening hours.

If the extensive journeys and continued labours of Mr. Shaw in the commencement and consolidation of these missions amongst his countrymen were such as few could have sustained, the rewards that crowned his forty years' prayers and toil were such as few have reaped. In the bare statistical statement of their results we read his great reward. He who gave him the heart and power to do, largely blessed him in his deeds. To his sowing in tears there was given a reaping-time of joy. When in 1820 he landed at Salem he was the solitary missionary from his Church; when he returned to Britain in 1860 the number had increased to 36, aided in their work by 99 subordinate agents. In 1820 the Sunday-school teachers in the South-Eastern African province were 20; in 1860 they had increased to 688. In 1820 the number of communicants were 63—all British born; in 1860 the number had increased to 4825, with 800 on trial for admission, many of these belonging to various African tribes and nations. In 1820 there were 3 Sunday schools; in 1860 there were 80, and 58 day schools, and in the place of 100 scholars there were 7648. In 1820 there was 1 chapel; in 1860 the one had grown to 74 substantial, commodious buildings. In 1820 the contributions of the people towards the support of the ministry and missions was £10; in 1860 the amount had risen to an annual average of £3500. The author of "My Mission" had not spent his forty years' African life in vain. Had he closed their retrospect with the words of Jacob, we should have felt the truth of their application, "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands."

It awakens more than displeasure, it provokes the keenest indignation of the readers of "My Mission," to learn that in spite of the apostolic labours and success of its author, his ministry should have been denied by the re-baptism of the children of his converts by an Anglican dignitary, and the hint given to him by the same authority, that "it was an unseemly thing that altar should be set up against altar." The hint was not difficult to understand. The dignitary sought the field for himself, forgetting that he was but an emigrant of yesterday, while Mr. Shaw had been a pastor to the European flock when there was none to feed them. One of the younger clergy, less reserved, interpreted the hint of his superior by plainly saying that while the dignitary acknowledged that the Wesleyans had no doubt done a great deal of good, and that their labours in the absence of the regular clergy had been very praiseworthy, he thought they ought now, when the Church in South Africa had obtained proper form and completeness by the appointment of bishops, to leave the field to the care of the clergy, and proceed on their useful course as pioneers among the native tribes beyond the boundaries. To this courteous notice to quit, that another Church might serve itself heir to his labours, Mr. Shaw, with great quietness of spirit, tells us, "I did not trouble myself to find an answer." Nor did he need. The vindication of his ministry and his position was his work,—a work in which we rejoice to learn it is the resolution of the Church to which he belongs to continue, notwithstanding the hints of the Anglican dignitary, or the outspoken commentaries of "very young clergymen" upon them. "We are certainly not contemplating," says Mr. Shaw, in closing his account of this incident, "the abandonment of a field of labour on which we have expended so many prayers, tears, and toils, besides many thousand pounds contributed from time to time by our friends, now that the desert is becoming a fruitful and productive field. With us it is, indeed, in a case of this kind, 'a very small thing to be judged of man's judgment;' but I speak as unto wise men. Judge ye what I say."

It remains that we briefly narrate the labours of the author of "My Mission" among the Kaffirs.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

SOLOMON'S GARDENS, HEBRON, AND BETHLEHEM.

ON Tuesday, June 17th, we set off for the hill-country of Judea, Hebron, and Bethlehem. It was to be a three days' excursion, and much for us depended on the way in which it was carried out, as the success of this expedition was to decide whether we should afterwards attempt the longer tour through Northern Palestine. We started in excellent spirits, although not with the best horses in the world. The master of our hotel was our dragoman. The air was light and fresh with the pure morning breeze, and all promised well.

We walked to the Jaffa Gate by Miss Cooper's industrial school, where we saw her Jewesses seated on low divans round the rooms, happily occupied in sewing, weaving, and making twine.*

At the Jaffa Gate we met our horses, muleteers, and baggage, with the English Consul and Mrs. Finn, who had very kindly undertaken to introduce us to Solomon's Gardens at Urtass—a place in which they took especial interest, on account of the model farm lately commenced there with the object of affording employment to Jewish converts.

We were entering David's country. The incidents of his life, with its strong contrasts of lowliness and grandeur, joy and sorrow, were entwined with the name of almost every town and village, hill and valley, cave and desert we saw. We were leaving Jerusalem, where the words and deeds of three years, and more especially the words and deeds of three days, of incarnate Godhead made all other associations sink into insignificance, except as connected with them, for a portion of the Holy Land rich in Old Testament memories, but linked to the New Testament only by the sacred name of Bethlehem, and the journey of the virgin mother to that hill-country of Judea which we were now traversing.

Was Hebron, the Levitical city, the City of Refuge, the home of Zacharias and Elisabeth? Then the footsteps of Mary must have passed across these very hills. Alone, in the guardianship of God and his angels, with the hope of the world in her heart, and in hers alone of all human beings, she crossed these hills, lonely, no doubt, then in many places, though not with the dead solitude of to-day, to meet the one other woman whom God gave her to share the wondrous secret of her joy.

Una and her lion, Milton's picture of the majesty of purity in Comus, and all other images of feminine purity, tenderness, and courage, seem rough and poor beside that maiden of Galilee fearlessly pursuing her quiet, unnoticed way,—

"Tracing huge forests and unharboured heaths, Infamous hills, and sandy, perilous wilds,"— to the mother of the Baptist. Let us not desecrate it by any mediæval allegorizing. No lilies sprang in her path, no millennial lambs and lions did her homage, no glory shone around her. But God was with her,—

"A thousand liveried angels lacqued her,
Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt;

and all along the solitary way her lowly and happy soul magnified the Lord, and her spirit rejoiced in God her Saviour. Well, indeed, may we in these latter generations call her "blessed," for from the heavens where she rests the word comes back to us from the lips of her Saviour and ours—comes back individually to each one of us who love him, sealed with a richer beatitude than even hers as his mortal mother—sealed with a "yea," and multiplied with a "rather:" "Yea, rather, blessed are those who hear the word of God, and keep it." And looking round about on the disciples, with that comprehensive, yet most individualizing glance which St. Mark records, he said, "Behold my mother and my brethren."

That morning ride across the breezy hills was very inspiring. We crossed more than once one of Solomon's aqueducts, a covered channel which conveyed the waters from the neighbouring hills into Jerusalem. In many places the stones which roof the channel are broken in, and the shepherds water their flocks at the stream which still flows there.

We passed one of the many places in this country sacred alike to Jew and Mohammedan, and fraught with a tender interest to the Christian,—Rachel's tomb. It is now a massive, solitary mosque, jealously guarded from intrusion; but below it is a cave—probably the original cave-tomb of Rachel—into the interior of which you may peep through a small opening, although you may by no means enter. Except for its desolation and melancholy solitude, there is little in it to harmonize with one of the tenderest histories of human love and sorrow in the Old Testament. How close home to the heart that narrative comes amidst all the old-world histories of violence, and feuds, and petty warfare between tribes which were the germs of nations! Amidst so much that is foreign to our life and thoughts, this history is fresh and heart-touching as if it had happened in the immediate circle of our friends. It is as if amidst one of the old, deserted, giant cities, with their massive walls and Cyclopean temples, and traces of war and savage worship, we suddenly came on a home strewn with the traces of recent everyday occupations, household vessels, children's toys, pillows retaining the impress of the head that lay there yesterday, and wet with the tears of mourners. It is the one sanctuary of uncalculating and self-sacrificing affection, unsullied by the low and covetous aims which debased so much of Jacob's life. For her sake the seven years of service seemed nothing to him for the love he had to her. It was an intense personal affection, independent of all cost and all consequences. Dearer to him alone than all on earth beside, her children seem to have been dear to him more for her sake than even for their own. "He alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him," was the plea for Benjamin with Joseph. Then what could exceed the pathos of Rachel's own history, the southern fervour of her character, the death caused by the very fulfilment of her passionate desire? And afterwards the dying mother's name of sorrow changed by the father into the name of tenderness, the son of her anguish into the son of his right hand; the tender minuteness with which, long years afterwards, Jacob digresses from the blessing of Joseph's children to the mother's death: "And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan, in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath;" the kind of fond, motherly pride which made the father clothe the motherless boy in the coat of many colours;—all these tender touches which linger around every memory of the beloved wife, do they not show that God melted Jacob's heart through human love as well as by divine revelation? The angel who was more than angelic surely wrestled with Jacob at other places besides Peniel, giving divine strength to so many since Jacob, by that very touch which seemed to take all strength away. Surely that death and that tomb by the wayside brought the bereaved into the presence of God as well as Bethel and Peniel; and He whose love includes in its depths all that is highest and tenderest in the love of father, mother, or husband, taught Jacob much through that love and sorrow.

It seemed a cold and lifeless monument to such a history, that shapeless, solitary building. A mound of earth, or a tree, which spring would have renewed every year, and made the cradle of flowers or the home of birds, would have seemed more in harmony with that simple narrative of love, and life, and death.

We reached Urtass before midday—the valley of Solomon's Gardens. As to the economical value of this farm as a missionary experiment I can offer no opinion, but its value to us was very great as a restoration of the Bible pictures of the Holy Land in its days of glory and beauty. Such as this valley is, the whole land in its peopled and cultivated portions must have been—a land not only flowing with milk and honey from the upland pastures and the breezy, thyme-scented hills, but "a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates—a land of oil-olive"—"a land of fountains and depths which spring out of valleys and hills"—a "land of hills and valleys which drinketh water of the rain of heaven."

The farm-house (Meshullam's) was situated in a quiet nook, low in the valley. We had our cold luncheon on stone seats in the shade of a tree outside the house, which was not unlike an Italian farm-house. Our friends guided us up the hill-sides, which were very steep, but irregularly terraced. Every level bit was covered with vines. The bright, fresh, green of the luxuriant vine-leaves was very refreshing to the eye after the brown, burnt up hills around Jerusalem. These vines need no artificial watering. The rains of the rainy season, and afterwards the heavy night dews of the dry season, keep them juicy and vigorous. As we climbed the hills we continually came on the roots and stumps of old oaks, terebinths, &c., sprouting healthily with fresh leaves. These, with fig-trees and vines, grow to the summit of the hills. The improvident peasantry think nothing, we were told, of destroying trees to make charcoal, and thus the country is steadily laid waste. But the old, gnarled roots were there to tell their tale of noble trunks and canopies of leafy branches, once filling the valley with the music of leaves and birds, blending with the voice of a stream which still flowed below; the stately forest-trees, and fruit-trees large as forest-trees, no doubt festooned with clusters of golden and purple grapes.

The productions of the level base of the little valley were more prosaic, except for their suggestions of home comfort, which give their own peculiar charms to kitchen-gardens, and for the beautiful little stream which eddied and prattled along its stony channel. At the head of the valley is an ancient rock-hewn tank, filled with fresh water from a stream which flows into it through the arched entrance of a cool, subterranean chamber. The fountain-head is at some little distance, and the water is conveyed into the valley through an ancient excavated aqueduct. From this tank the stream falls in a cascade to the lower level of the valley, by the side of which it flows with the inimitable music of abundant water. The channel is rocky, and overshadowed in many places with steep, wild crags. At the head of the dell, near the tank, some fine old fig-trees cast their broad, thick folds of green shade, which is met at its edge by the delicate shadows of pomegranates, then glowing with scarlet blossom. This was quite a bower of shade. Below is a garden of herbs, fruit, and vegetables, planted in little spaces, each isolated by its tiny water-course. These channels are filled every eight days by the gardener's removing with his foot the little earthen dyke which closes them. It is replaced and the channel cleared in the same way. By this care two or three crops are obtained in the year. Probably without this "Egyptian" method (vide Deut. xi. 10) abundant ordinary crops might be procured. These vegetables, herbs, and fruits help to supply the Jerusalem market, as probably, in old times, they supplied Solomon's royal table.

After luncheon and our midday rest we rode to Solomon's magnificent tanks or pools. There are three of these excavated, in the solid rock, and in some places supported or approached by walls or steps of massive ancient masonry. They were full on that June afternoon of living water flowing through them. A ruined castle stood near. But the tanks, which must have been excavated two thousand years at least before a stone of the castle was raised, were not ruined. Throughout the Holy Land no relics of glorious old times are so perfect and so satisfactory as these tanks. Temples, and fortresses, and palaces, are scattered or defaced, but these retain the fresh mark of the workman's tools, and remain a witness,—not to the pomp of superstition, or royalty, or war,—but to the useful labours of an industrious and prosperous people, and a blessing to the peasants of to-day as to those of three thousand years ago.

Thence we proceeded to Hebron, the city of David's early reign, a rough and hilly ride. It was growing dark before we reached it, and our tired horses stumbled frequently over the rocks and roots on the hill-sides. Before night, however, our tents were pitched, and our camp-fire was lighted under the shade of "Abraham's oak." The horses, mules, and donkeys, with a foal which belonged to one of our mares, and greatly perplexed the riders by its erratic ways, were fastened to stakes near at hand. We commenced mending, sketching, and chatting over adventures, and were at home and at rest as much as pilgrims could wish to be. Vines trailed their luxuriant branches along the ground—stakes to support them being expensive luxuries in this treeless land. The horses were led to water at a neighbouring spring; muleteers and servants were grouped in various picturesque attitudes; our dinner was slowly but surely in course of preparation by the Maltese cook; the moonlight fell, chequering the ground through the interstices of the black massive branches and the delicate leaves of the oak, which was large enough to have sheltered a legion of soldiers. And it was Abraham's oak. Here, on this Plain of Mamre, under just such a venerable oak, at the door of a tent (probably more like the camel-hair Bedouin tents than ours), Abraham had welcomed the three mysterious visitors, two of whom were angels. Heavenly feet had trodden this ground. Had heaven grown distant since then, or only invisible, and were such heavenly beings indeed encamping round us for His sake, who in his humiliation needed their ministry once, and commands it always? That God cares for, and protects the feeblest of those who seek his care, we cannot doubt, and He works out his merciful purposes rather with living agents than with unconscious instruments, rather with hands than with machines. Such thoughts often cheered us in our night encampments in the Holy Land, and in regions far more dangerous than Hebron. Although our party happened to be entirely unarmed, I cannot remember experiencing a sensation of fear.

Before breakfast the next morning, June the 18th, we took a beautiful ride along the side of a very fine ravine to Adoraim, the modern Dura. From the top of a mosque near the poor cabins which form the village, we had one of those views so frequent from high land in the centre of Palestine, embracing a large range of hilly country east and west, from the Mediterranean to the hills beyond Jordan, from the sea to the desert.

My horse fell with me at full gallop on some smooth slippery turf, happily just after we had passed the ravine along the precipitous side of which the road wound quite unguarded. I walked back to the tent, and in that way had more leisure to notice the high vineyard walls, built of rough stones, and leaving narrow lanes between them, with occasionally a rude tower at an angle of the walls. These are characteristic of Southern Palestine, and are the lineal descendants of the ancient solitary "cottage in the vineyard." The proprietors often come from their houses in Hebron and live in them during the grape season, at once to enjoy and to protect their property.

In the afternoon we rode to Hebron. It was more like a European town (not one in England, certainly, but in some remote part of Italy), than any other place we had seen in Palestine. There were some faint indications of prosperity and life about it: numerous and abundant wells, water-troughs, gardens, vineyards, walls not in ruins, reservoirs well-kept, even a road in the valley.

We had some slight hope of being permitted to see the inside of the Haram or Sacred Place of Hebron, honoured by Moslems, Jews, and Christians as Abraham's Tomb. Mohammedan bigotry had yielded to bribes at Jerusalem, enforced by the echo of our artillery at Sebastopol. And why not here? But all our solicitations were in vain. The authorities of Hebron were either too strictly bound by Mohammedan law, or too ignorant of European politics to pay any attention to our demands. A crowd of angry looking idlers, and boys evidently not averse to the use of physical force, began to collect, and we were obliged to content ourselves with inspecting the outside walls. These were in many parts built of very large stones with that groove round them which we had been told at Jerusalem was characteristic of early Hebrew or Phœnician workmanship, like the stones left in the Temple enclosure. Thus the building carried us back to the days when David dwelt here a king, whilst the cave beneath it is indeed the resting-place of Sarah and Leah, Jacob, Isaac, and Abraham, the friend of God.

From Hebron we climbed a steep terraced hill, partly riding, and partly scrambling on foot, leading our horses. At the top was a grove of fine old fig-trees, reminding one of the groves which crowned the "high places" in ancient days. The view from this was rich and beautiful, and might be taken as some faint likeness of what it must have been in David's time, when the industrious Jews had entered on the olive gardens and vineyards of that earlier race, which, with all its crimes and savage idolatries, must have possessed elements of material civilization lost to the lawless Arab peasants who people the land now. The royal city lay below us, not far off, in the luxuriant plain, from a centre in the valley radiating up three separate hills. Its white roofs, domes, and airy minarets, and especially the great mosque over Machpelah, blended beautifully with the olives, vines, and figs which surrounded them. Around was the lovely, rich Plain of Mamre, and beyond, corn-fields were still golden on the lower uplands.

Again a night under the shelter of Abraham's oak, and in the morning (Thursday, June 19th) once more across the hill-country of Judea on our way back by Bethlehem to Jerusalem.

The especial interest of this day's journey was that it lay through the heart of the scenery of David's Psalms. The rocks and hill-fortresses, the "thousand hills," and the quiet valleys, the green pastures by the still waters, the wild caves and ravines of the shadow of death, amidst which we journeyed this day, were precisely those which have from our earliest childhood been made allegorical to us by the inspired poetry of the shepherd king.

Our first thoughts, however, in mounting the heights east of the city, were of Abraham's pleading for Sodom on these very hills, and afterwards beholding from the same spot, not the sea of verdure he had seen there before, or the gleam of sunny waters which we see now, but the heavy sea of smoke going up between him and the mountains of Moab,—no wreathed folds of morning mist, but the smoke of a burning land.

The first place we reached was Tekoah, after a wild, rough ride up and down pathless hills. One valley we had much difficulty in crossing. The side was very steep, and clothed or rather thickly sprinkled with trees, the roots of which perplexed our horses, whilst their branches perplexed us, and more than once forcibly recalled the fate of Absalom. At the bottom of this valley, which was a broad level, were corn-fields and meadows, beside an abundant, but still and noiseless stream—"green pastures by still waters," sufficiently rare in this country to impress themselves strongly on the memory. Some peasants were at work in the fields, who warned us off their territories with angry gestures.

Tekoah only differs from the ruined towns or villages which crest almost every hill-top, in its ruins being, although untenanted, more extensive and perfect than usual. This does not imply much; but since "ruins" in the Holy Land frequently mean little more than shapeless heaps of stones, there was a certain interest in exploring the foundations of houses, and the remains of tanks and wells in the city of the "wise woman" of old. The walls of a Greek church were still standing, with large stones of earlier buildings used in its foundation, and a stone font. The chief interest of the place, however, consists in its being one of the "fortresses," the fortified places on the rocky heights of Judea, which suggested to David the image so frequent in his Psalms: "Thou," and not these strongholds of my country's hills, "art my refuge and my fortress."

Our next expedition was to the Cave of Adullam, as our guides called it, I suppose incorrectly, since the refuge of David and his outlawed band is considered to have been more probably situated in one of the valleys opening on the rich maritime plains of the Philistines, on whom they made their forays. This mattered little to us—it was doubtless such a cave. During that exiled and outlawed period of his life, when David, like so many of whom the world was not worthy, "wandered in deserts and mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth," he had recourse to more than one such hiding-place, and why not to this?

In itself this cave was remarkable, not indeed wrought by stalactite and stalagmite into fairy likenesses of cathedral, palace, or grove, like some of the caves in our own limestone formations, but interesting, nevertheless, from its situation and its size. Its only opening is into a narrow, deep, dry ravine. Its only approach is down a steep mountain-path to a ledge of rock, over which you have to creep on hands and knees, one at a time, round a projecting crag into the cavern. This jutting rock, which effectually screens the entrance, once passed, the opening is large enough to admit abundance of light and air, and introduces you at once into a wide and lofty hall, with a vaulted or dome-shaped roof, the top of which was only lighted up at angles here and there by the daylight, or further in by our torches. This led into other chambers, and into one passage which we did not penetrate. A more secure hiding-place could scarcely be imagined. The entrance even could not be reached to smoke its tenants out, and except that, no mode of attack, but blockade, could affect them. The opening was about half-way up the perpendicular sides of the ravine. Wild birds flew uneasily about the crags, disturbed by our presence. The deep, narrow glen lay in shade even in that burning mid-day, and suggested forcibly by its lifeless stillness and darkness, in contrast with the valley of still waters and green pastures we had just passed, the other valley mentioned in the same psalm—the sunless, waterless ravine of the shadow of death.

There was something most interesting in this, as it were, approaching the Psalms from the other side. Usually the thoughts are present with us, and we illustrate them with David's images. Spiritual life and refreshment—the sure guardianship of our God—his presence lighting us at that hour when all other lights go out,—these are facts familiar to us, and we clothe them in the imagery of stream, and meadow, and dark ravine. But with David, probably, this was often reversed; he saw the still waters, the cavern "hiding-place," the commanding

"fortress," the gloomy valley, and he linked these to the realities of the unseen world. Looking at his flocks peacefully feeding under his shepherd care, he thought with happy confidence, "The Lord is my shepherd. I would traverse hill and valley before these trusting flocks should lack pasture, and will He suffer me to want?" Or, watchfully leading them through such a desert ravine as this—one of those "desert-creeks" through which Bedouin marauders might invade the peaceful land—without a tuft of herbage or a drop of water to sustain the wearied sheep, gathering the lambs in his arms, bearing the sickly on his shoulder, guarding them and guiding them with his rod and staff, he might feel: "And I also, though I have to pass through a ravine darker and more desolate than this, will fear no evil. These sheep fearlessly follow me here, and I will fearlessly follow thee, my Shepherd; for even there thou shalt be with me. My rod and staff lead and protect them—Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me." Or, in after years, looking from his mountain stronghold, or hiding in such a cave as this, he thought, "Not these stone walls and this rocky height, or this inaccessible cavern, are my true security. The Lord is my rock and my fortress, my high tower, my refuge, and my hiding-place."

It is difficult to describe the freshness and beauty which those precious, familiar psalms acquire by being thus visibly approached from the side of the scenery which suggested their imagery.

After leaving "Adullam," or whatever this interesting cave should be called, the next feature of importance in our day's journey was the ascent of the "Frank Mountain." This is a conical hill with a square, level summit, higher than the hills around, of a peculiar shape among their usual unvaried rounded forms, and commanding a fine view. There are ruins on it, and the mere fact of its having an outline of some character amidst these monotonous heights, is said to have gained it the honour assigned it of being the last fortress held by the crusading Franks in the Holy Land.

Our last point was Bethlehem, to which, on account of the length of the day's journey and the approaching darkness, our visit was unfortunately rather hurried.

We lingered a little time by the Well of Bethlehem, waiting for some of our party. But, precious as the hours were to us, we could hardly call this time lost, we were so much interested in watching several of the Bethlehem maidens who were drawing water. Their manners and appearance were so different from most of the peasantry of the country; their bearing was so modest, and yet so frank and trustful; and their movements and figures were so graceful, as they sat on the edge of the well, or helped each other to draw up the heavy pitchers, in their white classical robes, with their head-dresses of gold coins; and their unveiled faces had such a noble beauty, a Greek regularity of feature, combined with such dignity of expression. It seemed as if a glory had fallen on them from the virgin mother of Nazareth, who brought forth here her first-born Son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger here.

I cannot say the refreshment it was to see women once more whose ideas of modesty and good manners consisted in something else than in hiding their faces, and cowering like frightened animals when spoken to. These Bethlehem Christian women are, we were afterwards told, renowned for their beauty and for their good character. They are said to be descendants of the Crusaders. The Europeans of Jerusalem engage them, whenever they can, as upper servants. There was something indescribably touching to me in finding this little knot of free, noble-looking women at the birth-place of Him to whom the women of Christendom owe, in every sense, everything which ennobles and blesses them for eternity and for time.

The water they so courteously drew for us was the water of "the well hard by the gate," which David longed for, but would not drink, as the purchase of the blood of his faithful soldiers—the well to which he had doubtless often repaired when feeding those "few sheep" in the upland pastures near. As we left Bethlehem one of the women we had met at the well, and given some piastres to in acknowledgment of a draught of water, rushed out of a house as we rode by, and took my hand and kissed it fervently. I wonder if that little gift had come at some moment of need, and so awakened that burst of gratitude. It seemed to give one a link with a home at Bethlehem.

Our best views of the town were as we left it, and looked back on it from the hill, the long crest of which its white walls and houses crown,—a brown, bare hill, like the thousand others near, but terraced into vineyards by the Christian population, and looking down on a valley "standing thick with corn," whilst beyond are the pastures of the wilderness where David kept his sheep, and guarded them from the lions and bears which roamed up from the Jordan Valley, and beyond and above again, as always here, the purple mountain wall of Moab. Cornfields where Ruth gleaned, hills where the boy David kept his sheep; but to us how infinitely more than this.—hills where shepherds once kept watch over their flocks by night—where the glory of the Lord shone round them through the midnight—where the voices of a great multitude of the heavenly host sang, "Glory to God in the highest"—where the Lord of angels, higher than heaven, once lay, a babe wrapped in swaddling-clothes, cradled in a manger. "For unto us was born that day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

I have often since thought it was unwise, but then and there our hearts revolted from the beads, and relics, and even the Church of the Nativity, with its candles, and silver shrines, and marble floors. Cannot any one see it any day at a diorama in London? At all events, we did not visit it. I know that the subsequent historical interest of that church is great—that it was one of the earliest sanctuaries of Christendom—that Jerome, the fervent, stern, rugged father, lived there in a cave for years But I cannot, on the whole, regret that our unmixed associations with Bethlehem were of frank and noble-looking Christian women drawing water for us from David's well ; of a white town cresting a hill where shepherds feed the flocks, and at whose foot rest golden corn-fields, and where all subsequent historical events are merged in the one event which began all Christian history—that He to whom every knee in heaven and earth shall bow once lay there, a babe, on a poor Galilean woman's breast, He who on the throne of heaven wears that nature still.

We returned to Jerusalem by the Hill of Evil Counsel, with its one solitary tree, passing in an hour or two from the mountain village where we know the Saviour was born to the desolate fields where it is said the traitor died.

Once more, and for the last time, we returned to Jerusalem as our home, and felt how even the most interesting and sacred minor associations of this wonderful land are dim and distant compared with the thoughts which gather round every minutest touch and incident of that one life and death which are to us, in the midst of all the darkness of earth and time, light and life, wisdom and redemption, the opening of heaven, and the manifestation of God.

E. C.

THE SIGN OF THE PROPHET JONAH.

WHEN we consider the glory of the death and resurrection of Christ, as the greatest event in the mediatorial history, and that on which the faith of the Church chiefly hinges, we are apt to feel as if that Old Testament incident under which our Lord sets it forth, were hardly worthy of such august companionship. When the generation to which the Son of God came sought a sign, he declared that "There shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas : for as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." It was thus that our Lord thought it fitting to set forth the greatest event in our world's history ; and if the type chosen by him seems to us too partial or too poor, it is probably because we have not sufficiently studied it in all its accessories and allusions, as the type preappointed for the use of the great Teacher, when revealing his own death and victory.

Let us for a little, keeping this in our view, meditate upon the history of the prophet Jonah.

He was, in the first place, the oldest of the prophets. Prophesying about the year B.C. 800, he preceded the earlier prophets, such as Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah, and died two centuries before the later, such as Jeremiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel. And while to Christ gave all these prophets witness, testifying beforehand his sufferings and the glory that should follow, there was one, the first of them all, who had already become a type of him, not by spoken message, but by his own eventful history.

Is it not touching to find our Lord, who is ever ready to acknowledge the faith and forget the sins of his servants, passing over all these sons of consolation and sons of thunder, to reach that rude old prophet, stubborn, indeed, and hard to teach, but a true servant of the God who saved his life from corruption ? All the prophets and the law prophesied until John and the kingdom of God had come ; but here we find the first of all that "goodly fellowship" linked to the last and greatest, even to the great Prophet promised unto the fathers, who, when he would commend himself to an unbelieving generation, called himself only "a greater than Jonas." Eight hundred years had that grey head slept in the dust, and that burning, passionate heart forgot "to be displeased exceedingly, and to be very angry" with the dealings of his God. And now, when the King had at last come to his temple, he calls to him his earliest herald and forerunner, and lays his hands upon his head, and declares him to have been the unconscious witness and setter forth of the death, and burial, and rising of his incarnate Lord.

But if Jonah was the first of the prophets, his history, as we all know, was stranger than that of almost any of them. We all remember that scene on the deck, when the Lord had "sent out a great wind into the sea, and there was a mighty tempest in the sea, so that the ship was like to be broken." Then, when the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god, and could not lighten the ship, though they threw forth the wares, and at last cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah—he confessed who he was, "an Hebrew, and a fearer of Jehovah, which hath made the sea and the dry land." And he told how he, a prophet of the Lord, had fled from the face of the Lord, and "I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you." And even those rude seamen and heathens were appalled as they looked on the face of him whom the God of heaven was pursuing with his elemental wrath, and who even now, amid his awful consciousness of guilt, professed himself still a fearer and servant of Jehovah. He had said to them, "Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea ; so shall the sea be calm unto you ;" (and this spake he not of himself, but being the first of the prophets, he prophesied that Christ should so die for all the children of God that were scattered abroad). Yet they would have saved him if they could. But when the sea wrought and was tempestuous against them, and the raging billows of the Levant had broken their oars, "for the men rowed hard to come to the land," then they addressed themselves to their solemn sacrificial act. "Wherefore they cried unto Jehovah, and said, We beseech thee, O Jehovah, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood ; for thou, O Jehovah, hast done as it pleased thee." So Jonah was cast into the sea ; and the sea ceased from her raging, and the men feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, and made vows.

Who can read this story without being reminded, not indeed by all, but by some things in it, of the more awful sacrifice that was to be accomplished at Jerusalem? If Jonah was a sign in being three days and three nights in the heart of the deep, surely he was also in the manner in which he was committed to it. Think of the greater tragedy that has since been enacted, and the principles which it illustrates. What is this world of ours but a "ship fleeing from the presence of the Lord!" Deceitful gleams of sunshine in front, dark thunder-clouds hurrying behind, the moan of the storm to come wailing in the air. The Lord hath sent forth his wind into the sea, and men tug in vain each at their several oar of life, and find it labour and sorrow. We cry every man unto his god, and our gods do not deliver us. We cast forth the riches which we have gathered and which we idolize, and our load of life is lightened for a moment, but the great storm of existence is not appeased. Still "there is sorrow on the sea." Age after age men have cowered and shuddered as the thought came upon them that this life is a life apart from God, and that all troubles are but the successive surges of a tide that shall one day close over them in retribution. And so has the world-ship been drifting on her way to the iron-bound shore,—

"When, lo! upon the reeling deck a weary Stranger stands,
And to the dark devoted crowd stretches his suppliant hands;
'From the face of God, from the face of God, from the face of God ye flee,—
'Tis the blast of the breath of his nostrils that shakes this stormy sea!
But take ye Me and cast me into the troubled deep,
And the wrath that is roused against you will be pacified and sleep.'"

"With wicked hands" they seized Him, and threw Him, the Prince of life, into that gulf of death; and his last words were, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." With wicked hands,—but it was the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, and it was his own great love, which many waters could not quench, nor the floods of death could drown. And let us not omit to notice that point which, while it seems at first sight the most unmistakable discrepancy between the type and the antitype, is in fact their most central bond of union. Jonah was the one sinner on board the ship, and for his sake was the great tempest upon them. How shall we use such words of the Holy One and the Just? Yet most true it is in fact, and it is scriptural to speak it in words, that he became the one sinner in that company which he came to save. It was not that he "bound them in the bundle of life" with himself. It was not even that he bound himself into the bundle of their death. It was that he took all their death and all their sin upon himself, so that they should be free from both. In the awfully glorious words of Scripture, he became sin that they might be made the righteousness of God in him; and so when God's storm hurried after their bark, it sought but him. The lot fell upon Jehovah's servant, and he said, "Lo, I come!" It was a real sacrifice. He had, no doubt, voluntarily taken upon him their guilt, but he had taken that against which the thunders of God must bend themselves. And so when he perished they were saved. The sea ceased from her raging. The great sacrifice had been offered, never to be repeated. The great propitiation had been made. The men whose sins he had carried into the depths of the sea, had now only to stand in white on the "heavenward-bound ship" (as the early Christians loved to describe the Church), and fear the Lord exceedingly, and offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and pay their vows. "It is finished." From that hour of consummate and final sorrow, the desired haven is open to every soul of man who will enter in, and a voice has sounded through all the lives of all the generations of men, calling them to the land where there is "no more sea," and where Christ, who died unto sin once, liveth unto God.

"Three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." This is the point which our Lord has specially signalized as the sign of his own burial. It is universally recognised as such; and as we are at present attending to those parts of the type which are in more danger of being overlooked, we may now, having already considered Jonah's propitiatory or expiatory sacrifice, attend also to his wonderful and doubtless prophetic prayer. No one who remembers how the sixteenth, and twenty-second, and other psalms are applied to the Messiah, can doubt that this also has the same profound and sacred meaning; and in some respects it is more suggestive and solemn than any of them. It reminds us in every verse of One who in after days "prayed with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared." Concerning him the Church has long confessed that "He descended into hell," or the abode of the dead; and this is a prophet's cry "out of the belly of hell." "The waters compassed me about, even to the soul; the depths closed me round about; the weeds were wrapped about my head; I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the earth with her bars was about me for ever." So He who lay in Joseph's tomb was sealed over unto death, the earth guarding her prisoner. Or if we take the prayer as more applicable to the hour of mysterious sorrow before the betrayal, then with what a voice do these awful words fall upon us, "Thou hast cast me into the deep, in the midst of the seas; and the floods compassed me about; all thy billows and thy waves passed over me." "Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight" ("My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?") "Yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." ("Not my will, but thine be done.") So the Son of man, like Jonah, descended into the abyss of death; so, like Jonah, was he delivered. "It was not possible that he should be holden of it." David of old speaketh concerning Him, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." And so this prophet in later days, "Out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou heardest my voice ; thou hast brought up my life from corruption, O Lord my God."

These considerations make it plain enough what a rich and magnificent sign is that of this oldest of Israel's prophets, and how much our Lord intended to recall to faithful hearts and watching minds, when he said that as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so should the Son of man be in the heart of the earth. But let us, in conclusion, refer to one other utterance of Christ on the subject: "As Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation." It is remarkable that this first prophet was a prophet, not to the Jews, but to the Gentiles, and was raised from his living tomb to preach to a metropolis of heathendom the message of Jehovah. So when that "one Man died for the people, that the whole nation should not perish," it was "not for that nation only" that he rose again, though to that nation his message came first, "beginning at Jerusalem." God raised Jonas from the deep, not to remain idle and alone in Galilee,—Jonas, like our Lord, was a Galilean,—but to preach to the Ninevites. And "God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless" the children of the prophets first, and all nations thereafter, "in turning every one of them from his iniquities." And in the manner of the message, too, our Lord points out a resemblance. "Jonah was a sign" to the Ninevites. He not merely preached ; he was himself the sermon. As he went round that "exceeding great city of three days' journey," crying with a loud voice, men saw one who had been in the very jaws of death, and was drawn from death to preach to them. So, and still more, with the great Prophet of the world. The risen Saviour is the great sign unto mankind. Our Preacher hath his vesture dipped in blood. He is himself the message which he brings. In every church and chapel under heaven where the gospel is truly preached, we hear the message of One, who to calm the storm of God's anger, threw himself into the heart of the deep, while all the waves and billows went over him. And hearing his message, we hear Himself. We have to deal with Himself. He is present. He calls upon us to be buried with him in baptism to the life of sin and death, and to rise with him to a new life, quickened in us according to that working of God's mighty power, which he wrought of old when he raised Christ from the dead. s.

PASSING AWAY.

PASSING AWAY! how sad the thought!
From all of bright and fair below ;
From songs of spring, and summer flowers,
And autumn sunsets' radiant glow ;—
Never to gaze, and muse again,
By the blue ocean's sounding shore,
To wander through the smiling vale,
To climb the mountain heights no more!

Hush that deep sigh, O faithless heart!

All thou hast known of fair or bright,
Has shone with but a borrowed beam
Reflected from celestial light.
If under sin and sorrow's shade,
Such beauty hath adorned thy way,
What must remain to be revealed
In the good land of perfect day?

Passing away! how sad the thought!
From all that makes this heart rejoice ;
The fellowship of kindred souls—
The music of affection's voice—
The look, the smile, the words of love—
All the dear ties around me twined—
All the sweet counsel fondly shared,—
All these to lose—to leave behind!

Hush that deep sigh, O faithless heart!
Who thinks or says that love can die?
An exile here, and "stranger guest,"
Her native home is in the sky.
If pilgrims through the stranger land
Can find communion here so sweet,
What shall the joy, the rapture be,
When in their Father's house they meet!

Passing away! untrodden path,
Mysterious journey, dark, unknown!
The mortal shelter cast aside,
The spirit going forth, alone!
From the strange prospect shrinking back,
I look and long for some kind hand,
Some friendly voice, to cheer, to guide
Through the deep water floods to land!

Where is thy faith, O doubting heart?
Hath not thy Saviour gone before?
Down the dark valley, through the flood,
The burden of thy guilt—he bore.
'Tis He who calls thee, fear not now,
But at his summons onwards move;
Praise him for mercies here below,
Trust him for better things above!

THE KINGDOM IN POWER.

THE spirit of man is subject as much as the body, although its subjection is not a seen thing. The human soul is not, and cannot be, a god unto itself,—by necessity of nature it must worship another,—around some spiritual centre it must revolve. It may be that some are, in point of fact, for a time hovering on the confines of two opposite worlds. The kingdom of light may have begun to grasp, while the kingdom of darkness has not yet let go the man. Two real powers—the power of God and the power of evil—are contending for possession. The captive of the one or of the other must a human spirit be. There is such a thing as a borderer halting between these two kingdoms; but he does not halt always—he does not halt long there. While he stands quivering in the balance, sensible that redeeming love is drawing, but refusing to throw himself absolutely over into its power, the world holds him yet by a bond unbroken, and will suck back into its bosom all its own.

What is your position, brother? It is not enough to say that you are not wallowing in the mire of manifold lusts; you may be far removed from the vicious, and yet be as completely subject to the same spiritual power. The men who soar in a balloon among the clouds are as perfectly controlled by the earth's attraction as the men who heavily trudge on foot along the miry road below; soon, and perhaps suddenly, the lofty will be on a level with the low. Such, and no greater, is the difference between the more and the less reputable of those who live without God in the world. The movement upward from the earth, which is made by aid of earth's own powers and laws, will neither go far nor last long; if you are not caught and carried off by a power in heaven, the earth will soon have you on its bosom again. As long as a soul remains in the power of its old centre, a few degrees more or less of elevation in the standard of conventional morality will not decisively affect the final issue. A word will not avail. The kingdom that does not exert supreme controlling power is not a kingdom. In whose power does the soul actually lie? On that hinge turns all our time—all our eternity.

If the sun, while its grasp of the earth by gravity remained the same, were otherwise so changed that all its rays should be darts of death, the only hope for our world would be to escape from the sway of the destroyer. A method of deliverance can be at least conceived easily. Let the suffering planet forsake its orbit, and flee toward some other of the suns that people space; it would then revolve round another centre, and bask in another light. The passage of a human spirit from the power of Satan into the kingdom of God is a real event, as great and as decisive as the supposed transference of a peopled planet to the sphere of another sun. If there should not be in all cases the power of precisely observing and recording the moment when the border line between death and life is crossed, there ought, at least, to be a well-defined and clearly seen distinction between living under the power of darkness and a translation into the kingdom of God's dear Son.

On the Sabbath, when you leave your labour behind, and worship with your fellows in the house of prayer, or in the silence of night within your own dwelling, when you kneel alone to pray, which kingdom retains the control of your heart? Does the love of Christ hold you as the sun holds this planet in its power? If the new kingdom has not gotten the command, the old kingdom has not lost it. A kingdom in word cannot wrench you from the grasp of this world's god. The word of the kingdom may tingle in your ears every Sabbath for a lifetime, and you, nevertheless, lie in the wicked one.

There is only one way of deliverance, and that is by a simple and unreserved personal surrender to the power of Christ's kingdom—to Christ its King.

Whether do you keep Christ in your power or lie in his? Strange question, you will say; how could we keep Christ in our power although we would? True, you cannot ascend into heaven and drag Messiah from his throne; but those who are determined to have Christ at their disposal take not the power but the word, and make it lie where it will disturb them least. Some persecutors, when the victim is beyond their reach, dress and execute his effigy. Thus some who are called Christians treat Christ. They keep a lifeless image which bears his name, leaving it outside the door while they entertain company within, and subjecting it to a thousand indignities. The name and the garb they will endure, but not the life or power. In order to carry out a certain political system, the British Government maintained a personage at Delhi in royal state, with royal titles; but they crushed their own creature as soon as he tried to be a real king. It is thus that the same persons who bow the knee and cry, Hosanna! before the Christian religion, crucify Christ because he claims to be a King. The struggle of rebellion is painful; but simple, trustful, loyal obedience is sweet. Those who have surrendered without reserve to the Redeemer's claim of sovereignty, bear witness willingly that his yoke is easy and his burden light.—Arnot.

THE LAST LULLABY.

An infant on its mother's arm
Reposed and smiled, secure from harm;
Softly as evening shadows fly,
The mother sang this lullaby,—
"Sleep, baby, sleep—
Thy rest shall angels keep."

Another eve the sun went down,
While tears bedewed the lashes brown;
And then in mournful tones again,
Was heard that tender, low refrain,—
"Sleep, baby, sleep—
Thy rest shall angels keep."

Morn came,—a darker shadow fell;
The soft eyes slumbered in its spell;
Scarce could the trembling lips prolong
The cadence of that plaintive song,—
"Sleep, baby, sleep—
Thy rest shall angels keep."

A starless night, a sunless day,
A jewel borne from earth away;
A loving heart by anguish riven,
Yet sang she 'neath the light of heaven—
"Sleep, baby, sleep—
Thy rest shall angels keep."

ALEXANDER CARLYLE OF INVERESK.

IN Foster's unique Essay "On a Man's Writing Memoirs of Himself," which may be called the Philosophy of Autobiography, the case is supposed of a reflective aged man finding at the bottom of a chest, where it had lain forgotten fifty years, a record which he had written of himself when he was young. It contains a simple, vivid description of the feelings with which he looked forward on the career opening before him, the glowing fancies and aspirations which time was to convert into solid and precious realities. Very characteristic is it of the writer to imagine that the old man's consciousness would be strangely confused in the attempt to verify his identity with the being these fervid pages mirror,—that at every sentence he must repeat: "Foolish youth, I have no sympathy with your feelings; I can hold no converse with your understanding!"

About the time the thoughtful essayist was inditing this passage, a grey-headed man, verging on fourscore, was carefully retracing such a record, in the pleasant seclusion of the Scottish manse where he had lived from early manhood. Not, indeed, a faded manuscript he had retrieved from the secret recess of a cabinet, but one he had carried about with him for many years, locked up in the iron safe of a tenacious memory, and to which he was now giving such permanence as a faithful and finished transcript could secure. But day by day, as with a singular freshness of recollection he revived the image of his former self, and sketched with subtle and graphic pen the scenes, the incidents, the companions of his college years, no such painful doubts of his identity disturbed his composure. No sad, reproachful smile passed for a moment over the grave, world-worn face, as it recalled the midsummer day-dream of youthful enthusiasm. Quietly he bent him over his task, as the engraver over his plate of steel, etching in the lines with his burin, and bringing out the lights and shadows with biting acids, till the picture stands in sharp relief. For all these sixty restless years,—working, writing, scheming,—mingling amongst men, acting no common part on the open stage of events, declaiming in public assemblies, intriguing in secret conclaves,—this man had been true to one steadfast aim. From the outset of his career he had set his end clear before him, and went on towards it with a step that never swerved. Cool, collected, unscrupulous, always consistent with himself, he had become all he aspired to become; he had done all he had resolved to do. He had kept as straight and rigid a course to the mark as the engine on its iron track, now in a cutting, now on an embankment,—here lost in a tunnel, there rattling across a viaduct,—but always on the level, never shunting to another line of rails, even as he neared the terminus.

A humble country minister, he had proposed to himself to gain a place in the most refined and cultivated circles of his time, to number many eminent and titled persons among his friends, to be a welcome guest at the fullest and most sumptuous tables, and he had succeeded. He had aspired to be a leader in the Church, to liberalize its theology and its public sentiment, to tone down its puritanic discipline to the morals and fashions of the time, and this he had accomplished to his heart's content. And now, at the mature age of fourscore, he sat down to review the annals of a well-spent life, to give posterity the benefit of his ripe experience,—to relate how a simple Scottish presbyter had gained the entrée of ducal mansions, lounged in the green-rooms of theatres, swayed reverend synods by his eloquence, and relaxed from his pastoral labours in the genial companionship of wits and infidels.

To do this man justice, he had not only those lighter qualities which fit men to shine in society, but native powers and endowments which would have raised him to success and distinction in any career he might have chosen. Along with sprightly wit and fluent conversation, a refined taste and a well-furnished mind, his memoirs bear evidence of his robust sense and inborn shrewdness, his insight into character,—alertness, energy, decision,—the clear outlook and determined will which give to one mind a potential force and momentum to carry common minds before it. There was no hypocrisy about Carlyle—no pretence to be something more and better than he was. What was in him came out broadly and nakedly without concealment. Fearless, reckless, outspoken in word and deed when others would have dissembled, he had in no common measure what the French call, "the courage of opinions." Under the control of religious principle, a character like his would have been one of the noblest and most influential for good that the Scottish Church has seen. That vigorous intellect, with its powers disciplined and quickened into exercise by profound spiritual conviction, a vital faith in things unseen, such as passed like a rushing mighty wind over the soul of the pastor of Kilmany, would have done signal service to the cause of truth and righteousness, and left an enduring stamp and impress on its time. Had Carlyle undergone the change which made the student of science a reader of the Bible, the work of Chalmers might have been anticipated by half a century, and the kirk of Inveresk been as dear as that of the Fifeshire hamlet to the Christianity of his native land.

Very different are the results of a long lifetime that are summed up in these posthumous pages. For in sober truth, this book, the autobiography of a minister of Christ, regarded, as of right it must be, from a Christian point of view, is one of the most melancholy ever written. Most painful in this respect, that from first to last, it is evident that the conception of Christianity, as a divine faith, meant to renew, and transform, and purify the souls of men, had never once entered into the writer's mind. A profound, unbroken, self-complacent ignorance or unconsciousness of the primary and fountal truths of the gospel, as a revelation of the will of God to His fallen creatures for their salvation, reigns throughout. It may be said that any formal statement of his religious sentiments did not fall within the scope of the writer's plan,—but the plea is fallacious. Had these truths possessed any place in his understanding, any hold of his conscience or heart,—they could not have failed to come out as influencing his general opinions or moulding his conduct. And Carlyle himself was too honest to mask his views under any subterfuge. There is no lack of piquant allusions to the subject, which show that everything like vital godliness or evangelical religion was to him mental imbecility or mischievous fanaticism, as offensive as the steam of a heathen sacrifice would have been to Paul. Once and again the old man's lip curls with a sneer that shows the acrid bitterness of hatred that rankled in his heart. The fire of malignant zeal still smouldered in the ashes. Through all his thoughts, and plans, and pleasures, there envelopes and clings to him a worldly atmosphere in which nothing spiritual could live. The words of Scripture must have been familiar to his mind, but all their pure and gracious light was quenched in the gross, unwholesome air, as a lamp goes out in the choke-damp of a mine.

When we reflect that Carlyle was reared in a manse, the son and grandson of ministers of the Church of Scotland, the state of feeling he exhibits, the utter blank and vacuity of his mind in regard to all that is distinctive or elemental in Christianity, is almost incredible. His own words must verify the statement: "As the time drew near when I was to be presented to Inveresk, there arose much murmuring in the parish against me, as too young, too full of levity, and too much addicted to the company of my superiors, to be fit for so important a charge, together with many doubts about my having the grace of God, an occult quality which the people cannot define, but surely is in full opposition to the defects they saw in me."

He gravely records the remark made by David Hume after hearing him preach in John Home's pulpit at Athelstaneford, seemingly unconscious of the satire it conveyed. "What did you mean," says he to me, "by treating John's congregation to-day to one of Cicero's academics? I did not think such heathen morality could have passed in East Lothian." Hume, at least, would not have qualified himself to be a preacher of "rational religion" by taking the ordination vows of a Christian minister, and in his heart must have despised the men who had not shrunk from the awful perjury. Carlyle, of course, did not see this; probably this view of the subject had never once occurred to him. His nature was, in fact, struck with hopeless paralysis on the spiritual side.

It is not necessary, and it would not be a grateful task to dwell on the leading incidents of this biography, as they are cleverly told, from the battle of Prestonpans, which he saw from his father's manse garden, to the battle of the Window Tax, in which he gained a signal victory for the Church. He enjoyed all the advantages which academic training at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow could bestow, and to this was added a winter's residence at Leyden, the famous continental school of those days. The ministry was not the profession he would have chosen for himself. His first wish was to enter the army, then he had thoughts of law and medicine; but he yielded to the persuasions of his friends, who had interest to secure his preferment in the Church. He preached his first sermon on a fast-day at Tranent "with universal approbation." He thus describes the services of that day of humiliation and prayer: "The genteel people of Prestonpans (his father's) parish were all there; and one young lady, to whom I had been long attached, not having been able to conceal her admiration of my oratory, I inwardly applauded my own resolution of adhering to the promise I had made my family to persevere in the clerical profession." After this auspicious beginning, no long time elapsed before his presentation, at the age of six and twenty, to the parish of Inveresk, where he ministered till his death in 1805, a period of fifty-seven years. This era witnessed the gradual rise of the "Moderate" party to their ascendancy in the ecclesiastical councils, and the disastrous triumph of their policy in crushing the Christian liberties of the people, and well-nigh extinguishing spiritual life in the National Church. In all their measures Carlyle was a principal actor, apparently the moving spirit of the unholy crusade, and faithfully he tells us how the evil work was done. He describes the skillful statesmanship which insured these results with the pen of a Machiavel. Robertson, Home, Blair, and other college companions of his, formed the cabal. "There were a few of us who, besides the natural levity of youth and the natural freedom of our manners, had an express design to throw contempt on that vile species of hypocrisy which magnified an indecorum into a crime, and gave an air of false sanctimony and Jesuitism to the greatest part of the clergy, and was thereby pernicious to rational religion. In this plan we succeeded, for in the midst of our freedom having preserved respect and obtained a leading in the Church, we freed the clergy from many unreasonable and hypocritical restraints." Not without some risk was the success achieved. At the hands of the Puritan faction Carlyle was early called, like other reformers, to suffer persecution, the offence in his case being that he had publicly appeared in the Edinburgh theatre at the first performance of the tragedy of Douglas, figured on the occasion in an unseemly altercation with some strangers, and consorted with the actors and actresses before and after the play. The thought that he was a martyr in the cause of 'rational religion,' suffering wrongfully, cheered his afflicted spirit and sustained him through the trial. He lived to see better days, and relates, with a feeling of humble gratitude, that "in the year 1784, when the great actress, Mrs. Siddons, first appeared in Edinburgh, during the sitting of the General Assembly, that court was obliged to fix all its important business for the alternate days when she did not act, as all the younger members, clergy as well as laity, took their stations at the theatre on those days by three in the afternoon."

As to the manner in which Assembly business was managed in those days, we have many a curious glimpse behind the scenes. Patrons who had cases of disputed settlement before the court were in the habit of opening public-houses to entertain the members. The agent of the Duke of Douglas, who had a case of this kind, which lasted for three Assemblies, opened a daily table, "which vied with the Lord Commissioner's for dinners, and surpassed it far in wine." Had the hospitality been less profuse, the case might not have lasted so long. It was the custom of the Moderate leaders to select for their symposia some West Bow tavern or punch-house, where they supped every evening and discussed their measures. At these festive conclaves, where that "innocent good soul," David Hume, was always a welcome guest, the chiefs of the Sanhedrim, over copious libations of claret laid in beforehand, carried out their dark conspiracy against the liberties and life of the Church whose bread they ate. From these haunts they retired at midnight flushed with wine, to send back, perchance, next day in open Assembly some clerical sot or brawler to the quiet country hamlet or Highland glen, where his name had been long a scandal,—drunken priests pronouncing the leper clean, and letting him go free; or it might be to browbeat a quailing Presbytery into ordaining some hireling Levite over a people who could only protest against the outrage to their holiest feelings by a sullen secession from the Church of their fathers.

So the work of "liberalizing" the Church went bravely forward. They made a solitude, and called it peace. It is well that one of the actors in the dismal tragedy has not shrunk from lifting the veil from scenes, which his more prudent associates would have wished to be buried in oblivion. Carlyle, indeed, does not spare his friends, but once and again roundly taxes them with dissimulation and cowardice. Thus, in allusion to play-going, we have this racy passage: "Drs. Robertson and Blair, though they both visited this great actress (Mrs. Siddons) in private, often regretted to me that they had not seized the opportunity which was given them, by her superior talents and unexceptionable character, of going openly to the theatre, which would have put an end to all future animadversions on the subject. This conduct of theirs was keeping the reserve of their own imaginary importance to the last; and their regretting it was very just, for by that time they got no credit for their abstinence, and the struggle between the liberal, and the restrained and affected manners of the clergy had been long at an end, by my having finally stood my ground, and been so well supported by so great a majority in the Church."

So frequent are the references to these convivial meetings, that we seem to see the reverend biographer and his boon companions through a perpetual vinous haze. The sight of the grave Principal and the elegant Blair in their private hours is not edifying. We turn away from these carousals of graceless presbyters and scoffing lawyers, sickened by the fumes of wine. There hang about them the reeking odours of debauch; and we say with honest Samuel Johnson, when disgusted by some clerical buffoonery that passed in his presence, "This merriment of parsons is mighty offensive."

No welcome task is it to dwell on details like these, but it is necessary to complete the portraiture of the man, and to understand the spirit of the policy that made havoc of the Church. We must quote his summary of the qualifications requisite to a party leader in those days: "Dr. Patrick Cuming was at this time at the head of the Moderate interest; and had his temper been equal to his talents, might have kept it long; for he had both learning and sagacity, and very agreeable conversation, with a constitution able to bear the conviviality of the times."

The poet of "The Seasons" must have had some such gifted divine in his eye in his description of the fox-hunters' revel, as one by one they succumb to their potatoes;—

"Perhaps some doctor, of tremendous pannach,
Awful and deep, a black abyss of drink,
Outlives them all; and from his buried flock
Retiring, full of rumination sad,
Laments the weakness of these latter times."

One thing cannot but strike us in reading this chronicle of the life of a country minister, the absence of all, even the remotest allusion to his pastoral work. We are told in his long and faultless epitaph (composed in choicest lapidary English by his friend, Adam Ferguson) that he was "faithful to his pastoral charge." Sabbath after Sabbath for fifty years he must have appeared in the pulpit. Often must he have been called to the bed-sides of the sick and the dying; and sometimes after a season of wild weather, when the misty east wind had scourged the waves of the broad Frith into foam and fury, some homebound fishing-boat was looked for by dim eyes in Inveresk in vain, some lowly seats were vacant in the village kirk, and in the darkened dwellings was the wail of widow and orphans for those who were never to return. Scenes of anguish and bereavement like this Carlyle now and then must have witnessed,—trials and calamities that must have appealed to his human sympathies, and amid which the minister of Christ is always welcome as a comforter and friend. Never once does he speak of these things; the retrospect of life is empty and barren here. We are taken into lordly mansions, and literary coteries, and places not so reputable; but never once have we a glimpse of a village interior,—we long to hear the clinking of a cottage latch. Of the hard, care-worn, struggling life that was going on all these years under the thatched or red-tiled roofs that might be seen from the windows of the manse, we know nothing. It is strange and wonderful that such a thing could be.

There is a coldness and hardness in his tone when he alludes even to the death of relatives and friends, which seems to indicate that there was little depth or tenderness in his nature. His worldliness had petrified the feeling. Speaking of the amiable qualities and promise of a brother who drooped and died in early life, he adds: "He lived to November 1747, and then succumbed to fate." This is rather below the elegiac strain of Cicero. Of his father's decease he remarks: "Though long expected, I felt this a severe blow, as every man of common feelings must do, the loss of a 'respectable' parent." Announcing the death of Principal Robertson to a friend, he says: "He appeared more 'respectable' when he was dying than ever he did even when living." Of which comforting assurance, recalling some of the scenes in which the historian is made to figure in these memoirs, we cannot doubt the truth. This modish phrase "respectable" recurs so often, especially as a tribute to departed worth, that we are led to the conclusion that "respectability," whatever it may mean, was the saving article of the system of rational religion in which Carlyle was so consistent a believer.

It is instructive to see the man who sneers at Doddridge's account of the conversion of Colonel Gardiner, and who transfixes with his keenest and most venomous sarcasms men whose only crime was that they believed and preached the doctrines of Paul and John, crawling in the dust at the feet of the satrap Dundas, when there was a project to send him out as Governor-General of India:—"When I consider how many millions of the human race look for a guardian angel to raise and perfect them, I see a shining path in the East that leads to a pinnacle of glory and virtue. Go, then, and pursue the way that Providence points out." No wonder that a simple minister, who had such mellifluous phrases at his command, should be a favourite in the most brilliant circles. He wrote poetry, and this passage shows that he possessed the creative imagination. Dundas an angel, is a flight that overpowers us.

And so we close the Autobiography of the Rev. Dr. Alexander Carlyle. It is a vivid presentment of a phase of social life that has happily passed away. Under the boasted refinement that veneered the surface, we can see that it was a time of dissolute morals, heartless levity, flippant unbelief, coarse self-indulgence bordering on cynicism. There are men in whom, from a peculiar idiosyncrasy that renders them more than ordinarily susceptible, or sensitive to prevailing influences, the spirit of an age comes strongly out. Such was Carlyle: in private life a man of the world according to the fashionable creed of the seventeenth century; as a minister, a type of that system of frigid rationalism and secularity which has become, as Moderatism, one of the dreariest traditions of the Scottish Church. Here, standing at full length, we survey him with the curiosity excited by a specimen of a race fast disappearing—the wine-drinking, free-thinking, eminently genteel and liberal clergyman, slightly sycophantic, at least "partial to the company of his superiors." His book contains rather less religion than the "Confessions" of Rousseau, and about as much as the Autobiography of Gibbon, or the "Dichtung und Wahrheit" of Goethe. With this Pagan poet, born out of due time, who would have been in his place as poet laureate to Julian the Apostate, we have no doubt that Carlyle would have cordially fraternized. Both had fine heads, and were compared to Jupiter.

We cannot regret that we should have had such a picture, so far as it throws light on an eventful epoch in Scottish Church history. But, for the sake of the writer and the sacred function he held so long, it might have been well to have allowed his manuscript to repose undisturbed in the safe privacy where it had lain for half a century. It is scarcely kindness to call back a man from the grave to rewrite his own epitaph. Assuredly Robertson and Blair would not have relished the prospect of being gossiped about and shown in dishabille, for the amusement of posterity, by a garrulous old man. A scene at Oxford marks the heartless, graceless, frivolous age to which it belonged;—its want of faith, reverence, earnestness,—and the kind of men it bred. It was time for Cowper's "Expostulation,"—his protest against the worldliness and indifference that were all but universal among the clergy:—

"Except a few with Eli's spirit blessed, Hophai and Phineas may describe the rest."

Carlyle with Robertson and Home were on a visit to the place, and found their countryman Douglas, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, passing his trials for the degree of doctor in divinity. This ordeal consisted in his quietly sitting in a pulpit in one of the chapels for a certain time, and was called a "wall-lecture,"—there being no audience. "On seeing us enter the chapel, he talked to us and wished us away, otherwise he would be obliged to lecture. We would not go away, we said, as we wished a specimen of Oxford learning. On which he read two or three verses of the Greek Testament, and began to expound it in Latin. We listened for five minutes, and then telling where we were to dine, we left him to walk about."

Let us leave the group of priestly Sadducees, finding material for "foolish talking and jesting" in the sacred text of evangelist or apostle. As little Christianity was there in that Oxford chapel as in the hall of Caiaphas in the chill grey daybreak, when priests and doctors whiled away the time, waiting for Iscariot and the Captive of Gethsemane.

The Autobiography of Carlyle is the Nemesis of Moderatism.

GOD'S ALCHÉMY.

"Out of the eater shall come forth meat, and sweetness out of the strong."

WELL ever near to grief,
And joy shall ever flow :—
Wouldst thou from pain have sure relief,
To pain then ever go.

Wouldst thou for ever part
With the burden of thy care ;—
Then do thou make thy heart
A heavier burden bear.

Wouldst thou that light should burst
Through the shadows that round thee fall ;—
Let thy journey be at first
Through the gloomiest shade of all.

Whatever ill be thine
From which thou wouldst be free,
Its cure sufficient, for divine,
Is thy Lord's sore agony.

Go, make that grief thine own :
Then, grief and tears shall swell,
Yet gazing on this thorny crown,
All is and shall be well.

PROGRESS IN THEOLOGY.

BY THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON.*

THE idea of progress has been enlisted into the service of the enemy. Ages grow wiser. The wealth of one generation is put out to interest to increase the possessions of the next. Knowledge attained is but the stepping-stone to knowledge desired. In every department the sons of earth are advancing with tremendous strides. "Whereunto shall this grow?" is a question which, with the past before us, it is not easy to answer. Progress is written upon all human things; and he is little short of a fool who shall attempt to reverse this settled order.

Carried away with the great fact which we have just admitted, certain unsobered minds and unexperienced hearts have plotted against the fixedness of Gospel doctrines, and have planned an advance upon the theology of their fathers. Have we not steam instead of horse-flesh? why not then philosophy instead of the old book? Do we not constrain the lightning to convey the thoughts of man? what should hinder us from compelling the words of the seers to bear the burden of our new devices? In all things else we march; why then stay we here? If in other fields the old opinions have been supplanted by fresh discoveries, why should not theology receive the like renovation? "The old picture," say they, "needs thorough cleaning, new tints must be supplied, and a few touches by a younger hand will improve it greatly. The old Puritans were mere children, and we have so outgrown them that we put away their dogmas as childish things."

What a siren song is this for the youth of our churches! Shall we marvel if they be beguiled thereby? Happily the disease has not as yet spread very widely; and we trust that decided testimonies may stay it in its very first appearance. O perplexed one, charmed by the allurements of this harlot, yet willing to remain chaste in thy devotion to the truth, ask thyself this one question, and the spell of the enchantress is broken: When God has finished a work, shall man amend and correct it? Look to creation: in what respect is earth more lovely to-day than on the first of her sabbaths? Has the sun become more bright, or the moon more lovely? When the snow-flakes fell upon the mountains in the days of Enoch, were they less pure than now? Were the winds and rain but mere infants when they battled about the ark of Noah? Are flowers a novelty discovered by philosophy? or were the cedars of Lebanon mere hyssops until learning have developed them? Have mortals quickened the march of the orbs of heaven? or turned to human melodies the roaring waves of the sea? Since the day in which the Lord pronounced all things to be very good, who has rearranged the universe, and made an advance upon the six days' work of the Creator? How, then, shall we expect to find changes in a revelation which is, by the guardian voice of divine threatening, declared to be complete? Is the Bible a mass of matter, shapeless and void, needing human wit to fashion it? Is it a mere leaping-pole to aid us in the venturous vaultings of speculation? Will coming ages outgrow its swaddling-bands, and either cast the book away despisingly, or preserve it curiously as a relic of darker times? No, in the name of all the faith which dwells in the bosoms of the redeemed, we answer, No. We repudiate and detest the idea of advancement beyond the perfect law of the Lord; and at the hazard of being left behind in the march of intellect, we choose to tarry in the mount of inspiration, trembling to go beyond the word of the Lord, less or more. The simple word of revelation is the ultimatum of the creed of the Church; and beyond the evangelical doctrines of the Bible she will never dare or even desire to trespass.

But we are met by a portion of our opponents, who claim the right of restating their theory. "We do not," say they, "go the length of expecting an improvement upon revelation; but we are anxious for fresh light to be shed upon it, that men may understand it better. Here we think it safe to prophesy progress; for we believe that, as education advances, we shall be the better fitted to comprehend the deep things of God." This is a most reasonable opinion, if the surface-idea be all. Deception, however, lurks within the plausible. There is truth here, but it is like a homœopathic globule dissolved in a barrel of water. Who will deny the manifest fact that Christian men grow in knowledge, and in an acquaintance with the hidden meaning of the divine word? But this is not what is meant; this is only the atom of truth: we will soon spill upon the ground the flood in which it is made to lose itself. The meaning of the lovers of a progressive theology is, not that a man is taught more and more to comprehend with all saints what are the heights and depths, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge; but that thinking, intellectual professors in our day are far in advance of praying, deep-taught saints in earlier times; that, in fact, John Calvin, Owen, Bunyan, Goodwin, and the like, must needs go to school to modern divines if they should return to earth again. Persons besotted by this notion do not desire to see old truths more distinctly, but to obtain a sort of light, or rather "darkness visible," which shall throw the ancient theology into obscurity, and give a fine opportunity to show their magic-lanterns of novel speculations. Were it their prayer that God would show them his truth more clearly, we would be humble suppliants with them. O that the Lord would enlighten our darkness, and reveal to us personally the fellowship of the mystery. But when the cry is for such intellectual growth as shall remove the old landmarks, and give us a new gospel, we shake our garments from all association with the rebellious clamour.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

JONATHAN EDWARDS.

PART FIRST.

THERE are some men who are made great by their circumstances in spite of themselves. There are others who are made great by themselves in spite of their circumstances. To this latter class belonged Jonathan Edwards. He was born in an obscure colony, in the midst of a wilderness. He was educated at a seminary just commencing its existence. He passed the better part of his life as the pastor of a frontier village, and the residue as an Indian missionary in a still humbler hamlet. Yet, to use the language of Henry Rogers, "by the concurrent voice of all who have perused his writings, he is assigned one of the first, if not the very first place among the masters of human reason. . . . Like Paul at Athens, he has compelled even the Stoics and Epicureans to listen to him, by the depth and originality of his speculations." It is sometimes asserted by men who are determined at all hazards to be extraordinary, and who have become infidels far more from vanity than conviction, "that it is impossible to be at once a great thinker and a sound divine. In reply to this silly saying, we need only point to the man whose name stands at the head of this paper. His gigantic force of intellect has been acknowledged not merely by Robert Hall and Thomas Chalmers, but by Hume, and Mackintosh, and Stewart; and yet there is no theologian of modern times whose orthodoxy was more unquestionable, whose personal piety was more fervent and unaffected, or who gave himself more heartily to the support of the most spiritual efforts of the gospel Church.

He was the only son of the Rev. Timothy Edwards, minister at Windsor, on the banks of the Connecticut, and was born in that place on the 5th of October 1703. In the absence of any suitable school to which he could be sent, he was educated by his father at home; and so much progress was made by him under his tuition, that he was considered fit to enter Yale College before he was thirteen years of age. In this seminary he remained till he was nineteen, when, having passed the customary trials, he was licensed to preach the gospel. Immediately afterwards he was sent to supply a vacant charge in the city of New York, and remained there for eight months, preaching with such acceptance, that the congregation would gladly have had him for their pastor. But the people were very few in number, and quite unable to promise him an adequate support, and most unwillingly on his part he was forced to leave them. Subsequently he was appointed one of the tutors of Yale, and held the office for two years. The ministry, however, was the profession of his choice, and among the many openings which presented themselves, one at last offered which seemed all that could be desired. This was to become the colleague of his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, at Northampton; and he was accordingly settled there on the 15th of February 1727. He was then twenty-three, and all things seemed to promise well and hopefully. His labours were, indeed, most wonderfully blessed; and his long residence in the village invested it with an interest which remains to this day. But who can tell what may be in the womb of the future? Just twenty-three years afterwards, in 1750, the same people that now welcomed him as their pastor with such demonstrations of satisfaction, ignominiously dismissed him from their service, and compelled him to seek elsewhere a more grateful field of labour.

Early in December 1750, this great and good man, of whom it is very clear the Church at Northampton was not worthy, is represented as on the outlook for another corner of the vineyard whereon to bestow his ministrations. Happily, he was not long left waiting in the market-place. A call came to him from the Church and congregation of Stockbridge to become their minister, and about the same time proposals from the commissioners at Boston of the "Society in London for propagating the Gospel in New England, and the parts adjacent," to become the missionary of the Housatonnucks, or River Indians, a tribe then located in Stockbridge and its vicinity. Edwards went to see the place in the beginning of 1751, and having spent the winter and spring in it, preaching to the English inhabitants, and also to the Indians by an interpreter, he was satisfied that the field was one in which he might hope to labour with success, and accepting the invitations given to him, he was inducted to his new charge in the August following.

In this place, it is evident, he intended to spend the remainder of his days. While others were thinking of his pre-eminent fitness for the highest offices in his profession, it never seemed to enter into his mind that he could be employed in any work more suitable to his powers and training than that of instructing in the elements of Christianity a tribe of untutored Indians. There would, however, have been a certain incompleteness in his life, if this had been the last chapter of it. And happily it was not to be. In 1757 there occurred a vacancy in the Presidency of Princeton, a theological seminary in New Jersey, and two days after it took place, the trustees met and, without hesitation, agreed to offer the situation to Jonathan Edwards. "The news of his appointment," says Dr. Hopkins, "was quite unexpected, and not a little surprising to Mr. Edwards. He looked on himself, in many respects, so unqualified for that business, that he wondered that gentlemen of so good judgment, and so well acquainted with him, should think of him for that place." His modest depreciation of himself, however, was overruled, and he was installed President of Princeton in January 1758. But his term of office was sadly short. In the February succeeding he was seized with small pox, and though he got rid of the disease, he never rallied. On the 22d of March, in the 55th year of his age, the greatest American that ever lived entered into his rest, leaving a most extensive circle of friends, not only in his own country, but in England and Scotland also, to lament his untimely end.

There are a great many points of interest connected with the history of this distinguished man, and we propose selecting a few of them for special notice here. First of all, we feel naturally curious to know something of the character of—

HIS INNER, OR SPIRITUAL LIFE.

The date of his conversion is not known. When he was very young—perhaps eight or nine years of age—a revival of religion took place in his father's congregation, and he was aroused in consequence to some concern about his soul; so much so, that he and two other lads erected a booth in a very retired spot in a swamp, for the purpose of enjoying the exercise of social prayer. But the interest awakened in his mind then by-and-by wore off, and he returned to a condition of entire insensibility and indifference. He was at college apparently, when the vital change came; and the following is the account which he himself gives of it:—

"The first instance that I remember of that sort of inward, secret delight in God and divine things, that I have lived much in since, was on reading these words, 1 Tim. i. 17, 'Now, unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.' As I read these words there came into my soul, and was as it were diffused through it, a sense of the glory of the divine being; a new sense, quite different from anything I ever experienced before.

Never any words of Scripture seemed to me as these words did. I thought with myself, how excellent a Being that was, and how happy I should be if I might enjoy that God, and be rapt up to him in heaven, and be as it were swallowed up in him for ever! I kept saying, and as it were singing, over these words of Scripture to myself, and went to pray to God that I might enjoy him; and prayed in a manner quite different from what I used to do, with a new sort of affection. . . . From about that time I began to have a new kind of apprehensions and ideas of Christ, and the work of redemption, and the glorious way of salvation by him. And inward sweet sense of these things at times came into my heart, and my soul was led away in pleasant views and contemplations of him. And my mind was greatly engaged to spend my time in reading and meditating on Christ, on the beauty and excellency of his person, and the lovely way of salvation by free grace in him."

It will be seen here that Edwards was not driven, but drawn into the kingdom; and distinguished as he was afterwards above most others by the power of his intellect, and the vigour and constancy with which he used it, there are few Christians indeed who have ever felt, as he did almost all his life through, the sheer constraining influence of the loveliness and love of Christ. The strength and grasp of his mind seemed actually surpassed by the tenderness of his heart and the warmth of his affections; and while men of the world agree in offering him their homage as among the first of modern philosophers, and theologians place him in the front rank as one of the ablest and most learned of modern divines, it is not the less pleasant to think of him as one of the humblest and most Christ-like of the spiritual men of the eighteenth century.

It is not to be supposed, however, that the religious life even of such a man had not its lights and shadows. When we find an entry like this in his diary: "'Tis just about three years that I have been for the most part in a low sunk state and condition, miserably senseless to what I used to be about spiritual things;" we learn that he also, like most others, had his seasons of insensibility and declension. And tried as he was, in most painful ways—by a return of base ingratitude, for example, for distinguished services—it could not but be that he knew by experience something of the bitterness which the people of God are now and again called to feel, when their Father in heaven seems to hide his face from them, and to leave them to the tender mercies of cruel and ungodly men. This, indeed, is not matter of conjecture merely. After his dismissal from the congregation at Northampton, he wrote to Mr. Gillespie of Carnock, in Scotland, who, on hearing of his difficulties, had not only sent him a letter of sympathy, but with others contributed a sum of money for his support; and the following affecting sentences form part of the communication:—

"I would be far from so laying all the blame of the sorrowful things that have come to pass to the people, as to suppose that I have no cause of self-reflection and humiliation before God, on this occasion. I am sensible that it becomes me to look on what has lately happened as an awful frown of heaven, on me as well as on the people. God knows the sinfulness of my heart, and the great and sinful deficiencies and offences which I have been guilty of in the course of my ministry at Northampton."

If his troubles abounded, however, his consolations did so likewise. In the particular case referred to, he had at once the testimony of his own conscience and the opinion of many good men, that the course actually taken by him was indisputably right; and he went through it with the sweet calmness of one who would humbly dare and suffer anything for the truth. God also finally put his seal to the testimony—cleared the way for him to another sphere of labour, where he had quiet and leisure to prepare four of these works by which the Church has been most edified; and in the end established him, though but for a moment, on an eminence where his character and capacity were conspicuously recognised, and amends so far was made to him for the humiliation of his dismissal. We read with no surprise, yet with deep interest, that during this last period of his earthly pilgrimage—the time of his presidency at Princeton—he seemed to enjoy "AN UNCOMMON DEGREE OF THE PRESENCE OF GOD." MR. B——'S EXPERIENCE.

A STORY FOR THIEVES IN THE CHURCH.

I WAS at work one afternoon in my garden, when a visitor entered, and approached so silently that he stood within a few feet of me before I was aware of his presence.

"You appear to be very busy this afternoon," he said.

I looked up, and was not a little astonished to see standing before me, with an embarrassed air, one of the most worldly-minded and irreverent characters in the village.

"Yes, Mr. B——," I answered; "I was giving these young pea-vines something to climb upon."

"And very busy thinking, also?"

"Yes, neighbour; I was thinking how much we are like these pea-vines. How much we need something to climb upon—a spiritual staff to lift us above the tangles of worldliness."

"Mr. R——," said the visitor, in a choked voice, "I—I am—trying to find such a staff!"

"My brother!" I exclaimed, full of sympathy and joy, "there is but one Staff; that Christ planted for us. We may all rest upon him as a pillar of support, and love, and truth. You have not far to seek—you have only to reach out the tendrils of your heart in aspiration and faith, and they will clasp it. The command is, 'Repent and believe the gospel.'"

He was a middle-aged man, whose hair had grown early grey with worldly cares; whose eyes were unaccustomed to tears, and it was affecting to see that hard face soften and melt at last almost to weeping, as he grasped my hand.

"I have had a strange experience," he said, recovering himself, but still speaking with much emotion. "It began about three weeks ago. I had lately been making some very good bargains, and one night as I was walking home, reckoning up my gains, and feeling a pride and triumph in the start I had got in the world by my own shrewdness and exertions; it was starlight, and very still, I could scarcely hear a noise but the tramp of my horse on the dark road, when suddenly a voice said, 'What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?'"

"Was it actually a voice?" I questioned.

"No; I knew it wasn't at the time. It was, I have no doubt, my own mind. But the expression was just as distinct and as unexpected as if it had been spoken by some person in my ear. The words I probably learned when I was a child, but had forgotten them, and I had to look in the Bible afterwards to see if they were there. I found them, and found a good many things besides, which seemed to have been intended expressly for me to break up entirely my way of life, and trouble all my calculations. The thing has been working in me ever since, and I can't stop its working. I have come to the conclusion that I must be a different man, and live for a different purpose; and I have come to talk with you about it."

Having commenced giving Mr. B——'s story as he related it, I shall continue it in his own words as well as I can remember them. The reader, however, must imagine several weeks to have elapsed since my first conversation with him, and the scene to be changed now to an evening meeting, where Mr. B—— after a long struggle with himself, told his experience.

"I went to talk with the minister," he continued, after having astonished many others as much as he had me, with the repetition of the above narration, "I wanted to get into the Church, where I thought I should be safe. I had no conception of repentance and a change of heart. I supposed our pastor would commence questioning me about doctrines, and so forth, to let me know what I would have to understand and believe before I could become a Church member. But he didn't take any such course. He made me go into the house, and sit down in his study, where he talked with me a long time about the blessedness of an interest in Christ, and its value above all other things of this world, independently of its rewards hereafter. Then he said,—

"Mr. B——, do you know the first thing requisite to be done, if you would be a Christian?"

"I did not know."

"The Christian life—the life of a faithful follower of Jesus Christ—said he, 'can be manifested at first only by repentance. Now it is easy to say we repent of sins, and even to think we repent, but the only repentance that is worth anything is an active repentance—by which I mean not only sorrow for sin, and an earnest desire to avoid it in the future, but one that goes to work, and seeks as far as it is in its power to make amends for every wrong we have done. Is there a person in the world, Mr. B——, who can look you in the face and say you have wronged him?’

“He knew my weak point,” added Mr. B——. “Every man has his weak point, and I suppose the lancet must be applied there first. That question was like sharp-searching steel driven into my soul. I writhed and groaned inwardly, and struggled and perspired a long time before I could answer. I saw it was going to be dreadful hard for me to be a Christian. I meant, however, to get off as easily as I could. So I determined to confess something which I supposed was known to everybody who knows me—my horse-trade with Peter Simmons last spring.

“‘Did you wrong Peter?’ said the minister.

“‘I did a little,’ said I.

“‘How much?’ said he. ‘Tell me honestly.’

“‘I let him have a wind-broken nag that I had doctored up to look pretty well—worth, for actual service, not over ten dollars, and got in return a sound and steady beast worth sixty dollars, and twenty-five dollars to boot. So I honestly think,’ said I, ‘that I cheated him out of about seventy-five dollars.’

“‘And with seventy-five dollars in your possession belonging to poor Peter Simmons, do you think you can commence a life of Christian purity? Do you think that God will hear your prayers for pardon, with stolen money in your pocket?’ said the minister.

“‘I said something about a trade is a trade, and men must look out for themselves when they exchange horses—but he cut me short.

“‘Your own soul,’ said he, ‘will not admit the excuses which your selfishness invents.’

“‘But the rule you apply,’ said I, ‘will cut off the heads of Church members as well as mine. There’s Deacon R——, he trades horses and cheats when he can.’

“‘No matter,’ said he, ‘whose head is cut off; no matter what Deacon R—— does. You have to deal with your own soul, and with your Lord. And I tell you, whether you are out of the Church or in it, a single dollar which you have unjustly and knowingly taken from any man, without rendering him its full value to the best of your ability—a single dollar, I say, will be like a mill-stone hung upon your neck. No test of the reality of faith like active repentance.

“‘I couldn’t stand. The Spirit of God used those words with terrible effect upon my heart. I was greatly agitated. The truth spoken by the pastor appealed to my understanding with irresistible power. I went away, but I couldn’t rest. So I took seventy-five dollars, and went to Peter and paid him—making him promise not to tell anybody, for I was ashamed to have it known that I was conscience stricken, and had paid back money. Then I went to the minister again, and told him what I had done. He didn’t praise me, as I thought he would. He took it as a matter of course, and no more merit in me than it is to wash my hands before I sit down to supper. On the contrary, he seemed to suspect that my hands were not quite clean yet. He wanted to know if I had wronged anybody else besides Peter. I tried to say No, but my conscience wouldn’t let me. I could have told a plumper lie than that once without flinching—yes, and flattered my own heart to believe the lie. I was discouraged. I felt bitterly disheartened. It was, indeed, so much harder being a Christian than I supposed, that I regretted going to talk with the minister at all. Like the young man who had great possessions, I was on the point of going away sorrowful. But my heart burned within me, and I was forced to speak.

“‘In the way of business,’ said I, ‘no doubt I have taken advantage here and there—as everybody does—as Church members themselves do, when they can.’

“‘What everybody does is no rule for you and me, Mr. B——,’ said the minister. ‘It is to be Christians in the fullest sense—not simply to be Church members—that we must strive with all our hearts. The fact of being in the fold does not make the lamb; there are wolves in the fold, alas! but we are by no means justified in doing as the wolves do, even when they appear in sheep’s clothing.’

“‘I felt the rebuke. ‘Well,’ said I, ‘there is Deacon R——. I think he paid me a note twice. The first time he paid it we were transacting other business, and by some mistake the note wasn’t destroyed. I found it among my papers afterwards. I was a good deal excited, and lay awake more than one night thinking what I ought to do about it. The deacon was a hard man, I considered, and took advantage of people when he could. He had driven more than one hard bargain with me.’”

The deacon, who was present and heard these allusions to himself, winced and coughed uneasily. Mr. B—— went on without appearing to mind him.

“‘So,’ said I to the minister, ‘I concluded I would serve the deacon as he would probably have served me under similar circumstances. I kept the note by me a good while, and when I thought the particulars of our settlement had slipped his mind, I said to him one day, maybe he would like to take up that note which had been due then a considerable time. He was surprised, looked excited and angry, said he had paid it, and held out stoutly for a while; but there was the note. There was no proof that it had ever been paid, and finally he took out his pocket-book, and with some pretty hard words, paid it over again, with interest.’

“‘And now,’ said the minister, ‘what are you going to do about it?’

“‘I suppose,’ said I, ‘the money must be paid back.’

“‘So I went to the deacon the next day, told him that on reflection I was convinced that he was right, and I was wrong about the first payment of the note, and returned him the money—one hundred and thirteen dollars—a good deal to his astonishment.”

The deacon coughed and wiped his forehead.

“I hoped then all was right,” continued Mr. B——; “I tried to satisfy my conscience that it was. But I was afraid to go back to the minister, he has such a way of stirring up the conscience, and finding mud at the bottom, when we flatter ourselves that because it is out of sight there is no impurity there. And I knew that as long as I dreaded to see the minister, something must be wrong; and on looking carefully into my heart, I found the little matter of a mortgage which I had foreclosed on a poor man, and got away his farm, when he had no suspicion but I would give him time to redeem it. By that means I had got into my possession property worth two thousand dollars, for which I did not actually pay, and for which Isaac Dorr never actually realized more than half that amount. But the proceeding was entirely legal, and so I tried to excuse myself. But my awakened conscience kept saying, ‘You have taken a poor man’s land without giving him a just return; the law of God condemns you, although the law of man sanctions the wrong. You shall have no peace of soul—your heart will burn you—until with justice you wipe out your own injustice to him and to all others whom you have wronged.’

“Against the decree of my conscience I rebelled a long time. It was hard for me to raise a thousand dollars, together with the interest due from the time the mortgage was foreclosed; and it was like taking a portion of my life to be obliged to subtract so much money from my gains, and give it to a man who had no legal claim upon me. I groaned and mourned over it in secret, and tried to pray—but that mortgage came right up between my prayer and God, and heaven looked dark and frowning through it. At last I could not resist the appeals of conscience any longer, and I went again to the minister, told him my trouble, and asked him what I should do.

“‘Be just to your neighbour,’ he said, ‘if it takes from you the last dollar you have in the world.’

“That was a terrible sentence. I went out staggering from it as if I had received a blow. ‘O God,’ I said, ‘how can I be a Christian?’ But I had help beyond myself, otherwise I could never have ended that struggle. I knelt before God and solemnly vowed for his sake, for the sake of his pardon and love, I would not only do justly to the poor man I had wronged, but would give up, if need be, all I had in the world, so that I might find peace in him. A strange, soothing influence came over my soul, and a voice seemed to say, ‘Though you lose all you have, God and Christ, and the blessings of a heart pure and at peace, shall be left you,—the best and only true source of happiness and life.’ And in the solemn night-time, after I gave up the struggle, that comfort seemed to me so great and precious, that I felt willing, if it would only stay with me, to accept poverty, and go into the world poor and despised, hugging that priceless blessing in my heart. The next day I was light as if I had had wings. Nothing could keep me from going to see Isaac Dorr, with a couple of hundred dollars in my pocket, and a note for the remainder.

“Well,” said the narrator, with tears running down his cheeks, “I only wish that every person here could have seen the Dorr family, when I visited them and made know my errand. Poor Isaac had grown quite discouraged, and had just made up his mind to quit his wife and children, and go to California. His children were crying, and his wife was in an extremity of distress and despair. She received me a great deal better than I anticipated; I had acted according to law, she said, and Isaac was greatly to blame.

“‘Yes,’ said Isaac, with the firmness of a desperate man, ‘it was a savage game you played me, but I was a fool ever to get into debt as I did, and then fancy that any man would not take an advantage when the law permits it. I am ruined in consequence; and here you see this woman and these babies’—

“The poor fellow broke down as he looked at them, and cried like a child.

“‘Isaac,’ said I, as soon as I could speak, ‘I have come to show you that a man can be honest even when the law doesn’t compel him to be. I want to do right, Isaac, because God commands it, and I have come to tell you that you needn’t leave your wife and babies yet, unless you prefer to.’

“‘Prefer to—go off in a strange country and leave them here to suffer?’ he cried, and he caught the children in his arms, and wrung his wife’s hand, and sobbed as if his heart would break.

“Then I counted out the money I had brought, and explained what I intended to do, and gave him the note; and such surprise and happiness I never saw. They would all have kissed my feet if I would have let them. It seemed to me as if heaven was opened then and there—and it was opened in my own heart, with such a flood of light and joy as I had never experienced or thought possible before.

“My friends,” added Mr. B——, his once hard voice now almost as mellow as a woman’s, his cheeks still moist with tears, “I have been constrained to make this confession; I thank you for listening to it. The minister tells me a man may be a Church member and not a Christian. I mean to be a Christian first, and if I fail—” He could proceed no further, but sat down with an emotion more effective than any words.

I have nothing to add to his narrative, except that he became a Church member, and that his example of thorough repentance, of childlike faith in Christ, and of rigorous, practical, every day righteousness, elevated many degrees the standard of Christianity among my people. He looked on himself ever as a poor unworthy sinner, justified only by faith, but very manifestly (as Luther was wont to put it,) his faith was justified in his works.—Watchman and Reflector.

LIGHTS NEAR THE HORIZON.

ANY one accustomed to look at nature with an admiring and observant eye, must know how much unexpected interest and beauty is often given to a landscape by what may be called accidental lights. Suddenly, from an opening in a clouded sky, sunbeams fall on some objects in the distance, perhaps near the horizon itself. Some bold precipice or secluded recess in the mountain chain, some island rock far out at sea, some village on the shore, some cottage on the moor, is strongly lighted up and brought into view, and we exclaim, "How beautiful!" and are ready to long for a nearer inspection of what has become so unexpectedly attractive. Something of the same experience may be often noticed by the thoughtful mind in considering the moral and spiritual prospect around. Ever and anon, by some unlooked for event, places and persons little known before are invested with sudden interest to the eyes of the political or the Christian world. How few knew even the names of the Crimean villages, now familiar to every one, till our brave countrymen found there "glory or the grave!" Who till within the last year thought of mentioning the small rocky island, which posterity will now associate for ever with the fame of the Italian hero who has made it his home! It were easy to multiply such instances, which the memory of every reader can recall.

A light of this description has recently fallen, in the good providence of God, on the northern horizon of the kingdom of Christ on earth, and one of the distant outposts of the mission field. We allude to the intelligence lately brought by some shipwrecked mariners from the Moravian settlements on the coast of Labrador. The narrative is so full of interest, that even such of our readers as may have already heard it will not regret the repetition.

The ship Kitty, in the employment of the Hudson's Bay Company, sailed from London on June 25th 1859, with merchandise for York Factory. The time which should have brought tidings of her again passed over in silence, and many a sorrowing heart watched in hope deferred "to hail the bark that never should return." Only last autumn the intelligence came of how wonderfully some of her crew had been preserved from sharing the fate of most of their companions.

The beginning of the voyage was prosperous, but the ship was damaged in a storm on the 20th July; and early in August the dangers of Arctic navigation began to darken around them. The rudder was broken, and could be only partially repaired; and in one of the rude shocks encountered with the ice, a leak sprung in the stern; so that, besides all other labours, only constant working of the pumps could keep the vessel afloat. While in this disabled condition, on August 24th, they passed near what are called the Middle Savage Islands, and six of the native Esquimaux came off in their kayaks. These were wild, ferocious-looking beings, who appeared never to have seen civilized men before. They wished, apparently, to procure some pieces of iron in exchange for clothing, but at the same time tried to lay hold of everything within their reach. When any one of them had secured an article which he coveted, he would lick it, and then conceal it under his fur jacket, with gestures which showed that it would be dangerous to seek restitution. The weary sailors were thankful when their savage visitors departed.

They struggled on for some days, driven about by the currents, and in constant dread of being crushed by the icebergs. Early in September new leaks had evidently opened, and the danger of the vessel sinking became so imminent that they resolved on abandoning her, as the only hope of saving their lives. On the 6th the captain and ten men entered the long boat, the mate with four others taking a smaller one. They watched their poor vessel as she went down into the icy depths, and then beheld a bitterly cold, snowy, stormy night close over themselves, with feelings which may be better imagined than described. "Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he [in the end] saved them out of their distresses." "Lord, look down upon us!" the mate told afterwards, was his frequent prayer.

They had engaged with each other that the two boats should keep together, and resolved to try the long, perilous course which would bring them to their original destination. But not many days after leaving the ship, when morning dawned after a night of darkness and storm, those in the smaller boat looked in vain for their companions. The long-boat must have gone down, and all on board perished with her.

The five survivors, in their frail bark, were now exposed for many days to such dangers and sufferings as only those who have been in like circumstances can understand. They felt that to attempt reaching York Factory would be hopeless, and determined rather to try for a desolate harbour on the Labrador coast, which by a mistake they supposed to be a French trading station. In the beginning of November they approached a small island, and to their surprise and joy beheld some human beings upon it. Their joy was soon damped when they perceived the figures to be those of Esquimaux. But in their own famishing and exhausted state, they felt as if life could hardly be prolonged another day, and at any risk steered towards the land.

As they drew near, and could see the faces of the natives (who were few in number), their hearts revived, for these men had not the "rapacious, blood-thirsty expression" of those whom they had previously met with. They seemed at once to understand the condition of the unfortunate mariners, and received them with every token of compassion and kindness. Communication by words was impossible, but the Esquimaux hastened to assist them to land, brought them into their little hut, cut the boots off their frozen feet, and wrapped them in soft skins, and produced such provisions as their scanty store afforded. One of the women took the last of their little stock of flour to make some warm gruel. Her infant, for whom it had been intended, held out its little hands for the expected food; but the mother gave the whole to the fainting sailors. One of these, a German, in relating this incident, said that never, in any of the many countries he had visited during a wandering life, had he met with such an instance of genuine hospitality towards total strangers.

When evening came, and the rescued men were lodged in a tent, formed by the help of the Esquimaux out of the boat sail, they discovered the true secret of the reception which had so astonished them. They heard their new friends engaging in sweetly solemn songs of praise, and in prayer, which, though in a strange language, was evidently addressed to no "unknown God." They felt themselves to be among Christian brethren, though of another "nation, and people, and tongue."

A few days afterwards, the wind having moderated, the Esquimaux conducted them to Okak, the nearest missionary station. Here they were received by the good German Moravians with Christian kindness, although at such a season, with all the hardships and privations of a long winter in prospect, the addition of five hungry visitors to their family could hardly be a pleasing circumstance. But we may hear the rest of the story in the missionary's own words:—

"On the 9th of November, the wind being favourable, our people brought them to us. It was indeed distressing to see these five emaciated and half-frozen men. Nor were we without anxious thoughts as to the possibility of providing for so large an addition to our family during the long winter. But if our Saviour should ask us, as he once did his disciples on earth, 'Lacked ye anything?' we should be constrained to reply as they did, 'Nothing.' The Lord also helped us in other respects, and blessed the means made use of, so that four of the sufferers soon recovered. The other man had to get some toes amputated, and is now able to use his feet again. Mr. A—— (the mate) and two of the men were sent further south, to the other missionary settlement, during the winter. The other two remained here, and intend to return to Europe on board the Harmony. They all conducted themselves well, and strove to express their thankfulness for the attentions which they received, by making themselves useful in a variety of ways. They stated that the beautiful singing and solemn prayers of the Esquimaux family on the island, in their morning and evening devotions, made a deep impression on them. They attended our services very regularly, though of course they understood nothing of what they heard. We hope that they have carried with them some impressions which may benefit their immortal souls."

Most of us may already know something of this little church in the wilderness, and how for many years the faithful servants of Christ have laboured on there, far from the comforts of civilized life, in a land of natural desolation, where such a winter storm as we have lately considered so extremely severe and hard to bear, would be reckoned but an ordinary and moderate one out of many to be expected during the stormy season. Their field of spiritual labour is also very limited, and often most unpromising. But do not the incidents just related show that they have not been labouring in vain! It is pleasant to have such a passing glimpse, by this "accidental light," of our far distant brethren in Christ in their northern home. Shall we not henceforward think of them oftener, and pray for them more, if we can do nothing else, to prove our sympathy and "brotherly love?"

ELUCIDATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

No. IV.

"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said, signifying what death he should die" [more exactly, by what kind of death he was going to die].—JOHN xii. 32, 33.

THIS is one of four passages in St. John's Gospel, in which prophetic reference is made to our Lord's crucifixion, and in all of which there is something that looks peculiar. The first, and that which may be said to give the keynote to all the rest, is an utterance of Christ near the commencement of his public ministry, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life" (iii. 14, 15),—an utterance remarkable especially on this account, that from the pre-ordained connection it seems to indicate between the action of Moses and the suspension of Jesus on the cross, it already brings a divine necessity into the very manner of his death. At a later period, and with reference to the instrumental part the Jews were to play in accomplishing the result, our Lord said to them, "When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself" (viii. 28). At a still later, and, with reference to the Gentile or Roman agency needed to give the precise form requisite to the destined event, the Jews are represented as disclaiming the right to put any one to death, and urging Pilate to pronounce the sentence, "that the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled which he spake, signifying by what death he should die" (xviii. 32), namely, that it might take the form of a crucifixion, which was the Roman mode of inflicting extreme punishment on the vilest criminals, not of stoning, which was the Jewish. Between these two last passages stands the one at the head of this paper, which presents, in the most explicit manner, both the saying itself of Christ, and the evangelist's understanding as to the way it was to be accomplished. It is in some sense the most peculiar of the whole; since it couples the lifting up of Christ—that lifting up, from which was to proceed the attractive energy of his grace, drawing toward him, as with magnetic influence, the souls of men in every region of the world, and through every age of time—simply with the slight, and, in a human respect, shameful elevation of the cross, not, as we are apt to think it should rather have been, with his glorious ascension to the right hand of the Father. On this account the passage has been a troublesome one to commentators, and not without embarrassment to thoughtful readers of the gospel, while yet it only requires to be contemplated in the proper light to appear perfectly consistent with the truth of things, and also pregnant with deep spiritual meaning.

To perceive this aright, it is necessary to give due weight to a marked characteristic, which in the largest measure was possessed by Christ, and in various degrees was shared in by all the apostles, but was most fully caught and reflected by the evangelist John. It was the exhibition of the quality referred to, in such peculiar strength, that led the ancients to designate the Gospel of this evangelist "the spiritual Gospel,"—not as if the others were carnal, or as if spiritual elements alone were had respect to in it; but merely because it is more distinctly and more pervasively spiritual in its tone and matter, than any of the others. No one will be disposed to doubt this who reflects, how full and varied is the exhibition presented in this Gospel of things directly pertaining to the Godhead; for example, of the pre-existence and divinity of Christ,—of his intimate communion with the Spirit, and perfect sympathy with the mind and will, of his Father,—of the profound bearing of his work of mediation, as well on the higher purposes of heaven, as on the present and eternal interests of those whom it more directly concerns. But not even in such things does the spiritual element in John's Gospel so remarkably display itself, as in the morally elevated aspect which it delights to throw around the facts of Christ's history—the connection it so often indicates between what outwardly appeared in his life and the unseen realities which belong to the heavenly and divine. He did cures on the Sabbath, not simply because they were works of mercy, but because they were works of God,—the Son must work thus, because the Father was always so working (v. 17). His works generally were in such a sense of God, that their highest aim was to reveal the Father; and to see Christ the doer of them was virtually to see the Father (xiv. 10, 11). His body was so essentially the habitation of Deity, that in its death and resurrection there was the fall and the raising up again of the Temple (ii. 19–21). And bearing still more closely on the subject now under consideration, we have the wonderful and far-reaching statement, in respect to all Christ spake and did on earth, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (i. 14). His plenitude of grace and truth—therein to the eye of the evangelist lay his more peculiar glory. What a look does this bespeak him to have taken into the inner region of things, in order to find the real and essential properties of Christ's greatness! It was not the piercing discernment, the resistless might, the sovereign command over the powers and resources of nature, so often manifested by our Lord, which seemed to the apostle to throw around his career on earth the radiance of a Son-like glory—not these, at least, so much, or so properly, as the grace that led him to clothe himself with compassion for the sinful, to make their case, in a manner, his own, to live, and labour, and die for their recovery from perdition; and the truth, which, in doing this, would abate not a jot of the claims of rectitude, proclaimed afresh Heaven's testimony against sin, and while revealing the unspeakable depth and tenderness of redeeming love, gave not the less unflinching proof of the strength and severity of the divine holiness. Such were the elements of the glory in Christ, that spoke most impressively to St. John's mind of the Father. The merely natural and outward fell comparatively out of sight, or was made account of only in so far as it embodied what was spiritually great and good. And what was thus regarded as the grand distinction of the life of Christ, could not fail to be considered as reaching its culmination in his death. We have but to apply this mode of contemplation to the passage before us, to see its import and suitableness; for its apparent strangeness lies only in its intense spirituality.

One thing, however, must be borne in mind in making the application; it is the ground, as it were, on which this is to be done, namely, the divine necessity that existed for the crucifixion of Christ—not merely for his death, but for his death after this particular mode. The first and fundamental utterance of our Lord on the subject (as already noticed) implies that necessity; not, therefore, a necessity created by the words he spake, but rather giving rise to the words spoken, and itself springing from some inherent fitness in death by crucifixion to accomplish the ends of Christ's mediation. It was strictly a matter of divine ordination, though we can very imperfectly, perhaps, discern the reasons that led to its being so; or say, why it should have been necessary for our Lord to suffer the doom of death thus, rather than in some other ways that might readily be imagined. But so far we can go; we can perceive that the conditions which were required to meet in the death of Jesus, did actually meet in this form of it, beyond any other it is possible for us to conceive. For, first, it was a death emphatically public, one that obtruded itself on the notice of men, ordered as on very purpose to attract their regard; and so there belonged to it in the completest manner the condition of historical certainty—a condition quite indispensable; for all in a manner rests on the death of Christ,—it is the central fact of Christianity, on which everything connected with it turns; and the fullest publicity, for the sake of indubitable certainty, was here of incalculable importance. Then, it was a death not only actually, but most manifestly carrying the deepest shame and agony, such, therefore, as was peculiarly fitted to move the sympathy and affect the hearts of those who contemplate it. And this also was a matter of greatest moment, essential to the accomplishment of the ends for which the Saviour died. Further, it was a death-bearing on its very front a doom of judgment—in the eye and reckoning of man a suffering, in its most aggravated form, of a sentence of condemnation; and as such—what it also behoved to be—the visible sign and reflex of the character it bore, on other accounts, in the reckoning of Heaven. Christ died; he must have died as a curse, because of the guilt that lay on him; and the very form and manner of his death must render it patent to all, that so, and no otherwise, did he finish his course on earth. Finally, as the Roman power bore sway over the world, and Christ's death had an aspect for the world of mankind, it was meet that the earthly, which was to reflect the heavenly judgment, should bear on it the impress of Rome's universality; that, as she was wont to lift up on a cross her vilest criminals as a spectacle of ignominy, and shame, and cursing, so the Redeemer of the sinful world should be lifted up, in visible token of what its sinfulness deserved, and what he endured to have that sinfulness blotted out.

These reasons, at least, we can easily discern, whatever others may have conspired with them, to render the death of Christ by crucifixion necessary,—in the same sense in which anything is necessary, that is fitted, in one specific form rather than another, to suit the design, and work out the purposes, of God. But such being the case, it was in this particular form the choice of Christ himself; Jews and Romans were but the instruments—the unconscious instruments, as regards its real object—of bringing it about. Christ voluntarily laid down his life,—no man could take it from him; and while he suffered himself to be dragged as a sheep to the slaughter, he in reality went to the cross with the full consent of his mind, to drink the cup of sorrow that was due to human guilt, and, as on heaven's high altar, to pour out his life-blood for the redemption of men. Here grace and truth met together in their highest exercise; here the Father was glorified with a perfect glory,—divine righteousness performing its greatest work, divine love giving its noblest sacrifice, that the well-spring of life might be again opened for a justly condemned and perishing world. In a spiritual respect, therefore, the real elevation was here; and so it was viewed by our Lord and his like-minded apostle. The subsequent and formal elevation to the right hand of the Father was but the sequel of that which was attained on the cross of Calvary, and is here comparatively disregarded. It was on the cross that the mighty conflict for the world's redemption was fought and won. It was there that the principalities and powers, which triumphed over man's fall, were for ever spoiled. And there, as on "a high mountain and eminent"—morally the world's noblest elevation—the Lord planted for eternal ages the branch of his own providing, which was destined to grow, and bear fruit, till it received the homage of every tree of the field, and gathered under its boughs fowl of every wing (Ezek. xvii. 23).

Contemplated thus, as it appears to the truly spiritual eye, viewed in necessary connection with the higher purposes of God, as the chosen arena for his more peculiar work, the lifting up on the cross is no longer little; it has a height and a grandeur above all besides, and is at once the ground and the prelude of the glory that was to follow. Hence it is through this appearance and action on the cross, that even the risen power of Jesus, flowing down from the heavenly places, exerts its attractive force upon the souls of men; his Spirit works, through the drawing influence of the cross. Hence, also, even in the midst of his heavenly glory, Christ presents himself to the eye of his apostle as a lamb that had been slain—as if the elevation of Calvary had reached up to heaven, and was still perpetuating itself there (Rev. v. 6). Nor was the evangelist John singular in thus contemplating it. The same aspect substantially is presented by St. Paul when he exclaims, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ;" and when he speaks of Christ crucified as "the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation." Nor can there be a surer and better mark in any one of a spiritual mind than his disposition and capacity to see in the work upon the cross the peculiar manifestation of Messiah's glory,—seeing in it externally, indeed, the deepest humiliation, but spiritually also discerning the grandest conceivable display of whatever is attractive, and holy, and good.

SPIRITUAL DYSPEPTICS.

BY THE REV. T. L. OUYLER.

THERE is a class of weak-handed and feeble-kneed professors in Christ's Church who are self-made invalids. Their spiritual debility is the direct result of their own sins and shortcomings. In their case, as in the physical hygiene, disease is the inevitable punishment of transgression against the laws of health.

Is not the inebriate's bloated and poisoned frame the immediate legacy of his bottle? Is not a shattered nervous system the tormenting bequest which a high-pressure career of sensuality leaves to the transgressor? The indolence which never earns its daily bread, cannot earn the appetite to enjoy it; the gluttony which gorges the stomach is but fattening an early banquet for the worms. Dyspepsia is only God's appointed health-officer, stationed at the gateway of excess, to warn off all who approach it, and to punish those who will persist in entering the forbidden ground. In like manner spiritual disease is the inevitable result of committed sin, or of neglect of religious duty. It requires no profound skill to detect the cause of Mr. A——'s dyspepsia, or Deacon B——'s spiritual palsy, or of poor Mr. C——'s leprosy. How can a Christian be healthy who never works? How can a man's faith be strong who never enters his closet? How can a man's benevolence be warm who never gives? A want of appetite for giving always brings on a lean visage in the Church; but I do like to hear my neighbour M—— pray at the monthly concert, for the fluency of his devotion is quickened by his fluency of purse. He dares to ask God's help in the salvation of sinners, for he is doing his own utmost too. And I have known one resolute, sagacious, Christ-loving woman to do in a mission-school what Florence Nightingale did in the hospitals of Scutari,—that is, teach the nurses how to cure, as well as the sick how to recover.

If this brief paragraph falls under the eye of any spiritual dyspeptic, let us offer to him two or three familiar counsels. My friend, your disease and debility are your own fault, not your misfortune. It is not a "visitation of God," but a visitation of the devil that has laid you on your back, and made you well-nigh useless in the Church, in the Sabbath-school, and in every enterprise of Christian charity. Having brought on your own malady, you must be your own restorer, by the help of the divine Physician. You are not only useless to your pastor, but uncomfortable to yourself. You must get well. Let us tell you how.

1. You need a wholesome diet. Instead of the surfeit of daily newspapers and political journals, or the spiced stimulants of fiction, give your hungry soul the bread of life. Your moral powers are weak for want of nourishment. There has been a starvation of Bible-truth, of sound experimental works, of inspiring religious biography, of "books that are books." Nothing will give sinew and bone to your piety like the thorough reading and thorough digestion of the Bible. All the giants in the history of the Church have been large and hungry feeders on the Bible.

2. You want exercise. God has given you powers, and faculties, and affections to serve him with. But for want of use, those limbs of the soul are as powerless as the bodily limbs of a fever patient who has not left his couch for a fortnight. Never will you recover your appetite for the world and the ordinances, never will the flush of spiritual joy mantle your countenance until you have laid hold of hard, self-denying work. Nothing will impart such earnestness to your prayers as to spend an hour before them by the bedside of the sick, or in close conversation with an inquirer for salvation; nothing will excite a better appetite for a Sabbath sermon than a morning spent in business-like devotion to your Sabbath-school class; and a little uphill work in behalf of some unpopular discouraging movement of reform, will harden your muscle amazingly. Oberlin, Wilberforce, Elizabeth Fry never knew the meaning of "dyspepsia." You are dying from confinement and indolence. There is but one cure for spiritual laziness, and that is—work; but one cure for selfishness, and that is—sacrifice; but one cure for timidity, and that is to plunge into a disagreeable duty before the shiver has time to come on. Some Christians are paralyzed for life by the monomania of fear. They remind us of an invalid who was afflicted by the delusion that he was made of pipe-clay, and if violently struck against any object, he would snap into fragments! He was only cured by a friend who drove him into a meadow and managed to upset the vehicle in the right place. The poor monomaniac shrieked frightfully as the carriage went over; but he rose from the ground sound in mind as well as in body. Would it not be well for those who have trembled for years at the bare thought of a prayer in public, to force themselves into an utterance? They will be amazed to find how one resolute trial, in the strength of God, will break the tyrannous spell for ever. Try! my friend! Lay hold of any dreaded or disagreeable duty and try. God never leaves his child to fail when in the path of obedience; for if the Christian does not succeed in pleasing himself by the method of his performance, he yet pleases God by the sincerity of his good endeavours. And the very attempt to discharge duty will give you strength. When the duty is fairly achieved, the sense of having done it will send an exquisite thrill of satisfaction through the soul, and will be a source of one of the purest joys that you can know this side of heaven. I question whether we ever realize a sweeter delight than when we stand beside some heaven-directed undertaking fairly accomplished, or some painful task nobly wrought out—some trying testimony manfully borne, or some bitter persecution fairly weathered out into the repose and sunshine of victory. Such joys the half-hearted, cowardly, dyspeptic Christian never experiences. The "weak hand" plucks no such chaplet. The "feeble knees" reach no such goal of triumph. They are awarded only to the vigorous of spiritual sinew, to the Bible-reader, and the Bible-worker too! Dyspeptic brother! we commend to you the double remedy—Bible-diet and Bible-duty; if these do not restore you, we fear your case is past all medication.

THRONGING AND TOUCHING.

"SOMEbody hath touched me." He knew the difference; He distinguished at once, as by a divine instinct, that believing one from the unbelieving many. There was that in her which put her in connection with the grace, the strength, the healing power which were in Him. Do you ask me what this was? It was faith; it was her faith. She came expecting a blessing, believing a blessing, and so finding the blessing which she expected and believed; she came saying, as we just now heard, "If I may touch but his clothes, I shall be whole." But that careless multitude who thronged the Lord, only eager to gratify their curiosity, and to see what new wonder he would next do, as they desired nothing, expected nothing from him, so they obtained nothing. Empty they came, and empty they went away. It may very well have happened that among that crowd there were more than one sick and suffering, holden with some painful infirmity or inveterate disease; but there went forth no virtue from the Lord to them. And why not? Because they thronged him, and did not touch him; because faith, which is as the electric wire along which the spark of divine healing should have run, was wanting on their parts; and because, therefore, their contact with the Lord was merely external and accidental, and had in it no real significance whatever.

O my brethren, is there not here the explanation of much—of only too much—in the spiritual lives of men,—the explanation of barren sacraments, of fruitless prayers, of church-going, sermon-hearing, which, after twenty or thirty years, leave us where they found us, not a whit holier, not a whit more conquerors of our sins or masters of our corruptions, not a step nearer to God and heaven, than we were at the beginning? We are of the many that throng Jesus, not of the faithful few who touch him. We bear a Christian name, we go through a certain round of Christian duties; we are thus brought outwardly in contact with the Lord; but we come waiting for no blessing, and so obtaining no blessing. We enter his house, and we never say, "How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and the gate of heaven." We walk with Him by the way, but we never so commune with him that our hearts burn within us. We approach his table, but not saying to ourselves, "The Lord has appointed to meet me here, that he may dwell with me and I in him; and I will be satisfied with no blessing short of this." In everything there is coldness, formality, routine. Faith is wanting—faith, the divine hunger of the soul, the emptiness of the soul longing to be filled, and believing that it will be filled, out of God's fullness. And because this is so, therefore there goes out no virtue from him to us; it is never given to us so to touch him as that immediately we know in ourselves that we are whole of our plague.

You who complain—you who, it may be, murmur that the ordinances of God's Church are so little fraught with grace and strength for your souls, is it not at least possible that the explanation of all this barrenness and unprofitableness may be here, in the fact that you have been thronging Christ, and not touching him? Only come to him now, saying, "If I may but touch him, I shall be whole." Only come looking for good, and you will find good; expecting mercy, and you will obtain mercy; bringing your heart to be healed, and it shall be healed. When you read, when you meditate, when you hear, when you pray, when you partake of the holy communion, so do it that Christ shall be compelled to say—and, believe me, he will rejoice in the compulsion—"Somebody hath touched me." He will not now need to turn round and to inquire who hath done this thing. He will have seen thee afar off—thy first timid approaches to him, thy nearer and bolder advances, the faith which brought thee at length into immediate contact with him. He was only waiting for this, that so virtue might go forth from him to thee; and thou, who camest fearing and trembling—who camest, it may be, behind him, as hardly daring to own either to thyself or others what thou wert looking for from him—shalt go away strengthened, reassured, healed, an open confessor of the faith; boldly declaring in the face of all what God hath done for thy soul, as this woman declared what he had done for her body; thou, too, whole of thy plague, thine iniquity pardoned, and the ever-flowing fountain of thy sin and thy corruption stayed.—Dean Trench.

You may see in this suffering an answer to prayer. How often have you asked to "grow in faith, and love, and every grace!" How often have you prayed that self might be crucified, and Christ become all in all!—that your eyes might be "turned away from beholding vanity," and so fixed upon the Author and Finisher of the faith, that you might be changed into the "same image from glory to glory!" How have you longed that the chains which bind you to earth might be broken, and your spirit set free to soar towards heaven!—and God has heard your prayer. He is answering it, not as you thought he would do, but in the way that is best for you. Yield yourself to him. The "bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench." Do not fear; he is leading you aright, even by the way that he himself has gone before, for "he himself went not up to joy, but first he suffered pain. He entered not into his glory before he was crucified. So, truly, our way to eternal joy is to suffer here with Christ, and our door to enter into eternal life is gladly to die with Christ, that we may rise again from death, and dwell with him in everlasting life."†

Perhaps, too, you have asked for work,—you have said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" And God has heard. He has said, "I will show thee how great things thou must suffer." He has given you work, and with it he has given weakness. You could not bear the one without the other, for you would have grown proud and independent, and been in danger of working for self, and not for him. It is pleasant to be busy, to feel that we are important and useful,—pleasant to work off in action the surplus energy of our nature. And so our service is often not pure. It springs from mingled motives. But God will not have it so with you. He will have a pure offering from you, even though it is given with tears. Do not, then, murmur, but rather give him thanks that he has counted you worthy of this calling. Pray that you may "work all your works in God," and that the "thorn in the flesh," which he has appointed you, lest you should be "exalted above measure," may accomplish the purpose for which it is sent.

DAVID SANDEMAN.

PART SECOND.

HIS STUDENT AND MISSIONARY LIFE.

IT was whilst prosecuting his training for business in Manchester, that David Sandeman's thoughts first earnestly turned towards the Christian ministry. The purpose seems insensibly to have grown out of the desire to dedicate himself more entirely to the work of saving souls. He had no disinclination to mercantile pursuits, nor did he so misconceive of any profession as to suppose that it could not be made available for the glory of his Lord, but he felt that the Christian ministry, like the angelic host, waited to serve, and that what with others could be but an occasional joy, belonged always to the ministry—to speak to souls. On leaving Manchester, with a view to the commencement of his studies, he thus sums up his thoughts: "I find new opportunities every day at the warehouse of speaking a word in season; the longer there the more such seem to open. I will leave the profession deeply convinced of the many opportunities afforded the merchant, if he has the true wish, of glorifying the Lord. Yet is the ministry more honourable, and still more opportunities are found in it."

In passing from Manchester to Edinburgh, David Sandeman entered into a new circle of life and duty. Business was henceforth exchanged for study—a life of action for one of thought. Knowledge and faith are not twin growths. The hour that lights the student's lamp has oftentimes obscured the Christian's faith. His understanding has grown at the expense of his affections, his speculative mind at the sacrifice of his childlike confidence. David Sandeman had happily eaten of the tree of life that is in the midst of the paradise of God before he sat down before the tree of knowledge to pluck its fruits of good and evil. Amidst the attractions of new studies we shall find his heart fixed. He drinks, but is not intoxicated by the cup. Writing in the throng of his college duties, he can still say, "Though my time is at present much engrossed by study, being engaged to-day from half-past seven A.M. till ten at night, yet the Lord showed me that he is able to keep my heart in peace with him; for often during my studies I was able to lift up my soul in calm resting upon him. It is not a boisterous joy, nor even elation, but a calm quiet which seems to pervade every feeling of my soul. I think I can trace this to my being more in prayer while at college and in the various classes. Let this be an encouragement to me to strive to live in prayer; and in order to this let me ever remember not to begin the business of any class till I have prayed to the Lord to keep me and to bless to me what I learn while there."

As a student, David Sandeman was distinguished more by industry than brilliancy of talent, or force or originality of mind. Grace led him to seek the development of all his powers with intense energy. Though not naturally of quick apprehension, nor possessed of remarkable abilities, his indomitable perseverance and singleness of purpose enabled him to excel in his college studies students of higher gifts. In several of his classes he gained marked honours. What is still more worthy of our notice, there was no perceptible abatement of spiritual feeling during the years of his student's life. He was not less the prayerful, simple minded, practical working believer when he studied at Edinburgh, than when he cast up accounts or turned over bales of cotton goods in the Manchester warehouse. The secret of his sustained, simple, ardent faith amidst studies in which not a few have made shipwreck, and more have for a season been chilled into religious indifference, is to be found in his rule: "To study all day in the presence of Jesus." Whether it were Locke's Philosophy or Calvin's Institutes, Macintosh's Dissertations or Edwards on the Will, Hume's Argument against Miracles or Owen's Treatises, Demosthenes or Milton, he made it a rule first to pray over the book and then to endeavour to use it for his Master. In his note-book he has penned in large letters, Eternity! Eternity! adding, "Let me act more as if I were now in the next world, looking back to see how I should have acted for the glory of Jesus. As D. Brainerd says, 'Oh, to live on the verge of eternity! would that I could continually dwell on its sides, in studying and following out every avocation!'"

With what fervour for service would our young divines come forth from their studies; how unscathed from their passage through speculative philosophy and theology, were the rule of David Sandeman inscribed on every study wall as the working rule of the student, "To study all day in the presence of Jesus."

That his studies took a wide and liberal range is seen in the following extract from his journal: "I must seek this summer to give myself thoroughly to study mechanics, algebra, and trigonometry, Latin, and Greek. I intend, also, to keep up my French and German, and to add occasionally two hours of the Hebrew Bible." The correctness of his critical judgment, and his power of literary appreciation, are admirably seen in the following remarks. Having been perusing one of Schiller's works, he writes: "Find that the ideas of truly great minds move on much in the same way as the grand in nature. The works of nature do not lead one directly away from God, but rather tend to bring one into the posture of a silent worshipper. Works of art, if very magnificent, may have the same tendency, but ordinarily the truth of God must be called to mind, in order to put those in their proper place. Engrossed and more than delighted with Chalmers. Among other things he measures out so palpably for one the littleness of his own mind and contractedness of his own heart. Was led to give God thanks for creating such a spirit among the sons of men, and for bending that spirit to seek his glory as his highest aim. Two or three hours of Demosthenes. Struck with the directness of his style of address: no swerving aside for mere declamation, no mere flowers of ornament,—every word and sentence bears directly and potently on the point which he wishes to carry. His lofty and fervid tone has an elevating effect. Read Calvin's Institutes. Mind almost sensibly expanded in reading—the ordinary effect of reading that noble author.”

His occasional characteristics of his Christian friends in his journal are as discriminating as his judgment on authors and their works. Who will not recognise his portrait of Hewitson of Dirleton, and thank him for it, when he writes, “My soul is much drawn towards that beloved minister of Jesus. He struck a chord of sympathy in my nature last night which may vibrate for many days. Naturally, he is the most etherial and spirit-like man I have met. Singular lucidity of thinking, great love of generalization, and a most metaphysical cast of thought. He defines and shades away thoughts with much skill, and has great command of classical expression. He spoke of desiring to have thoughts as capacious as the ocean, yet containing millions of drops of truth. The imagery of his mind is all of the same refined and poetic kind, and stands out as the branches of a leafless tree seen against the sky in winter. When he speaks one is rivetted; intellect and imagination are on the stretch, and I have sometimes felt with him that thrill which thoughts of a certain depth produce on kindred souls. He lives altogether in a strangely elevated atmosphere.”

Amidst the variety of David Sandeman's studies and his intensity in their prosecution, the Word has still in all things the pre-eminence. Among other lights it is not obscured; it holds its place as his bright and morning star. Is a new year ushered in? his resolution is, “A good portion of the best part of my time to be devoted to secret prayer, and to a close and constant reading, and to deep and prayerful meditation and study of the Holy Scriptures.” Is he tossed during a sleepless night? he arises, strikes a light, and fills his soul “with thoughts of God from God's own word, and then lies down again.” When he returns from his class to his lodgings, it is to spend his first half-hour with the word, or to note, that he may deepen his own reverence for it, that Ecclapadius delighted in the Old Testament Scriptures, “at present my own pasture-ground.” Has Sabbath come round? It brings with it its evening spent in reading the Old Testament in the Hebrew, “that grave, beloved language.” Is he a wanderer amidst some of the picturesque scenes of his own Perthshire Highlands? whilst he fills his soul with the grandeur of the scenery of Glen Tilt, as a fit companion to it, the word is in his hands, and his pen records, “Can read nothing but the word; it is my morning, noon, and night portion.” Is he watchful to gather from his intercourse with others hints that may turn to his personal profit? he catches, as the utterance of his own spirit, the petition from the lips of a friend, and adopts it as his own: “Lord, cast me into the mould of thy word.”

With this best preparation for the ministry—a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures—he entered upon its duties. Immediately on receiving license to preach the gospel, he is found in charge of the preaching station of the Free Church at Hillhead, about three miles from Glasgow, where, though his ministry was brief, it was blessed to some souls. The eloquence that stirs men's hearts was not his gift; yet there was something in the man, as a preacher, that drew attention. His figure his biographer describes as tall and commanding; the profile of his countenance regular; his eye black and full; his voice clear and powerful; his utterance somewhat measured, and never rapid. But it was not in these things his real strength lay; it was in “laying up vials of prayer, which were afterwards poured down in blessing.” Literary qualifications he felt were not his arms; they were only, as he himself remarked, the polishing and ingenious ornament on the hilt and flat side of the sword,—they had nothing to do per se with the edge of the weapon.

Three short months closed the ministry he had begun at Hillhead. For five or six years he had cherished the desire to join the mission in China. As often as the purpose was laid aside it came back like a tide rushing in full force. It was not worldly considerations that arrested his decision. It was the balancing of the foreign with the claims of the masses of home heathenism that for a season suspended his resolution. A less earnest, devoted man might, in his circumstances, have found an excuse for personally declining the foreign service. He had wealth to do his missionary work by proxy, if he could have satisfied himself that his work could have been so done. The agent for China was at his command, and the means for his support; but nothing less would satisfy David Sandeman but personal consecration to the mission cause.

More than thirty years ago, narrates his biographer on the authority of an American writer, two young gentlemen, while travelling in opposite directions, met at a brook, and, as their horses were drinking, the elder addressed the younger about his soul's eternal interests. They soon parted; but those faithful words were by the blessed Spirit made the means of leading the younger traveller to the Saviour. That young man was Champion, the idol of his family, for he was an only son, the but bearing his father's name, and already the possessor of great wealth. No sooner was he saved than he consecrated himself to the missionary service, and chose as his sphere Africa, as the most benighted and neglected of countries. His father opposed his son's resolution of becoming a missionary, and proposed to support twenty missionaries out of his ample means, if only he personally would stay at home. "No," was his calm reply; "the Saviour left richer possessions and sacrificed his life for me; I cannot stay." Champion lived to labour five years in Africa, devoting all his property to the cause of missions. Often did he desire to know who that stranger was that had addressed him by the brook side, but he could get no clue to it, till one day, in Africa, he opened the memoir of J. Brainerd Taylor, just sent out to him from home. His eye fell on the likeness prefixed to the memoir, and instantly he knew who it was that had been the means of saving his soul. If David Sandeman had not so large a fortune as Champion, it is in his spirit he replies when some one having made reference to the delightful scenery and sweet dwelling which might have been his, his immediate answer was, "Can any one suppose that that could make any difference? Ah, those many mansions! that city that hath foundations! These things look solid and substantial, but they shall all pass away." There was no staggering in his purpose. It was sealed with those decisive words, "Surely my whole soul closes with my master's call."

The beginning of 1857 found him at Amoy, day and night intent on the acquisition of the Chinese language. In the month of May he is already trying his new acquisition, sitting with a Chinese father and his three sons under the shade of a spreading tree, attempting to say a little about Christ. In February of the following year he ventured to speak for the first time to about a dozen Chinese in a village. Meantime, whilst devoting himself to the language, he visits the Seaman's Hospital, and watches for opportunities of speaking to sailors of British and American ships. He narrowly observes the effects on society, British and Chinese, of the coolie and opium traffic, and, as he writes home, denounces the opium trade as the shame of England and the antagonist of missions. It is an irksome task, even with all necessary means at hand, to learn a difficult language. But the end, with our devoted missionary, smoothes the roughness of the way, and makes the toil as nothing, as he pleasantly tells us in his beautiful application to himself of the experience of Jacob: "As his time seemed short because of the love he bore to Rachel, my months pass sweetly and quickly over, because of the love of the divine Master." Alas! the instrument he is so diligent in acquiring, and to attain which he counts all "toil pleasure," it is not the will of the divine Master he should use for his glory. Enough,—like David, he has prepared the materials for a temple. The Lord has need of him in his own heavenly temple, to serve him day and night, where, though the worshippers be ten thousand times ten thousand, their tongues are one.

An attack of cholera, which lasted only twenty hours, called him, at the close of a busy week, to his rest. He was always ready, and, when his hour came, he had but to testify of a faith in which he had long rejoiced, and of a hope that was full of glory. The thought of an early close to his ministry he had often contemplated. "Death," he had written some years before, "should take none of the Lord's chosen by surprise, any more than the entrance into the room of a child should a mother, or the sound of the horses' tread, at the ordinary hour, of her husband's carriage, should a loving wife, on his return from labouring for her welfare. The surprise should be, why tarry the wheels of his chariot." Though sudden, the summons was neither unexpected nor startling. When asked by a friend what at that moment gave him confidence, his brief, characteristic reply was, "From head to foot, righteousness." To the question if he had any message to leave for his friends, "Yes," was his answer, "tell my mother I thought of her, because she taught me the way to Jesus." Happy mother, to be so comforted by a dying son! But for one thing he still cleaved to life. When asked by his medical attendant if he wished to live for the sake of preaching the gospel to the Chinese, "Ay, that is it!" he exclaimed. But, denied length of days, he offered what he could, and devoted his property to the Chinese mission. Like the great and good Schwartz, who, on dying, dictated his will in those few, but memorable words, "I leave the Church of Christ in India my heir," David Sandeman, who had yielded first himself to the work, did not withhold his substance. Is not the life more than meat? Confirming on his death-bed an arrangement he had made before leaving home, he bequeathed "one-eighth of his property to the spread of the gospel at home, and seven-eighths for the spread of the gospel in China." He died as he lived, calling nothing that he had his own,—a sublime example, in life and death, of self-consecration.

"The brightest star of morning's host,
Scarcely risen, in brighter beams is lost,—
So sprang his soul to light."

HOURS WITH LIVING PREACHERS.

I.—IS CHRIST AN AVAILABLE CONSOLATION FOR ME?

Who art thou, friend? Art thou one who needs no consolation? Hast thou a righteousness of thine own? Let me put it in thine own words. You are a good man, kind to the poor, charitable, upright, generous, holy. You believe there may be some faults in yourself, but they must be very few, and you trust that what with your own merits and with God's mercy you may enter heaven. In the name of God, I do solemnly assure you, that Christ is not an available consolation for you. Christ will have nothing to do with you, so long as you have anything to do with yourself. If you are trusting in any measure whatever upon aught that you have ever done or hope to do, you are trusting in a lie, and Christ will never be friends with a lie. He will never help you to do what he came to do himself. If you will take his work as it is, as a finished work, well and good; but if you must needs add to it your own, God shall add unto you the plagues which are written in this book, but he shall by no means give to you any of the promises and the comforts which Christ can afford.

But instead thereof, I will suppose that I address myself this morning to a man who says, "I was once, I think, a believer in Christ; I made a profession of religion, but I fell from it, and I have lost for years all the hope and joy I ever had; I think I was a presumptuous man, that I pretended to have what I never had, and yet at the time I really thought I had it. May I think that there is consolation in Christ for a backslider and a traitor like me? Often, sir, do I feel as if the doom of Judas must be mine—as if I must perish miserably, like Demas, who loved this present world." Ah! backslider, backslider, God speaks to thee this morning, and he says, "Return, ye backsliding children of men, for I am married to you;" and if married, there has never been a divorce between Christ and you. Has he put you away? Unto which of his creditors has he sold you? Where do you read in his word that he has divided from the affection of his heart one whose name was ever written in his book? Come, come, backslider, come again to the cross. He who received you once will receive you again. Come where the blood is flowing; the blood that washed you once can wash you yet once more. Come, come, that art naked, and poor, and miserable; the raiment which was given to thee once shall array thee again with beauty. The unsearchable riches which were opened up to thee aforetime shall be thine again.

"To thy Father's bosom pressed,
Once again a child confessed,
From his hand no more to roam,
Come, backsliding sinner, come."

But I hear another say, "I am not a backslider, but simply one who desires to be saved. I can say honestly, I would give my right arm from its socket if I might but be saved. Why, sir, if I had ten thousand worlds I would freely cast them away as pebble stones, and worthless, if I might but find Christ." Poor soul; and does the devil tell thee thou shalt never have Christ? Why, thou hast a warrant to lay hold on Christ to-day. "No," sayest thou, "I have no right whatever." The fact that thou sayest thou hast no right should at least comfort the minister in addressing himself freely to thee. The right of a sinner to come to Christ does not lie in the sinner, nor in any feelings which the sinner may have had; it lies in the fact that Christ commands him to come. If one of you should receive, as you went out of yonder door, a command to go at once to Windsor and have an interview with the Queen, as soon as you had received the order and were sure it came from her, you might say, "Well, but if I had known this, I should have put on other clothes;" but the order is peremptory, "Come now; come just as you are," you would, I think, without any very great doubt, though greatly wondering, take your place and ride there at once. When you came to the gate, some tall grenadier might ask you what you were at. "Why," he might say, "you are not fit to come and see her Majesty; you are not a gentleman; you have not so many hundreds a-year; how can you expect to be admitted?" You show the command, and he lets you pass on. You come to another door, and there is an usher there. "You are not in a court dress," says he; "you are not properly robed for the occasion." You show the command, and he lets you pass on. But suppose when at last you should come into the ante-room you should say, "Now I dare not go in; I am not fit; I feel I shall not know how to behave myself." Suppose you are silly enough not to go, you would be disobedient and ten times more foolish in disobeying than you could have been by any blunders in behaviour if you had obeyed. Now, it is just so with you to-day. Christ says, "Come unto me." He does not merely invite you, because he knows you would think you did not deserve the invitation; but he gives the command, and he bids me say to you, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you;" he bids me command you in his name, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Of his grace and mercy he puts it as a command. "But," you say. Ah! what right have you to say "but" to the Lord's commands? Again, I say, away with your "buts." What right have you to be "butting" at his laws and his commands. "But," you say, "do hear me for a moment." I will hear you then. "Sir, I cannot imagine that if such a hard-hearted sinner as I am were really to trust Christ I should be saved." The English of that is, that you give God the lie. He says you shall be, and do you think he speaks an untruth? "Ah!" says another, "but it is too good to be true. I cannot believe that just as I am, if I trust in Christ, my sin shall be forgiven." Again, I say, the simple English of that is, that you think you know better than God; and so you do in fact stand up and say to his promise, "Thou art false." He says, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." "Ah!" you say, "but that does not mean me!" Can any language speak more plainly? "Him." What him? Why, any "him" in the world.

"Yes," says one, "but the invitations are made to character—'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden;' I am afraid I am not heavy laden enough." Yes, but you will mark, while the invitation is given to character, yet the promise is not given to the character; it is given to those who come—"Come unto me, and I will give you rest;" and while that one invitation may be confined to the weary and heavy laden, yet there are scores of others that stand as wide and free as the very air we breathe. If you have that qualification, do not come even with it, because you are unqualified when you think you are qualified; you are unfit when you think you are fit; and if you have a sense of need, which you think makes you fit to come to Christ, it shows you are not fit and do not know your need; for no man knows his need till he thinks he does not know his need, and no man is in a right state to come to Christ till he thinks he is not in a right state to come to Christ. But he who feels that he has not one good thought or one good feeling to recommend him, he is the man who may come. He who says, "But I may not come," is the very man that is bidden to come. Besides, my friends, it is not what you think or what I think, it is what Christ says; and it is not written by the hand of the apostle John, "This is the commandment, that ye believe on Jesus Christ whom he hath sent?" Men who say it is not the duty of sinners to believe, I cannot think what they make out of such a text as that, "This is the commandment, that ye believe on Jesus Christ whom he hath sent;" and that one where God expressly says, "He that believeth not is condemned already, because he believeth not." Why, I should think I was addressing heathens, if I addressed a company of men who thought that God did not command men to repent; for Scripture is so plain upon the point, and I say, if God commands thee to do it, thou mayest do it. Let the devil say "Nay," but God says "Yea." Let him stand and push you back, but say to him, "Nay, Satan, nay, I come here in God's name;" and as devils fear and fly before the name of Christ, so will Satan and thy fears all fly before his command. He commands thee to believe, that is, to trust him. Trust him, soul, trust him; right or wrong, trust him.

But some of you want a great temptation, and a great deal of despair, before you will trust him. Well, the Lord will send it to you, if you will not trust him without it. I remember John Bunyan says he had a black temptation, and it did him a great deal of good; for, said he, "Before I had the temptation I used always to be questioning a promise, and saying, 'May I come, or may I not come?'" But at last he said, "Yea, often when I have been making to the promise, I have seen as if the Lord would refuse my soul for ever: I was often as if I had run upon the pike, and as if the Lord had thrust at me, to keep me from him as with a flaming sword." Ah! and perhaps you may be driven to that. I pray you may; but I would infinitely rather that the sweet love and grace of God would entice you now to trust Jesus Christ just as you are. He will not deceive you, sinner; he will not fail you. Trusting him, you shall build on a sure foundation, and find Him who is the consolation of Israel and the joy of all his saints. —Spurgeon.

II.—RESTRAINT OF CHRISTIAN INTERCOURSE.

How much is often lost between those whose feelings as well as duty would draw them most closely together. There are the poor of Christ's heritage needing and thirsting for instruction in doctrine and guidance of life; but shy of intruding on the studies or occupations of their minister, of occupying his time, or of taking the first word in talking of the subjects which are nearest to their hearts. And there are pastors, men of prayer and meditation, earnest in character, abounding in the richest treasures of things new and old, which befit the scribe instructed to the kingdom of God,—men, who, but for one deficiency, might evangelize the world;—longing to pour forth the emotions of their hearts as well as the stores of their intellects; but wanting the power to doff the wrappings of conventional reserve, and to place themselves heart to heart, as well as face to face, with the immortal beings who will rise beside them in the day of the Lord. And thus, the step is not made; the ice is not broken; time after time their communings fall short of the point from which all would be sure to flow on full and clear;—and they part, strangers as before; nay, more estranged, because they part with a sense of recoil on both sides. But if the mischief is on both sides, judge ye on which side is the greater responsibility!

And is not the same evil at work, under a slightly modified form, even in this spot, from which the Church's and nation's teachers are from year to year issuing forth? Nay, is it not rather here that the harmful influence is imbibed? Would it be so widely felt throughout the land, were it not first felt here? For here, too, there is the same general relation between the teacher and the taught, the pastor and the disciple. They are drawn together by every impulse of love and sense of duty; but they are kept apart by the repulsion of etiquette and conventionality, by constraints of feeling and reserves of manner. Does the teacher always in such intercourse sufficiently remember that he was once himself a pupil? Does the pupil sufficiently feel that his teacher may yet retain enough of fresh feelings and youthful impulses to understand his? Do both sufficiently grasp and use the fact that there is this point of contact between their spirits;—the fact, that the points of difference and separation which thrust themselves forward, are stamped even by this very obtrusiveness, as being things external and accidental; but that the inner reality is, that heart beats to heart in Christian love? Sad indeed it is that between such classes, among such persons, we may see Christian love hidden by a mask of coldness on the one part and shyness on the other,—perhaps of stern authority on one, and jealous independence on the other. And as time passes and opportunities slip away, the younger go forth from hence without the impression which might have been made for good on their ductile minds at a turning point of life; the elder go on striving, but with ineffectual efforts—carried round and round in a cycle of disappointment; and the flowers drop, one by one, from coronals which might have bloomed in Paradise.

If we did but look on those who are intrusted to our charge, not merely in a strict and hard way, as persons for whom we have to give account, but as those who are the helpers of our joy; if they did but look on us, as watching, not merely over them, but for them, loving them, yearning towards them; if each looked on the other as his joy and crown at the coming of the Lord Christ Jesus;—how different the face of the Church of God would be; how differently would the Lord's work be done, as by those who felt themselves no longer servants, but friends (John xv. 15).

Where then do the difficulty and the evil reside?

Not often, I trust and believe, in a want of zeal and affection in those who stand in a pastoral relation to others. Not often in any want of amiability, or any contumacious independence on the part of the disciples. Still more rarely, we may hope, in recklessness on the one hand or profligacy on the other. But commonly in the want of a mutual understanding, the want of openness in those who ought to be beyond all others confidential with one another. We want faith. This is the secret of our shrinking. We want faith, and therefore we suspect others of a want of love. Men have not the courage to unbosom themselves, for fear of meeting with coldness or ridicule. And each watches in vain for the first tokens of that affection which he dares not be the first to offer, though he would return it with his whole heart. And they are kept apart by this false shame. Both lose what they need and crave. Both are hardened and grow suspicious. And perhaps the suspicions of both in time make themselves true;—the openness of youth clouded with premature craft; the influence of riper years lost in selfish cowardice. And thus pastor and flock, teacher and pupil, are estranged; a blessing is changed into a curse; and when they have to give account, it must be done by both with grief, it must be unprofitable for both.

Oh, for one breath—were it but one—of the apostle's spirit, to whisper to teacher and pupil, to clergy and laity, of the joy and glory which they are casting away, and bartering for shame and confusion of face in the day of their account, by reason of this false shame which separates them now,—now, when each might help the other, alike by secret prayer and by mutual interchange of comfort; the one confiding their difficulties, their doubts, their temptations; the other guiding, cheering, helping along the better way, stretching out the hand to steady the wavering, or raise the fallen;—and these too, we may be well assured, receiving at least as much, in support and comfort and blessing, as they give!

Oh, for the courage to despise the scoffing of fools; or rather and better still, to believe in the warm and healthy feelings which need but to be evoked to put all scoffing to silence and shame! Would that, for our uncircumcised lips and stammering tongue, a mouth were given us to utter the words of the apostle which have so often kindled a fire in our hearts, "Our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged. Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels. Now for a recompence in the same, (I speak as unto my children,) be ye also enlarged" (2 Cor. vi. 11-13).

And this might yet be so, if we all realized more fully that we are bound together not for this world only; that our accounts are to be rendered together; and that in the next world we are doomed to be either the glory or the shame of one another. It is but a nightmare that paralyzes us. We have only to move a finger, and it is at an end. But the finger is not moved, and the spell remains unbroken.—Robert Scott, D.D. (Sermons preached before the University of Oxford.)

ELUCIDATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

No. III.

THE EMBLEMATICAL IMPORT AND USE OF FIRE.

THERE is a very frequent use in Scripture, as the most careless reader can scarcely fail to perceive, of the element of fire as an emblem of things spiritual and divine; and in the great majority of cases there is no proper room to doubt in what sense it is employed. The commonest understanding must perceive that it symbolizes the severer aspect of the divine character—the holiness of God, or the effect of that holiness upon the state and prospects of those who are at enmity to it. Thus, when God is represented as "a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 29; Isa. xxxiii. 14)—when he descended in fire on Mount Sinai, accompanied with blackness, and darkness, and tempest—when in vision he appeared to the psalmist with "fire out of his mouth devouring, by which coals were kindled" (Ps. xviii. 8)—to Daniel with "a fiery stream issuing before him" (vii. 10)—to Habakkuk with "burning coals going under his feet" (iii. 15)—as also when, with respect to the future, he is spoken of as going "to be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God" (1 Thess. i. 8),—in these, and many similar passages, it is plainly God's relation to the enemies of his truth and kingdom, his holy indignation against their sins, and his purpose to execute upon them the judgment they have provoked, which is imaged by the fiery element in the descriptions. What this element is in the field of nature—searching, resistless, consuming—such is Jehovah in the manifestation of his character as the Holy One to those who are living, or who have died, in unrighteousness.

But is the symbol always so employed in Scripture? Are there not other aspects also of the divine character and working imaged by it? So it is not unusually imagined; and in the current explanations given of several important passages fire is taken as a symbol either of God himself generally, or of the gracious operations of his Spirit among men. It is possible that in such explanations nothing may be brought out which is contrary to the great doctrines of the Bible, or even directly at variance with what is taught in the particular passages themselves. But still, the passages in question can scarcely have their precise and proper meaning ascribed to them. For the language of symbol, like the spoken language of ordinary life, has its own rules of interpretation; it cannot be taken arbitrarily, so as to mean one thing here, and another thing, essentially different, elsewhere. A properly used symbol, like a well-defined word, however variously applied, must always retain its fundamental import; and since, in the more numerous and plainer passages of Scripture in which fire occurs as a symbol, it represents the divine holiness in its bearing on the state and destinies of man, we may hold it for certain that the representation is not materially different in other passages where the image is employed.

Thus, when God appeared to Moses at Horeb under the emblem of a fiery bramble—a bush burning yet not consumed—it is not enough to say that the Lord was in the bush, and the fire which there burned without consuming was the symbol of his presence in the Church. It was this, no doubt; but also something more—there was a special fitness in the particular symbol employed to the precise circumstances of the time, and the prospects now to be opened to the mind of Moses. And this it had simply as the emblem of the divine holiness, which wrought then among the covenant people (represented by the bush), as with the severity of a refiner's heat to purge out the dross of sin, and render those who were not consumed in the process partakers of the holiness of God, and, as such, fortified with divine power against the adversaries of their peace. It told Moses that God, as the righteous One, was in those tribulations which his people were enduring in Egypt; and that, if the effect corresponded to the design, the members of the covenant should be still preserved, and more than preserved—should be tempered as with heavenly fire for the coming conflict with evil, and the triumphs that were to be won in the cause of truth and righteousness. Hence, also, the abiding symbolical form under which the Lord manifested his presence and glory to Israel, after they were redeemed from the hand of Pharaoh. This was a pillar of fire and cloud—fire enveloped in a cloud, as if to shade and soften its excessive brightness, to show how kindness and condescension mingled with and encompassed the severity; yet still having fire as the more essential element, because it was the time emphatically of law; and the holiness of God therein revealed was what must come most prominently into view. He first gave to the people "a fiery law;" and then abode with them under the symbol of fire, as showing himself ever ready to guard its sanctity, and revenge its violation if they should turn aside from the testimony delivered to them, and fall into the ways of corruption.

Even that more peculiar manifestation of God which was given to the mediator himself of the old covenant at Sinai took the same prevailing form. When Moses, at the divine bidding, went up into the mount to receive instruction concerning the tabernacle of testimony, "the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel" (Exod. xxiv. 17); yet, while received within that awful circle, Moses, so far from being devoured, appeared as in his proper region, for the law of his God was in his heart; he was inflamed with zeal for the divine holiness, and the destructive energy with which it was ready to burst forth upon others found not its appropriate fuel, but rather its kindred element in him. How noble the elevation of this man of God, that he could make his dwelling in the secret place of the Most High, even when discovering itself in the fearful aspect of devouring fire! The sight which he had seen and wondered at in the desert he now realized in his soul's experience, and not to the injury, but to the enhancement of what constitutes the true glory and blessedness of life.

If we pass from the old dispensation to the new, we mark a difference in the respect now under consideration, though not without an essential agreement. There is, first of all, a difference in form, for now that God had assumed to himself the nature of man, and in that nature had given full manifestation of his character and purposes, there was no longer the same need for symbolical representations. The Divine appeared among men as a living, personal reality, and it was not as a separate and visible form of manifestation, but rather as an incidental, more or less prominent element in figurative descriptions, that use might henceforth be expected to be made of fire. Such precisely is the case; and as the benign character and regenerative efficacy of grace, not the stern severity of law, had now become the prominent feature in the divine dispensation, the emblem of fire naturally assumed a less conspicuous place. It still appears, however, and at the very threshold of the gospel. For John the Baptist, when announcing the immediate approach of the Lord, and the character of his mission, as compared with his own, said, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Not, as with fire—which is the turn very frequently given to the announcement, but without any proper warrant, and even at variance with its natural import. The passage embodies the substance of John's representations concerning the Messiah; and in these, as previously in the writings of Malachi, on which he especially leans (iii. 4), the coming of the Lord is distinctly associated with a twofold operation—the one, gracious, regenerative, saving; the other, severe, judicial, destructive. In the first instance, he should appear as the baptizer with the Spirit, working, through this blessed agent, with transforming effect upon the state and prospects of men, and raising from amongst them that good seed which he should ultimately gather into his eternal garner. But along with this life-giving, ennobling agency in one class, there should be ever proceeding in another a work of judgment and rebuke; for where the baptism of the Spirit proves of no avail, the baptism of fire inevitably takes its place. Inevitably, we say—not occasionally or arbitrarily, since they who have withstood the ministration of the Spirit, and remain destitute of the fruits of righteousness, can have no destination but to the judicial wrath, which, like fire, shall consume the empty chaff and the unfruitful trees (Matt. iii. 12; John iii. 26). We are not, therefore, in the Baptist's announcement to identify the Spirit with fire, as if the one were taken simply for an emblem of the other. On the contrary, the characteristic of fire takes effect only when that of the Spirit fails; but it is a characteristic which can never be more than partially exhibited during the existing state of things; the full manifestation of it belongs to the time when righteousness shall do its perfect work, and the new heavens and new earth shall be brought in, where this alone shall be permitted to dwell. What can such a revelation of righteousness be but as consuming fire to the ungodly?

In perfect accordance with this is the representation given of the glorified Redeemer in the Apocalypse. He there presented himself in vision, and in symbolical guise, to his servant, with an especial view to the revelation of his purpose, respecting the execution of judgment both on a corrupt Church and an ungodly world. The representation is in form closely allied to the historical and prophetic symbols of Old Testament scripture, and shows the Son of man with eyes like a flame of fire, and feet like unto fine brass, as if they glowed or burned in a furnace (i. 14, 15)—a living embodiment of the righteousness of Heaven, in its zeal against the works and workers of iniquity. The eye flashing like a flame of fire is the soul burning with holy indignation on account of sin, and so is elsewhere associated with a going forth in righteousness to judge and make war (xix. 12). The feet as of clear brass, glowing with furnace-heat, indicate the active and terrible energy with which the purpose of righteousness is going to be carried into accomplishment, and the sure destruction which it shall bring to the adversaries. Miserable men! what can they do against such an adversary? or how shall they abide the day of his coming? But for those to whom this glorious Being is not an adversary, but a friend, what security must not his presence and protection throw around their condition? How can they lose in the conflict with such a leader and guardian on their side? Let them be but steadfast to him, and the cause he commits to their hands; and as their witness is in heaven, so, assuredly, shall their destiny be in glory.

DR. MORISON OF CHELSEA.*

PART FIRST.

"DR. MORISON was for forty-three years the pastor of a large church and congregation. He was for thirty-two years editor of the 'Evangelical Magazine.' He was author of more works than I can enumerate, some of which had a very large circulation. The biographer of the fathers and founders of the London Missionary Society, he caught their spirit and wore their mantle. He was in all respects a public man, taking the lead in works of usefulness; ready with tongue or pen, equally at home in the pulpit or on the platform; with abundant physical energy, with a robust constitution, with wonderful power of activity; with a mind which seemed as if it could not rest—ever observing, ever watchful, laying up knowledge, forming opinions and applying principles, always with amazing facility, with singular shrewdness, insight into character, tact in the management of others, vivacity, cheerfulness, and urbanity; his smile inspiring confidence, his animated countenance shedding sunshine over the meeting for business as well as over the home of love; his frank, pleasant, pithy, pointed conversation exciting interest, dispelling gloom; his sympathies ever alive with the intensest good-will, and his hand ready to support and help. Altogether he was a man above most men fitted for successful enterprise in this great working world—sure to make friends and reap honours." The life of the man of whom these sentences could be written is worthy of a permanent record. It has found this in an instructive and valuable biography of Dr. Morison which has just appeared, from the pen of Mr. Kennedy of Stepney. We thank its able author for his memorials of a life which eminently teaches diligence and cheerfulness in service, and calmness and patience in suffering; and which he has presented to us in the catholic and genial spirit of its subject.

It was the happy lot of Dr. Morison to be born in a Christian family, though at a time when the religion of Scotland had declined from its first love. His ancestors belonged to the county of Aberdeen, and had resided at Millseat of Craigston, in that county, for nearly one hundred and fifty years. Like the generations of his family that had gone before him, his father united the twofold occupation of a tiller of the ground and a worker in wood. "All my recollections of my early home," wrote Dr. Morison in 1833, "are of the most pleasurable kind. Never was union of heart and purpose more happily displayed. My mother was a pattern of all that was winning and gentle and kind in the female character; and my father was so wise and prudent, so mild in his family rule, so guileless in the expression of all his social affections, that a note of discord was never heard in our little peaceful circle. While memory holds her seat I can never forget the remarkable degree in which my beloved parents were made to bless each other, by the spontaneity and warm reciprocation of every domestic and lovely virtue." His father's was one of the cottage circles that preserved the faith and piety of Scotland during the season that infidelity infested her literature, and "moderation" reigned in her national pulpits. Among the frequent visitors of this happy, humble home were some men whose strength of character and conversation left a durable impression on young Morison's mind. We can conceive of the influence of such a Scottish worthy as he describes in the person of Alexander Sievright on a sensitive, thoughtful, and sharply observant youth. "Among the congenial friends of my father," he writes, "was Alexander Sievright, a man of patriarchal appearance, tall and spare, but with a countenance indicative of deep thought and of much converse with heaven. My father loved him and sought his fellowship because of the fervour of his piety and the extent of his theological research. I remember well his simple and unaffected manners, and the cordiality with which he and my father met and parted. His prayers in the family were of a remarkable character. He literally wrestled with the Angel of the Covenant. I never, as a child, could fall into sin when Alexander Sievright was at Millseat, without feeling the keenest upbraidings of conscience. His prayers were like fiery darts thrust into the soul from the quiver of the Almighty." Of another of those visitors of his early home, whose strong religious views and broad character insensibly moulded his own, he writes: "Another of my father's friends was William Gibb. Wherever he went he carried heaven with him. His melting tones and his more melting petitions I can never forget. He awed my spirit when it was full of the vanities of life, and made me wish to be a man of prayer such as he was. He had all the peculiarities of the older school of the Secession Church, but every peculiarity was sanctified by the word of God and by prayer, and none could dare to think lightly of divine things who listened to his communings with the Father of spirits." How much is lost by Christian families not studying to gather around their tables and home circles men whose conversation, prayers, and example would prove elements more powerful in the spiritual education of their children than all direct or formal Christian instruction, and whose presence would diffuse a living Christianity through their households.

Amongst the visitors of that Christian cottage were men whose names have long since been identified with the revival of religion that took place in Scotland towards the close and at the beginning of the present century, who blew afresh the gospel trumpet over a slumbering land. "I well remember," says Dr. Morison, "that from 1799 until 1805 scarcely a month passed without a visit from some of the persons then known as the 'missionary preachers,' the men sent out in connection with Greville Ewing and Robert Haldane. Many of them spent ten days or a fortnight at a time under my father's roof. Their arrival was always a season to us of great joy."

On the occasion of an earlier visit of Captain Haldane to the north, the future wife of Dr. Morison, then but a girl, received her first and lasting impressions. Her own graphic letter to Mr. Haldane's son and biographer, written in 1857, narrates the circumstance of her awakening, and presents us with a photograph of the gallant preacher. "It was in the summer of 1797," she writes, "that Captain Haldane first visited the town of Banff. By the tuck of drum a sermon was announced to be preached at a neighbouring village, on the banks of the gently-flowing Doveron. A company of equestrians was to perform at the same time on the Battery Green of Banff. I had been invited by a schoolfellow to accompany her to the Battery Green. We had actually set out to the place; but before reaching the spot a worthy lady, who knew us both, met and accosted us. 'Where are you going, my young friends?' My companion replied, 'To the Battery Green, to see the horsemen.' 'Oh,' said she, 'you had better go with me to the green banks, and hear Captain Haldane; it will do you more good.' My companion said, 'No; I can hear a sermon at any time, but I cannot see the horsemen.' She determined to execute her purpose, and went to the Battery Green; and so far as I have heard, she has never entered on the narrow path. Young as I then was, I was influenced by an unseen hand to accept the pressing invitation to go to the sermon on the green banks, and quitted my companion. Captain Haldane arrived on horseback at the place where the people were assembled to hear him. He dismounted, and gave his horse in charge to another gentleman who stood by. He was then a young man under thirty years of age, and had on a blue great-coat braided in front, after the fashion of the times. He also wore powder, and his hair tied behind, as was then usual for gentlemen. I can never forget the impressions which fell on my young heart as, in a distinct, clear, and manly voice, he began to address the thoughtless multitude that had been attracted to hear him. His powerful appeals to the conscience, couched in simple phrase, at the distance of more than fifty years, are still vividly remembered; and were so terrifying at the time, that I never closed an eye nor even retired to rest that night. The impression produced by what I heard was never effaced from my mind; for though I did not fully embrace the gospel for years after, yet I never relapsed again into my former state of carelessness and indifference to eternal things.

"And oft, amid the giddy throng,
Did conscience whisper, 'Thou art wrong;
Thou art not fit to die.'"

It was many years after this memorable season in the life of the "little girl" that was to become his wife, that Morison himself entered "the narrow path." Notwithstanding his home of piety and its powerful influence on the formation of his character, and in moulding his after opinions, it was his own deep conviction that till his seventeenth year he lived without God in the world. At that period it became necessary to determine his profession for life. A strong desire had been cherished by his parents from his childhood that he should be a minister of the everlasting gospel; and had he shown unequivocal signs of piety, his father would have sent him to the University of Aberdeen. But, abhorring the idea of tempting his son to enter the ministry for a piece of bread, he apprenticed him to a respectable watch-maker in Banff. In that step all hope of his parent's first fond desire seemed for ever cut off. In the marvellous providence of God it was the step to its realization. Whilst working out his apprenticeship at Banff, he was brought into connection with the searching, powerful ministry of the Rev. Joseph Gibb. The convictions of the evil and danger of sin, which he had experienced in his younger days, were again revived, and with redoubled power. He became the subject of an incessant tormenting fear. He often trembled lest God had given him up to a reprobate mind, and not unfrequently imagined that he had sinned the sin which is unto death—the sin against the Holy Ghost. Fuller instruction under the ministry of Mr. Gibb, with the teaching of that Spirit which he had grieved, yet which he again earnestly sought, scattered the terrific cloud, and poured the light of gospel peace into his troubled heart. Immediately on his conversion, he sought to bring others to the Saviour. “He might then be seen,” says his biographer, “of a Sabbath evening, a slender lad with pale face, but beaming eye, teaching a large class of persons, many of them twice his own age, the way of salvation. And it was his happiness in after years to welcome to his own fireside at Chelsea some whom he had instructed in the sea-town of Banff, and to hear from their lips that they had received their first religious impressions from his words.”

His discerning pastor soon perceived that the young convert was more than a man of fervour of spirit or simple earnestness of heart. Conversion developed the latent powers of the watchmaker's apprentice. It gave force to his understanding, and concentration to his purposes in life. It was soon perceived that he possessed a shrewd, discriminating mind, aptitude in teaching, and capacities fitting him for a public sphere in the Church. When his minister first suggested to him the thought of the ministry, he refused to entertain it. He was awed by the contemplation of a responsibility so great as that of entering upon its solemn work. It was not until a visit of Dr. Wardlaw's to Banff, and after an interview with him, that his difficulties were overcome, and his dedication of himself to the ministry finally decided. With what Christian tenderness and cheerful wisdom that eminent and good man counselled this young inquirer in search after his path of duty, is beautifully disclosed in the following letter; it may drop the needful word of direction into some similarly tossed spirit:—

“MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND,—From what I saw of your state of mind last evening, I suspect you are somewhat in danger of looking for such proofs of a call to the work of the ministry as are not ordinarily to be expected, and which are in no case necessary. You may with safety dismiss the apprehension of seeking to obtrude yourself into the Lord's vineyard, as the thought of your becoming a preacher of the word did not originate with yourself, but with others. But, my friend, may you not err in another direction, by failing to perceive the intimations of the divine will as conveyed to you through the earnest and harmonious convictions of others who have watched the development of your character, and can have no desire to mislead you in your course? I sincerely think you may so err. . . . Cheer up, my man! these scruples of yours will only make the path of duty more clear for the future. May the divine Master fervently incline you to his own work, and mightily constrain you by his own love! Such is the prayer of, my dear young friend, yours sincerely,

On the occasion of the tour through the north of Scotland that brought this eminent preacher to Banff, he was the subject of a characteristic colloquy between two worthy mothers in Israel, one of whom seems to have been a true representative of the narrow and censorious spirit that was not rare at that period amongst the religious in Scotland. As Dr. Wardlaw was by no means strictly clerical in his costume, but wore topped boots and other articles of dress corresponding to the necessities of his journey on horseback, and was, besides, a man of elegant, gentlemanly address, his appearance rather stumbled the faith of Mrs. M—. She looked wonders as she saw the young minister ascend the pulpit stairs; but as he entered on his subject she was seen to become grave and attentive. When he had finished his discourse, looking round to Mrs. S—, a person of an entirely different cast of mind, she exclaimed, “O woman! was na that a great sermon for sic a young man? But oh, he's ower braw and ower bonnie!” “Ower braw!” replied Mrs. S—; “what signifies a man's claes, if there be plenty o' furnishin' in 's mind? And to find fau't with the dear young man because he's bonnie, is something very much like a reflection on the Creator himself.”

After a three years' course of study at Hoxton College, he entered upon his ministerial life. It was a favourite maxim with him, that the student is the type of the future minister. It was so in his own case. The ardour with which he pursued his studies was prophetic of the intensity of his after course. While still at college he wrote, “I have not a moment to trifle. I am studying for eternity. I expect to give an account for every moment of Hoxton time at the bar of Omniscience.” The slowest capacity would advance with the steps of a giant under such a motive power. The preaching of Morison at once revealed how he had studied; it represented both the resources and fervour of his mind. His first ministerial position threw him at once into the centre of the great world. He became the pastor, shortly after leaving college, of the Congregational Church of Sloane Street, Chelsea; but finding his sphere of labour uncongenial, and that he was exposed to the intermeddling of the deacons of the church in the discharge of his duties, with characteristic decision he resolved to dissolve the connection. The Church was tainted with hyper-Calvinism, which bore its fruit of Antinomianism, from which both his judgment and his heart recoiled; and perceiving he was not to be at liberty without annoyances he could ill brook, he resolved upon his course. At the close of a Sabbath evening service, standing in the vestry he said to those who surrounded him, "Are you aware that I have preached for the last time in that pulpit?" They were confounded, and entreated him to reconsider the matter. But all in vain. He saw it was impossible for him to work with them satisfactorily, and his resolution was irrevocable. Less than a thorough conscientious conviction might have excused his abandonment of such a charge, when his biographer tells us that one of its authorities, displeased on a certain occasion with his minister declining to do what he wished, demanded of him, "Are you not our servant?" "I am your servant 'for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake,'" was the prompt answer. "But certainly I would not be your servant on any other consideration."

It was a bold step for a young preacher, who had newly married, to cast himself abroad on the world, and with the imputation of having quarrelled with the deacons of his first charge. But brief as his ministry had been, it had been long enough to rally not a few devoted friends around, and some of these attached members of the Established Church. They knew the worth of the young minister, and could rely upon his Christian energy. On the very first Sabbath after abandoning Union Chapel, he found for himself a pulpit in a large room in a neighbouring manufactory, where he continued to minister till the completion of the erection of a new place of worship. Starting with twenty-four members, the congregation of Trevor Chapel ultimately numbered five hundred. Many interesting notices of its progress appear in his letters to his friends. In one of these he writes, "We have not had a Church meeting for three years and a half without additions; and during that period one hundred and fifty have been received into fellowship. I do not say too much when I state that one hundred of that number have been brought to the knowledge of the truth under my own humble ministry." The secret of his success, if we regard the human instrumentality, was his power of labour, united with earnestness, adaptation, faithfulness in his ministry. He could scarcely fail to be a successful minister who "uttered perfected thoughts in accurate language, and baptized all in a spirit of kindness and love." Struck with the working energy of the minister of Trevor Chapel, as he grafted on his Church one benevolent and missionary movement after another, a neighbouring minister warned him that he was doing too much. "You must take care," said he, "that you do not overwork yourself." "Depend upon it," replied Mr. Morison, "the lazy minister dies first." Six months after, he was sent for by his friendly monitor, and to his amazement and sorrow found him dying. "Do you remember what you once said to me?" inquired the dying man. Stunned by finding his own words invested with an almost prophetic character, he could only reply falteringly, "Oh, don't speak of that!" "Yes, but I must speak of it!" said his friend. "It was the truth. Work, work, while it is called to-day, for now the night is coming when I cannot work." Dr. Morison often related this circumstance as a warning to the indolent. Yet in after years he acknowledged that he had suffered the heavy penalty in a shattered constitution of imprudent efforts in early life; and in the review of his past years, he wrote to his son-in-law, "I am a great friend to an energetic course on the part of Christ's ministers, and have not been guilty of sparing myself; but the calm reflection of fifty-four conduct me to this conclusion, that it is a real economy of life and labour to guard against an over-taxation of body or mind." That the labours must have been excessive, that to pulpit preparations and unwearied ministerial visits of a flock added the administration of ten Christian and philanthropic institutions connected with his chapel, and a vast amount of Christian authorship and public work for his Church and the general missions of his time, may well be admitted. The marvel is that his constitution bore so long the weight laid upon it. And yet, with all his love of work, he appears before us in his memoir as a family man, who to the claims of public service sacrificed no part of the claims of home and private friendship. One of his daughters, the wife of Dr. James Legge, was wont to dwell on the happy afternoons and evenings of the Saturday. "My father," she says, "would have all his preparations for the Sabbath finished by about noon of that day, and after dinner would take all his family a few miles off to the outskirts of the country. There he would give himself entirely to the enjoyment of the breezy upland, the flower-gathering, and the sports of the children, and return home impressing the narratives and lessons of the Scriptures upon their minds, and himself invigorated and freshened for the labours of the coming day." In this delightful practice he persevered till his youngest child was sixteen years of age, knitting the hearts of his children to himself, and preserving the healthful tone of his own spirit amidst his books and studies, by the endearments of the home circle.

"FORBID THEM NOT."

We are told in the Gospel that the disciples of our Lord, in their ignorant zeal, fancying that they were keeping their Master undisturbed, tried to hinder pious mothers from bringing their children to Christ. When we read this we cannot help blaming them, and feeling quite sure that we could not have acted like them.

Yet how often do similar scenes happen in the family, and even in the Church! How often is the tender reproof of our Lord and Master still applicable to the conduct of his professing disciples! In how many cases might he not still say to the parents, teachers, and guardians of youth, "Suffer the little children to come to me, and forbid them not!"

We give from the experience of a Christian woman some incidents which may be useful to all parents:—

"It was a sultry day in July. The air was close and warm, and the dark clouds in the sky seemed to foretell a storm, though the sun still shone bright.

"Little Henry was playing in the garden, and was busy gathering the fallen rose-leaves, when suddenly a flash of lightning was seen, followed by the loud roll of the thunder.

"The child raised his eyes to the sky, and calling to his mother, said, 'What is that, mother? Is it an angel coming down from heaven? Or is heaven opened, as we read of in the Bible?'

"Without answering his question, his mother hastily dragged the child into the house, saying, 'Come, come in quickly, my darling. Let us hide ourselves in a room where we cannot see the lightning.'

"But why, mother?' said the boy.

"Oh, because it is a terrible thunderstorm, and I am so afraid that we may be struck by the lightning."

Would it not have been better for the boy if the mother, instead of terrifying him and infecting him with her own foolish fears, had taken this opportunity to speak to her child of Him "who thundereth in the heavens, the highest who gives his voice, with hailstones and coals of fire?" (Ps. xviii. 13). Would it not have been better if, while the storm raged around them, she had taught her boy the lesson of the ninety-first Psalm: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day."

Let us take another example, to show how parents still transgress the command, "Forbid (or hinder) them not:—"

"Father," said a little child, "I do not understand how God can see me and hear me when I do not see him. When I say my prayers I often think that he is so far, far away from me that my words can never reach him. Are you quite sure that he hears me always, whenever I speak?"

"Oh yes, Walter, God hears you always," replied the father, in a hasty, impatient tone. "You know quite well that he is everywhere; you have often been told this. But do not trouble me with your constant questions; do lie down and sleep. I am too tired to talk to you."

Whom did this father resemble most at that moment—the disciples or their Master?

Let us now look into the Sabbath school, where the teacher is speaking warmly, and with apparent earnestness, to a large assembly of children. He is telling them of eternity—of the uncertainty of life. He is reminding them of several sudden deaths which have happened in the neighbourhood, which teach them, with silent, but impressive voice, that in the midst of life we are in death. At the most solemn moment of his speech, when the children are startled by the words, and are listening with eager attention, a visitor comes in, and the teacher suddenly turns to him,—

"Oh, how glad I am to see you," says the orator, in a wholly different tone. "I was just wishing to speak to you."

"But do I not interrupt you?" says the visitor.

"Oh no; not at all! I was saying nothing particular. Children, take your seats! The lesson is over for this evening."

What effect do you think this sudden interruption is likely to produce on the children? What are they to think of the solemn warnings which are, after all, "nothing particular?" Is it not much to be feared that the interruption, and the light words which followed it, may have destroyed the impression of the lesson, and hindered the children from coming to Jesus?

Now, let us follow a group of parents and children as they are leaving the church on Sabbath-day, after having heard the earnest exhortations of a minister who is truly endeavouring to lead them to Jesus.

The text has been "Follow me" (Mark ii. 14). The subject has been the duty and true happiness of following Christ. The sermon has been simple, touching, plain, easy to be understood by all. After the service, the members of the church have received the communion. Look at that young girl who has been only a spectator of the solemn service. She is too young yet to be admitted as a communicant, but she has been an attentive listener, and deeply impressed by all she has heard. She thinks that those who have been honoured to partake of so holy an ordinance ought for the time to be like angels rather than fallible mortals.

But now let us listen, with her, to their words as they leave the church:—

"What a long sermon!" says one.

"Did you notice what a pretty dress Mary had on?" says another.

"Don't you think the minister who officiated to-day had a very peculiar voice?" says a third.

Poor Fanny! How strange does the contrast seem to her between the lessons she heard in church and the examples which are before her eyes! It is well for her if she remembers the warning of our Lord when he was speaking of the Pharisees, "All, therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works, for they say and do not" (Matt. xxiii. 3).

But suppose that Fanny should forget the lesson taught in words to follow the lesson taught by example, would not those be to blame for her fall who ought to have given her a better example, but who had practically forgotten the teaching of our Lord, and had thus hindered the little ones from coming to Him? H.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

ANDREW FULLER.

PART THIRD.

AFTER having so entirely satisfied ourselves as to the reality of Fuller's conversion, and witnessed something of the fervour which characterized the first part of his spiritual history, it is very affecting to come upon the following:—

"October 3, 1789.—For above a year and a half I have written nothing. It has seemed to me that my life was not worth writing. Two or three years ago my heart began wretchedly to degenerate from God. Soon after my child Sally died, I sunk into a sad state of lukewarmness, and have felt the effects of it ever since. I feel at times a longing after the lost joys of God's salvation, but cannot recover them. I have backslidden from God, and yet I may rather be said to be habitually dejected on account of it than earnestly to repent of it. I find much hardness of heart, and a spirit of inactivity has laid hold of me."

Some months afterwards (January 20, 1790), he says, "During the last quarter of a year I seem to have gained some ground in spiritual things. I have read some of Jonathan Edwards' sermons, which have left a deep impression on my heart. I have attended more closely than heretofore to private prayer, and feel a little renewing of strength."

"Sometimes I have been discouraged, and afraid that God would never bless me again. In my preaching, though I am affected at times with what I say, yet, as to doing good to others, I go on as if I had no hope of it. Repeated disappointments and long want of success make me feel as if I were not to expect success."

"February 16.—For these last three weeks I have too much again relapsed into a kind of thoughtlessness. I have felt a little in preaching, but not much. One day I was looking over Dr. Owen on the 'Mortification of Sin.' Speaking of the evil of sin in the soul unmortified, he says, 'It will take away a man's usefulness in his generation. His works, his endeavours, his labours seldom receive a blessing from God. If he be a preacher, God commonly blows upon his ministry, so that he shall labour in the fire and not be honoured with success.' This, in a great degree, is realized in me."

"March 27.—Some weeks ago I thought I felt myself to gain ground by closer prayer; but I have lately relapsed again too much into indifference. Yesterday I read Jonathan Edwards' two sermons 'On the Importance of a Thorough Knowledge of Divine Truth.' I felt this effect, a desire to rise earlier, to read more, and to make the discovery of truth more a business."

End of the summer of 1790.—"In the course of this summer I have sometimes enjoyed a tenderness of heart in preaching But yet, in general, I have but little of the joys of salvation. I do not feel tempted to evil as heretofore, but yet all is not right. 'Oh, for a closer walk with God.'"

In the spring of 1791 there appeared a religious concern among the young people of his congregation. This, doubtless, was in some sense a result of the revival of earnestness in his own soul; but it also reacted upon him in bringing this dark chapter in his life more rapidly to a close. To that end other things also, about the same time, contributed. Among these were a heavy domestic affliction, and the commencement of the Indian Missionary enterprise. This last event, especially, had a most blessed and marked effect upon his restoration. And not as containing an isolated piece of information only in regard to the life of Andrew Fuller, but as suggesting a remedy for spiritual declension which has been often proved efficacious, we commend the following testimony to the particular attention of the reader.

"Within the last year or two we have formed a Missionary Society, and have been enabled to send out two of our brethren to the East Indies. My heart has been greatly interested in this work. Surely I never felt more genuine love to God and to his cause in my life. I bless God that this work has been a means of reviving my soul. If nothing else comes of it, I and many more have obtained a spiritual advantage."

Among the works of Fuller are two essays entitled respectively, "The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation," and "The Backslider." One unacquainted with the history of his religious experience may take them up without any peculiar interest, and read them just as he would any other theological treatises prepared by a good and intelligent man. But surely for those who know what he came through in 1769 on the occasion of his conversion, and in 1786–91 when the shadow lay more or less upon his soul, it must be very different. These pieces have, in fact, an autobiographical interest. They describe, not simply what their author thought, but what he felt. It is not speculation which they contain, but experience. And every reader of them will find that on this account their positive value and practical utility are enhanced many fold.

It is so difficult to make a right improvement of the fact that there are dark chapters in the lives of believers, that we might perhaps most profitably hasten past this eventful period in Fuller's history, and refrain from making it the subject of particular comment at all. But we cannot do so without at least commending the study of it to a class of persons, of whom representatives are in general to be found everywhere. I refer to those who well remember a time when they had a heartier relish for divine things than they are conscious of possessing now, and who, simply on that account, have almost succeeded in persuading themselves that they have already sunk into that deplorable state, in which it is impossible to renew them again to repentance. Let these persons reflect that even so eminent a Christian as Andrew Fuller passed several years in a state of spiritual declension. Let them consider, that though to fall back is a sin and a shame, yet those who do so are not always irrecoverable. Let them ascertain, and put immediately in operation the means of revival, and there is no reason why they should not be able yet to say, as Fuller was after his restoration, "I never felt more genuine love to God and to his cause in my life."

If this were nothing more than a record of external events, there would be no necessity for referring again to the history of the formation of the Baptist Missionary Society. We have already noted the date of its institution, and the circumstances under which its first meeting was held. But our aim is to look beneath the surface at the hidden springs in which the leading changes in Fuller's life originated; and certainly it is not enough simply to state that at a certain period the Churches began to concern themselves about the condition of the heathen and that he shared in the general concern. The truth is that this revival of an interest in missions was not more manifestly and remarkably a cause—a cause, as we have seen, of spiritual restoration—than an effect, very much of the same. In this, as in so many other similar cases, the heritage was first refreshed, and then the flooded streams flowed out into the desert. The society was not formed till 1792, but as we look back upon the intimations in the diary, we find growingly-distinct premonitions of its birth. Thus, under date April 11, 1784, we have this entry: "Devoted this day to fasting and prayer, in conjunction with several other ministers, who have agreed thus to spend the second Tuesday in every other month to seek the revival of real religion, and the extension of Christ's kingdom in the world. Feel very unhappy to think that my heart should be no more in it." Again, July 12, the same year, he writes, "Read part of a poem by John Scott, Esq., on the cruelties of the English in the East Indies. My heart felt most earnest desires that Christ's kingdom might come, when all these cruelties shall cease." A few days afterwards, he notes, "Wrote a few thoughts on the desirableness of the coming of Christ's kingdom." Then, as we continue to glance onward through the record, we come now and again on such as the following: "Same outgoings of heart, to-day, for the revival of real religion—first in my own soil, and then in the Churches in general." "This evening I felt tender all the time of the prayer-meeting for the revival of religion." Some may have supposed that when the first of recent missionary societies was formed there was nothing in its history but what met the eye of the most unreflecting contemporary. A number of men conceived the idea that it was the duty of the Church to send the gospel to the heathen. They met, accordingly, to arrange about the doing of it; and, having gathered the money and found the men, they started into active life as an Association for Missionary purposes. Such, to many, may have seemed the beginning and end of the whole enterprise. But go back upon the secret history of its founders, and you will discover that this work was undertaken in a spirit somewhat different from that of a joint-stock company. Years before, in the mind at least of its first secretary, the idea had been conceived; and had been made the subject of many solemn thoughts, and many anxious communings with God. The revival of religion at home, the spread of the gospel abroad,—things between which there seemed to him to exist the most vital connection,—appeared for a time to be scarcely ever out of his mind. And although a period of darkness intervened before he saw his desires for the coming of the kingdom in the way of being fulfilled, still the order of the relation as it had struck his own thoughts was preserved to the letter. His soul had begun manifestly to revive, and the spirit of life to stir among the Churches at home, before that ever memorable meeting was held at Kettering, where he and others formally agreed to hold the rope while the devoted Carey went down to search out and bring to light the hidden riches of the mine.

The journeys undertaken by Fuller on behalf of the mission brought him into contact with pious people in all parts of the kingdom, and this intercourse doubtless complexioned, to a certain extent, his religious character. But the very activity implied by that mode of life prevented his putting on record as full an account of the spiritual results of it as we could have wished, and hence this chapter of his history, while rich enough in outward incident, is comparatively bare of private confession. Still, we are not without illustrative statements of the kind we want even in this section of the story. They exhibit him as a man overburdened with work,—having no time for social enjoyment of any sort,—in external aspect somewhat stern, yet carrying underneath a heart tender and compassionate; and with his eye fixed, sleeping and waking, in one direction, seeking ever the consummation of the grand end of the establishment in the world of the kingdom of Jesus Christ. He did not, in person, go forth to labour in the mission field; but few of those who have actually done so, were ever more thoroughly possessed by the missionary spirit.

The following, written after a visit to Ireland, shows how in old age he clung to the same gospel views he had adopted in his youth: "The doctrine of the cross is more dear to me than when I went. I wish I may never preach another sermon but what shall bear some relation to it. I see and feel, more and more, that except I eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man, I have no life in me either as a Christian or as a minister. Some of the sweetest opportunities I had in my journey were in preaching Christ crucified." And as these simple words reveal to us most clearly his doctrinal position, so the characteristic anecdote, which we are next to quote, proves that his conduct, on occasions when little difficulties arose, was as judicious as his teaching was sound :—

Thursday, July 24, 1805.—Travelled nearly forty miles to-day, along the western coast, bearing southward. About six o'clock we reached Saltcoats. Here I found that the parish minister, on hearing that I was to collect at the burgher meeting-house, resolved to have a sermon at the same hour in the church, and a collection for the Bible Society. He said, however, that if I chose to preach the sermon in the church, and let the collection be applied to the Bible Society, I was welcome to do so. As soon as this was mentioned to me by another person, I immediately sent to the clergyman, offering to relinquish my own object, and, if he was agreeable, to preach the sermon in the church, in favour of the Bible Society. This he acceded to, and I called on him before worship. I then observed that he must be aware of what he had proposed being contrary to the rules of the Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and that I should be sorry if any ill consequences were to follow on my account. He replied that his Presbyters were well disposed, and he had no fears on that head. I then preached the sermon, and pleaded with all the energy I could for the Bible Society. After worship, I went to my inn; then called to sup and lodge with the clergyman (such is the custom in Scotland). While sitting in his house, I told him I felt happy in the opportunity of expressing my regard for the Bible Society, and requested him to add my guinea to the collection. But during my call at the inn, after worship, he had consulted with his friends on the subject of my having been deprived of a collection. He therefore answered me by saying, "I cannot accept your guinea; and, moreover, I must insist on your accepting half the collection for your object, and you must make no objection whatever to it."

But we must draw our sketch to a close. Toward the end of his life his health was by no means good, but he laboured on almost to the last. In April 1815, however, it became evident that his working days were nearly over; and with great calmness he contemplated the coming change. "I am a poor guilty creature," he writes to Dr. Ryland on the 28th of that month; "but Christ is an almighty Saviour. I have preached and written much against the abuse of the doctrine of grace, but that doctrine is all my salvation and all my desire. I have no other hope than from salvation by mere sovereign efficacious grace, through the atonement of my Lord and Saviour. With this hope, I can go into eternity with composure. Come, Lord Jesus! Come when thou wilt! Here I am; let him do with me as seemeth him good." Some days after he gave expression to the same feelings, in even more emphatic language. "I never before recollect to have had such depression of animal spirits, accompanied with such calmness." "My mind is calm—no raptures, no despondency." "My hope is such that I am not afraid to plunge into eternity." The account of his death is very affecting. With it we close the paper.

"On Lord's day, May the 7th, within an hour of his departure, overhearing the congregation singing in the chapel which adjoined his house, he said to his daughter Sarah, 'I wish I had strength enough.' 'To do what, Father?' He replied, 'To worship, child;'" and added, 'my eyes are dim.' On his daughter Mary entering the room (the rest of the family surrounding the bed of their dying parent), he said, 'Come, Mary, come and help me.' He was raised up in bed, and in that attitude continued for nearly half an hour, apparently joining in the devotions of his flock. The only words that could be distinctly heard were 'Help me,' when, with his hands clasped and his eyes fixed upwards, he fell back, uttered two or three sighs, and expired. Thus died this devoted servant of Christ, May 7, 1815, in the sixty-second year of his age."

THE PALIMPSEST.

In the Abbot's oaken chamber,
Long the parchment hidden lay,
Given o'er to dust and spider,
Buried from the light of day.

Written o'er with monkish story
On each old and crumbling page,—
Written o'er with legends hoary,
Of the dim forgotten age;—

Till the traveller's glance alighted
Where the parchment long had lain,
And, all mildewed, stained, and blighted,
Dragged it to the light again.

And, his loving care bestowing,
Day by day its treasures bared,
Till he traced, in beauty glowing,
Olden lines which time had spared;—

Traced the glory underlying,
Traced the azure and the gold,
Traced, in letters still undying,
Treasures which it bare of old.

Till the words of truth confessing,
Words of prophet and of seer,
Words of love, and truth, and blessing,
Stood in all their beauty clear.

And the old immortal story
Shone upon its pages plain,
Gleaming with their olden glory,
Speaking with God's word again.

Brother, gaze with look as earnest,
If earth's lessons thou wouldst trace;
Gaze in faith till thou discernest
What is written on its face.

Dark thick dust is on it lying—
 Dust of dead and buried times,
 Every age its dust supplying,
 Charged with records of its crimes.

And the present, in the writing
 First that meets the casual eye,
 Is of Satan, still inditing
 Records of his victory.

Poor men's groans, and rich men's weeping,
 Pinching want and grinding cares,
 Wars and famines o'er it weeping,—
 Such the records that it bears.

Brother, gaze upon its teaching,
 As men gaze through the thick night,
 Till thine eye, its secret reaching,
 Read its hidden legend right.

Faith shall pierce this dark adorning,
 Grief and sorrow, sin and shame,
 Show thee where, in earth's glad morning,
 God hath written his own Name;—

Show thee, how that Name remaining,
 Turns its darkness into light,
 All its tangled course explaining,
 Ruling all its wrong to right.

Till, beneath Sin's sad inditing,
 Tales of woe, and tears, and blood,
 Thou shalt trace the old handwriting,—
 It is God's, and it is good.

And the old immortal story
 Shines upon its pages plain,
 Gleaming with the olden glory,
 Speaking with God's word again.

EXTREME UNCTION.

JUST as we were scouring along in the enjoyment of this scene, the coachman and his friend called attention to a spectacle at which they joked. A man was leading a mule, another man walking beside it, and on it was seated a priest in his white surplus. "He is going," they said, "to administer extreme unction to some one who is dying." Ah! they may ridicule him and his offices; but that surplice flitting among the olives represents the most tremendous power in this world. Is that a son, or a husband, or a father, that is conducting him? Be it one or the other, he thinks that man seated on the mule holds in his hand the power to give the soul of his mother, or his wife, or his child, its title to enter the kingdom of God. He has probably hastened from his home in terror at the thought that death might arrive before the priest; and so over Irish bogs or Italian mountains, or other wild and lonely scenes, men with aching hearts often hurry, to invoke this mysterious talisman. Other priesthoods are content with holding in their hands power over men in this life. The Brahmin leaves the soul of the father, as far as it can be influenced from earth, to the charge of the son, laying upon him the duty of offering the sacrifices that will appease the manes; and it is only the priests of Rome who have the dread art of first shadowing the spirit of man with their hand at every step of his course below, and then extending their power into the world to come; so that his welfare there depends again upon their intervention. Thus, over survivors, they hold the double influence of conveying their own absolution, and, yet more tremendous, of directly controlling that of their departed kindred! The art of selling for money redemption for the dead is all their own. Do not laugh at that peasant and that priest; the spectacle has too deep a meaning for that!

How would it read in apostolic writing that a disciple from Bethany had hastened into Jerusalem with his ass, to carry out Peter in haste to give the last sacrament to his mother, that she might die absolved? The son would have hailed the presence of Peter as an additional light in the sick-room; but with it, or without it, he and his mother would have parted rejoicing in hope of the glory of God.—Italy in Transition.

GIVE PLACE.

STARRY crowns of heaven
 Set in azure night!
 Linger yet a little Ere you hide your light:—
 —Nay; let starlight fade away
 Heralding the day!

Snowflakes pure and spotless,
 Still, oh, still remain,
 Binding dreary winter
 In your silver chain:—
 —Nay; but melt at once and bring Radiant sunny spring!

Blossoms, gentle blossoms,
 Do not wither yet;
 Still for you the sun shines,
 Still the dews are wet:—
 —Nay; but fade and wither fast,
 Fruit must come at last!

Joy, so true and tender,
 Dare you not abide;
 Will you spread your pinions,
 Must you leave our side?
 —Nay; an angel's shining grace
 Waits to fill your place!

ANSWERING OUR OWN PRAYERS.

BY REV. T. L. CUTLER.

WE use this expression, not too literally, but simply for want of a better one. The idea we aim at is, that every Christian is bound to do his utmost for the fulfilment of his own prayers. He is never to ask God to give what he is not trying his utmost to obtain; he is never to ask God to make him what he is not faithfully trying to become.

This is our idea. It is partially illustrated by the familiar fable of Hercules and the waggoner. When the overloaded waggon sunk into the mire, instead of labouring to pry out the imbedded vehicle, the waggoner fell to praying Hercules to interpose his brawny arm for his relief. The god of muscle thus appealed to, reminded the luckless teamster that, while he prayed for help, he had better put his own shoulder to the wheel, and help himself.

In one sense this heathen fable illustrates the true relation between the sovereign God and the child of prayer. On our side is complete dependence. On the side of Omnipotence is infinite mercy. From Him cometh down every good and every perfect gift. And because we are so dependent upon our heavenly Father, and owe him so much of submission, obedience, and trust, therefore are we to "pray without ceasing." But while we pray we are to work: first, as a proof of the sincerity of our desires; and next, in order to obey God, who commands us to become the very men that we ask him to make us by his grace.

Does every child of God do his utmost to secure the answers to his own uttered requests? Most emphatically we reply, No! With even the best men there is a sad disparity between prayer and practice—between the askings of the lips and the actings of the heart—between their life and their liturgy.

1. Take, for example, the oft-repeated prayer for growth in grace. This is a vital request, and the most formal Christian professor will utter it nearly every day of his life. If he would resist the continual gravitation of inward sin and surrounding worldliness, he must cry as continually for heart-grace. But just imagine the owner of a vast field of weeds kneeling down among the "johnswort" and Canada thistles, and praying God to give him from that field a plentiful corn harvest! Not a furrow has been turned. Not a kernel planted. But the insane husbandman implores from heaven a crop, toward the growing of which his sluggish fingers have not been lifted. My Christian brother, you never are guilty of such folly in the management of your secular interests. You never expect cargoes without sending ships seaward; you never count on crops without ploughing, manuring, and seeding your acres. No school-girl would expect to see her pet flower grow in the conservatory without water and fresh earth. She sprinkles the azalea leaves until they drip, and feeds the delicate tuberose with new earth as often as its wasting leaves telegraph its hunger. God takes care of her plants; but she takes care of them too, and does not expect him to work miracles for the benefit of lazy people. Her prayer for her flowers is in the brimming pitcher and the virgin earth which her careful hands bring to the greenhouse.

Carry this same principle into your religion. Do you pray with the lips for growth in holiness, growth in heavenly-mindedness, growth in spiritual stamina? Then to the work of cleansing the heart-field! Then to the cutting up of the tares of covetousness—the johnswort of pride—the nettles of selfishness—the briers of deceit—the overgrown burdocks of sloth—and the seed-scattering thistles of unbelief! Pull them by the roots. Give your inward lusts no quarter. Keep no terms with them. Make no compromise with some darling sin to sprout and grow unobserved in some back corner of your soul-garden. Clear out every weed, in order that the seed-corn of godliness may have the full strength of the affections and the energies to make it grow. Watch over that precious seed. Water it with prayers and penitential tears. Strengthen it with Bible truth. And as you pray for the growth of heart-piety, let no indulged lust, no pet sin, harboured in secret places, prove your uttered prayer to be an abomination in the sight of the all-searching God. "If I regard iniquity in my heart" (that is, if I cling to it and cherish it) "God will not hear me." Nor will the Lord of holiness answer with a Yea what we are practically answering with a Nay.

2. Let us illustrate and apply this principle, in the next place, to parents who are praying for the conversion of their children. No petition is more fitting than this; none could be more acceptable to God. But what hope have you, my friend, for the renewal of your children's hearts, if you pray in one direction with the lips, and quite in the opposite direction with the life? We see constantly the two antagonistic types of parental influence. Both are nominally Christian: only one is really such. The one man pleads at the altar for the sanctification of his household—that his sons may become sons of God, and his daughters may be as polished stones in the temple of Christ. He makes religion prominent in his family; it is visible, legible, and above board. The books that are brought home for the children to read, the newspapers that are taken, the amusements that are chosen, the society that is sought, the aims in life that are set before those children, all bear in one direction and in the right direction. God is not asked by that father to convert his offspring to godliness while he is doing his best to pervert them to sin and worldliness. Nor is God implored to convert them while the parent uses no agencies to effect the longed-for result. No more than the Lord would be asked to restore the sick boy from a typhus fever, and yet no physician called in and no medicine administered. How much worse if the father, having prayed that his child be restored, should fall to giving the poor boy strychnine or prussic acid in large doses!

Yet professed Christians do this very thing often in morals and religion. They pray for their children's recovery to holiness, and then poison them! They pray for a son's purity, and then flash the wine-cup before his eyes. They pray for a daughter's conversion, with a theatre-ticket in their pockets—a "family ticket" for the whole household! They go to church, look devout, and then come home to trifle, to gossip—to entertain Sunday visitors at a sumptuous feast, to talk politics, to do anything, in short, but follow up the teachings of God's minister with affectionate, faithful home instructions. The practical effect of their whole conduct and conversation, both on the Lord's day and all the days of the week, is to undo whatever good may have been done by the earnest labours of the pulpit. What must such children think of those fluent prayers that they hear every night at the family altar? What of the consistency of those parents who utter such solemn mockeries? Oh! it is better never to pray at all for the conversion of your offspring than to ask God, in solemn tones, to save them, while you are using your whole influence to harden and destroy them. "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou unfaithful servant."

In eternity it will be a terrible thing for many a man to meet his own prayers. Their very language will condemn him; for he knew his duty, but he did it not. Those fervent prayers, which the good man laboured to make effectual, will be "shining ones" in white raiment to conduct their author in to the banqueting-house of the GREAT KING. But the falsehoods uttered at the throne of grace will live again as tormenting scorpions in the day of the Lord's appearing. "Be not rash with thy mouth, nor let thy heart be hasty to utter anything before God," is an injunction that forbids more than irreverence in prayer. It forbids us, by implication, to ask for that which we do not sincerely desire. Above all, it forbids the asking from God those blessings which we are hindering by our neglect, or thwarting by our selfishness and unbelief.

THE FATHERS IN ROSS-SHIRE—THE MINISTERS.*

THE religion of the Highlands of Scotland, admirable in many respects, but in some peculiar, has received much illustration from an able book recently published by the Rev. Mr. Kennedy of Dingwall, which he entitles, with affectionate reverence, "The Days of the Fathers in Ross-shire." Descended from a line of heroes of the pulpit, and himself a preacher powerful in English and famous in Gaelic, Mr. Kennedy, while restricting himself to the particular locality of Ross-shire, does not restrict himself to any one department of Ross-shire religion, but gives a comprehensive and faithful view of the whole. And as he depicts the whole, so he praises it all, without qualification or modification. Only in one paragraph of the whole book does he seem inclined to admit that there was a "type of religion peculiar to the north," and that the "peculiarity of the Celtic temperament" may have had somewhat to do with the peculiarity of the "Celtic piety." Yet we can hardly blame that love as too indiscriminating which has been the means of introducing us to so many holiest men, so near to God that all our approaches look like distance, and so humble that all our worship seems filled with flippancy and sin.

For the religion of Ross-shire—too little social on the one hand, and too subjective on the other—was, at least, characteristically and eminently individual. Men were not there saved in the slump, or tided over into heaven by the general wave of religious feeling that filled the community. One by one they dealt with God, and God took a dealing with them. Hence, too, in this part of the Church, that supremacy of piety over all other qualities and recommendations, both in the case of ministers and laymen, which is well brought out in these memorials. We shall at present confine ourselves to the ministers. "It was neither by talents, nor by learning, nor by oratory, nor was it by all these together, that a leading place was attained by the ministers in the Highlands, but by a profound experience of the power of godliness, a clear view of the doctrines of grace, peculiar nearness to God, a holy life, and a blessed ministry. Without these, without all these, a high place would not be assigned to them either by the Lord or by men." And again, "Each of them would have been distinguished as a Christian, though he had never been a minister. There are ministers who find all their Christianity in their office, having had none of it before in their hearts. Far otherwise was it with the golly fathers in Ross-shire. With two exceptions they had all been Christians before they were office-bearers, and some of them from their earliest years. Nor were they ordinary Christians. Their deep experiences of the work of the Spirit, their clear views of the doctrines of grace, their peculiar nearness to God, and their holy watchful-ness, would have made them eminent among the godly, though they had never had a place among the clergy. Each of them had his own peculiarity of experience, but all of them were deeply exercised in a life of godliness; each had his favourite department of truth, while lovingly embracing the whole, but all of them were 'skilful in the word of righteousness;' some of them were favoured with more intimate communion with the Lord than the others, but they were all 'a people near unto him;' each one was distinguished by some peculiar grace, but they all lived 'soberly, righteously, and godly in a present evil world.' In every respect they differed from each other but in their common resemblance to their Father in heaven; but, owing to this, they were all recognised, even by the world, as brethren in the Lord." And lastly, all of them were distinguished as men of prayer. "Their abounding in prayer made it safe and healthful to abound also in labour. Their public work was to them no wasting bustle, for, in communion with the Lord, their strength was recruited in the closet. Wrestling for grace with the Lord, and labouring with grace for the Lord, no blight was permitted to rest on their soul or their service. Prevailing with God as they pled for men, they prevailed with men as they pled for God."

Yet, while the great Ross-shire ministers were eminent in all, or nearly all, these general characteristics, there was much variety in their special gifts. One remarkable instance of this we have in the case of two neighbouring ministers, Mr. Fraser of Alness and Mr. Porteous of Kilmuir. The former, well known for his singularly clear and able book on the seventh chapter of the Romans, was, during a great part of his ministry, chiefly an awakening preacher, and many of those who had been aroused under his sermons went elsewhere to get healing for their wounds. Mr. Porteous's church at Kilmuir at last became overcrowded with the fugitives, and meeting Mr. Fraser at a funeral, he said to him, "It gives me, my dear brother, grief of heart to see some of your people in the church of Kilmuir every Sabbath. My elders tell me that those who come to us complain of your preaching almost entirely to the unconverted, and that the 'poor in spirit' can get no food for their souls. Now, my dear brother, if the Lord gives it to you, I pray you not to withhold their portion from the people of the Lord, which you can dispense to them as I never could." 'My dear brother,' was Mr. Fraser's reply, 'when my Master sent me forth to my work, he gave me a quiver full of arrows, and he ordered me to cast these arrows at the hearts of his enemies till the quiver was empty. I have been endeavouring to do so, but the quiver is not empty yet. When the Lord sent you forth, he gave you a cruse of oil, and his orders to you were, to pour the oil on the wounds of broken-hearted sinners till the cruse was empty. Your cruse is no more empty than is my quiver. Let us both, then, continue to act on our respective orders, and as the blessing from on high shall rest on our labours, I will be sending my hearers with wounded hearts to Kilmuir, and you will be sending them back to Alness rejoicing in the Lord."

Mr. Porteous, who on this occasion received so loving and brotherly a reply, was minister of Kilmuir for forty-three years; passing away in the year 1775, "in the attitude of prayer, alone with the Lord," in the eighty-fourth year of his age. Of his power of illustration in the pulpit a striking instance is preserved here by the late Dr. M'Donald. A man is driven by a howling tempest into a ruined cottage. Suddenly he becomes aware of a dead body lying in his place of shelter. So long as he does not look at it, it is still; but the moment he looks at it, it slowly rises and glares at him. "O wretched man! who shall deliver him from the body of this death?" He falls on his knees,—the corpse sinks down. He rises joyfully,—it rises too. So he takes to his knees again, and now he will not rise from them any more till the day break and the shadows flee away.

Mr. Hector M'Phail of Resolis, won or warned to Christ by the faithfulness of his wife after he had been some years a minister, vowed never to omit an opportunity of speaking to a fellow-creature about the things belonging to his peace; and some striking cases of conversion thence resulting are well known. He died in 1779, and "on his death-bed his hope of heaven was for a season sorely tried. Falling asleep in a dejected state of mind, he dreamt that he was waiting, lonely and despairing, outside the walls of the New Jerusalem. Seeing the gate closed, and none near to help him, and none in sight to cry to for help, he had just lain down to die, when he heard sounds as of a company approaching the city. Venturing to look up from the dust where he lay, he recognised Noah, Abraham, and all the patriarchs. As they drew near the gate flew open, a glorious company from within came forth to meet them, and, in the midst of shouts of triumph, they entered. The gate again closes, and again he is left alone and hopeless. But soon he hears the noise of another company approaching. As they pass he recognises Moses, Aaron, Samuel, David, and all the prophets, a glorious and a numerous band. Again the gate is thrown open, 'an abundant entrance' given, and again he is left outside, and feels more desolate than ever. A third company is heard approaching, composed of the apostles and all the earliest Christians. They enter the city amidst rejoicing like the rest, and he, with less hope than ever, is still outside the gate. A fourth company now appears. Luther and Knox are at the head of those who form it. They pass him by like those who went before, are admitted into the city, and leave him alone and despairing without. Quite close to him now comes a fifth company. He recognises in it some of his friends and acquaintances, who had died in the Lord; but though their shining skirts touch him as they pass, he could not venture to arise and join them. Again he sees the gate open and close; and now, at last, he lays himself quite down to die. But he hears the footstep of a solitary pilgrim coming exactly to the place where he lies. Looking up, he recognises Manasseh. Summoning all his strength he takes hold of his skirt as he moves slowly towards the city, and, creeping on behind him, he knows the gate has opened by the light of the city's glory shining on his face; and just as he thought he heard the sound of the gate closing behind him, he suddenly awoke. The lesson of his dream was presented to him thereafter in the sweet words of Paul: 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.'

"The Calderes were a blessed race;" and among them Mr. Charles Calder, minister of Ferintosh, is held still in the freshness of memory. Of his preaching, Mr. Kennedy says strikingly, "As a preacher he was quite singular; and it was his want of any marked peculiarity that made him so. He seldom used an illustration; but all others would fail, when he did not succeed, in being sufficiently clear. His words were chosen, not to please, but to instruct; and well chosen indeed they were, for his statements were so bathed in light, the words were never noticed. They were always so transparent, that the idea they contained was like a naked flame. His manner was chastened and quiet, but earnest and solemn. All was subordinated by him to the great end of setting only Christ before the eyes of sinners. His great theme was the love of Jesus. His own soul kept lying at the feet of Jesus; he was wont to give forth, with all the freshness of a present experience, his utterances regarding the person, love, death, and salvation of the blessed Redeemer. There never was a more affecting preacher, when discoursing on his favourite theme. Often have his whole congregation been in tears, as in his own tender, solemn way, he commended Jesus as a Saviour to the lost; and when, with a tremulous voice, but with the authority of one who knew he was conveying a message from Jehovah, he warned the unbeliever of his danger, the most indifferent were compelled to tremble."

Among the most famous of Highland preachers (and most characteristically Highland), was Mr. Lachlan Mackenzie of Lochcarron. A man of great genius, warm heart, keen impulses, strong temptations, ardent imagination, profound experience, and continual prayer, he was in virtue of these gifts a memorable preacher. All through the north he was held, not only a preacher, but a prophet; and, to quote the weighty and judicious words of Mr. Kennedy, "Avoiding the extreme of a superstitious credulity, on the one hand, and of the formalist's scepticism, on the other, it is altogether safe to say, that Mr. Lachlan enjoyed peculiarly familiar intercourse with God, and received such distinct intimations of his mind, in reference to the cases which he carried to the mercy-seat, as but very few of God's children have obtained."

Mr. Lachlan Mackenzie laboured in the extreme west of Ross-shire; while from Mr. Macadam, who died about the same time, after a faithful ministry in the east, as minister successively of Cromarty and Nigg, we have the following pithy note, "Why are there so many bankrupt professors of religion in our day? It is because they start without a capital." In the same district, their ministry extending far into the present century, Dr. Angus Mackintosh ruled in Tain, and Mr. Forbes in Tarbet; the former a singularly impressive and stately character, and a most solemn and tender preacher; while the latter, somewhat crabbed and rough on the outside, united to a clear and vigorous intellect great unction and authority in the pulpit. The last and best known, and, take him all in all, the greatest of the great Ross-shire ministers, was Dr. Macdonald. We look forward to soon having a more extended memoir of this evangelist and apostle of the north, and shall therefore say nothing of his course here; as indeed we have no more space either for this or for the life of Mr. Kennedy of Killearnan (or Redcastle)—the father of the minister who "heard the Lord saying 'The memory of the just is blessed,' and saw that the righteous fathers of Ross-shire were already being forgotten," and drew up these memorials of a most precious and genuine, if provincial Christianity.

THE OLD DEVOTEE.

I HAD often observed an old shed on the bank of the Irrawadi River, and had asked my boatmen concerning it, but they could not satisfy my curiosity, so I determined to go and see for myself. The morning was foggy, as it often is in Burmah, and ere I was aware I reached the shed. I had not considered what to do, but, hearing a noise or rustling inside, inquired, "Is there any one here?" I received no answer, but waited a little, when a haggard, attenuated old man protruded his head out of the door, but seeing a strange face, he disappeared at once, and though I called, and told him I was a friend, he would not come out. At last I became weary, and, as the rising sunbeams danced upon the waters, I went down and sat by the river side, and looked upon the morning's gladness. My companions had gone another way; and after I had drank in the beauties of the scene before me, I took one of our tracts and began to read, but soon hearing a stir in the shed, I returned there again.

The man sat in his door, and inquired of me, as I came up, what I wanted. I told him of our God, and the freeness of the gospel, but he said he did not care anything about our God. He had worshipped Gaudama and his idols for many years, and did not wish to lose all of his merit. As I could not reach his heart in this way, I asked him if he could not tell me his history, but he hesitated until I told him a little of mine. When I reached the part where I left land and kindred, he stopped me, and said, "Ah! you have made a sacrifice; our hearts are alike." Seeing his coldness changing, I pleaded with him to tell me of his past life. He hesitated again, then pressing his hand upon his forehead, as if to call back the memories of bygone years, he said, "When I was a young man my parents died, and left me with a handsome sum of gold. I was very proud. You look at me with surprise; but my bare head was once covered with long tresses, the envy of many. I was handsome, and dressed in rich garments; and in a few years I married a beautiful girl,—one whose hand had been sought by the governor's secretary. After this I gave sumptuous feasts, and thought I was very happy; but one night I dreamed that the King of Death called me, and I went to a place where I became a snake. This dream very much troubled me; and not long after I went and consulted with an astrologer, who marked on his board, and then went into an awful spasm. I begged him to read me my fate, but he refused, saying it made him very ill even to look upon it. I gave him more money, but he would only tell me that my future was an awful one, and directed me to the priests to procure a way of escape. I had not often been to the priests, but they greeted me, and I told them my trouble. The old priest was very much affected when he heard of my dream, and sent me away, saying he would go to the astrologer, who might tell him what he saw. The next day I went to the priest, who said it was an awful fate, but I could be released therefrom. The way was open; but if I would make many idols, give away my riches and fine dress, together with all my comforts, I might escape the dreaded fate. At first I thought I could not do all this; but my dream haunted me so that I could not sleep. I became ill, and at last I made the sacrifice. I have performed long pilgrimages, counted many beads, and strictly kept all of the gods' rules, and I hope that fate will be averted."

"But are you happy here?" I inquired.

"Oh, yes," returned the old man, his eye flashing forth with some beauty, "I have dreams of a fairy country where I shall be young again, and have my beautiful wife and great riches."

"But tell me what became of your wife?"

"Oh!" said the old man, as his bosom heaved a sigh, "she died in a few months after my dream; but she gave costly presents to the priests, and they said she would be a beautiful Nat up in one of the regions above."

I noticed the old devotee had told most of his history in a very cold, unaffected manner, but I observed a great softening in his voice when he spoke of his wife, so I continued, "What if you should not meet your wife in the fairy country?"

"Dare you tell me this might be so," said he, "white lady? During these thirty long, dreary rains, this thought has cheered me. I have often abstained several days from food, I have not even allowed the birds to sing before my shed. Underneath these trees once grew fragrant flowers, but in order to adhere strictly to my rules, I dug up their roots, that there beauty might not bloom near my home. You look with disgust upon my dreary place," he continued, "but it was made so in order to obtain a reward. When I first chose this life, I used to linger by the homes of the people, for there I lived over again my domestic happiness; but this was a source of joy to me, so I turned from these homes, and receive my food only when the people bring it to me."

As the sun was getting high in the heavens, I asked the old man if I might go into his shed. He looked about a little, and said very gently, "It is not a fit place for you to sit down, but perhaps you wish to obtain merit, so come in. You will get merit, and I shall by receiving you." He moved away a bundle of rags, and I sat down in his doorway, and while he was lighting his cigar I examined his room. On one side hung some dried snake skins, a string of beads, and a bunch of feathers, which he said were his trappings when he went on a pilgrimage to the pagodas. His furniture consisted of two broken dishes. He did not have to make a change of clothing, and as he seated himself I mentioned it, but he replied, "Certainly not, I must abstain from all these comforts." The air was very much confined, indeed, became so offensive to me, that I was obliged to go out. As I did so, the old man asked with much softness of tone if I could not remain a little longer, so I spread out my handkerchief, raised my umbrella, and sat down.

The old Burman seated himself at a respectful distance, and then I told him that their doctrines and customs were very bad, and that it was clear to my mind that the astrologers and priests had deceived him in order to get his property. I told him that this was not the way to obtain bliss, and if he continued in this course, he would not go to the happy land, but where there would be an eternal weeping and gnashing of teeth.

The old man looked sad, and said, "I should not like to be cheated in this way."

The heat was becoming intense, so I arose to go, fully intending to visit him again, for I had only opened a way for my teachings, but the devotee did not ask me to come again. During the day I thought often of him, and in the evening I called some Christians and repeated my visit. He was cooking his rice, and when we approached he would not speak. The Christians saw this and went to the river-side. The Burman was glad, or seemed rather pleased, when he saw that I had only a little girl with me, and said he had thought much about my remarks, and if one could not obtain merit by these sacrifices, how did I expect to escape misery? I told him that I was glad he had been thinking, and that I had come to tell him this blessed way. My people returned, and then we told him that our race was once holy, but that we had sinned and broken the law of our Great King; that this King, who was holy, could not look on sin with any degree of allowance, and that eternal misery was pronounced upon us; that the only Son of this Great One proposed to come to our world and himself to suffer the punishment of our sins, and if we repented there would be mercy for us; that he left his Father's court, came down to this world and suffered in our stead, and after conquering death and the grave, returned again to his Father's court, to plead our cause; and that the Father promised to accept us, if we would repent and trust in his beloved Son, yea, he had told us that we should be his sons and daughters.

The old devotee's countenance brightened, and then we told him that the heavenly city was made of jasper and gold, with precious stones; that the king was so resplendent with glory, that the dwellers needed not the light of the sun nor moon; that there was no poverty, no hunger, pain, nor death; that the people were all washed and made holy before they entered the new Jerusalem—all was bliss, no old age, sorrow, nor trouble, no longings for another state.

"And when do you go there?" inquired the old man with great interest.

I told him "sooner or later."

"Ah!" said he, "I like the description you give of this King and that Son. He was so good. Oh, that I could see him; I wish I were white, I should like to live there."

We assured him that this King had invited people of all climes and of all tribes to come, rich or poor, "without money and without price;" and that before the Son returned to his Father, he commanded his disciples to go to the ends of the world, and proclaim these invitations; and that was why I had come to Burmah.

"If I were young," said the old man, "I would certainly go to that country, but I must soon die."

When we saw how much interest he manifested, we told him that this was no hindrance, it was the spirit which could go, and that the body was only the dwelling. We told him that he would live if this old shed were burned up. "Oh yes, I see, I understand, go on, please." We told him that this King was God the Creator, and the Son Jesus Christ, and that blissful land, heaven.

The old man seemed somewhat confused, and we heard him muttering as he marked on the ground, "This is all very strange, but it is good; and if my forefathers had heard of this, they would never have worshipped Gandama."

We continued our blessed story, but the old listener was silent. We held out all the precious promises of our Saviour, and when the dew began to fall we told him that we must go, but we would give him a book, which would tell him more about the way, and that we would come again. He took the book rather unwillingly, and we bade him adieu.

Early the next day we left, and as we passed by the bend of the stream, we spoke of the old devotee, and just then, as the fog cleared away, we discerned the form of a man. We looked again, and as the beams of the rising sun fell upon the spot we recognised him. He had not thanked us for the book, but rather unwillingly received it; yet now he held it out, pointed up to heaven, and then clasped it to his breast. Our words could not reach his ear then, so we all bowed in our humble canoe, and prayed that the Holy Spirit might teach him to trust in Christ.

Not long after this one of our Christians went to the place, and we commissioned him to visit the old devotee and bring him to us, if he wished to come; but when they returned, the tidings were brought that the people near him did not see him for several days, and when they went to his house they found his corpse. Underneath his hand they found a bamboo, and in the hollow of it there was a book—the book that we had given him. We are ignorant of his last days. He was old and feeble; but the remembrance of his firm on the bank of the river pointing up to heaven, and his care of the boat, inspired us with hope that he had turned to Christ as his refuge. If we are permitted, through the mercy of Christ Jesus, our Lord, to enter those golden gates, would it be strange if we should be welcomed by this one, now redeemed, no longer ragged and filthy, but clothed in the white robes of paradise?—Mrs. M. B. Ingalls.

"LET HIM WHO LOVES ME, FOLLOW."

Is related in the annals of the Ottoman empire, that when Amurath II. died, which was very suddenly, his son and destined successor, Mohammed, was about a day's journey distant in Asia Minor. Every day of interregnum in that fierce and turbulent monarchy is attended with extreme peril. The death of the deceased Sultan was therefore concealed, and a secret message despatched to the young prince to hasten without an instant's delay to the capital. On receiving the message, he leaped on a powerful Arab charger at hand, and turning to his attendants, uttered these few words, "Let him who loves me, follow!"

This prince afterwards became one of the most powerful sovereigns of the Ottoman line. And those who approved their courage and loyalty by following him in this critical and perilous moment of his fortunes, were magnificently rewarded.

Now there is another prince—the Prince of Peace, the Son of the King eternal and immortal, whom the Father hath appointed heir of all things, and who is now setting forth "to receive a kingdom." He, too, says to those around him, "Let him who loves me, follow!"

Which of us is willing to hear the summons, and to embark our all with the hopes and fortunes of this great Prince? When that young man called on his attendants to "follow," they knew their path only from his leading: he gave them no explanations; his words implied that great and mysterious perils were before him. But he allowed no delay, no reserves, no questionings, no preparations, no nice balancings of hope and fear, loss and gain. What he exacted was included in that one word—"follow."

So it is with Christ. The summons which he addressed to so many of his first disciples is still addressed to us: "Follow me." Our whole duty and loyalty to him lie in those two words. To follow him is to obey him, to imitate him, to confess him before men, to bear his reproach, to identify ourselves with his Church and cause in its low and afflicted state here on earth. All this we must do from love. "Let him who loves me, follow!" Even a worldly prince, of generous soul, delights in being served from love. And this divine Prince says, "I love them that love me." "My son, give me thine heart?"

Sweet will be the fellowship by the way, and glorious the reward at the end, of those who follow Christ from love.

There is no more sublime promise in the Bible than that: "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me."

GRAFTING BY THE WAYSIDE.

Is riding one day, early in the spring, I passed a man of my acquaintance in the road about a quarter of a mile from his own house.

A basket with scions and implements for grafting was by his side, and a young, thrifty apple-tree, which sprung up beside an embankment wall, was protruding some of its branches just over his head, as he sat on the railing. I stopped to speak with him, and he said to me, that, as he had been grafting some fruit trees in his garden, he thought he would come and set some grafts in this tree by the roadside, which he had observed many times, as a very thrifty tree, well situated on the south side of the wall. Remarking that I presumed he did not expect to eat much of the fruit, I inquired whether he proposed to graft winter fruit or early apples. He replied, "I thought I would graft some good early apples, the best kind, perhaps they will do somebody some good." Some months afterwards, in passing over that much travelled road, I saw that the grafts were alive and shooting up with a vigorous growth, as if rejoicing to fulfil the generous purpose of the good man, who had come so far from his own premises to insert them there beside the thoroughfare, where the hand of any traveller might some day reach and pluck delicious fruit. The design of that Christian man struck me as worthy of a Christian heart. It will be a beautiful sight, one of these years, to see that tree laden with fair, inviting fruit, and offering itself thus to the passing traveller. Many a weary wayfarer may eat the grateful fruit and bless the man who grafted that tree by the wayside.

That man was not one to neglect his own garden. I have often observed with pleasure in passing his house, that his own trees are all grafted and cared for; and every part of his premises bears the marks of the nicest culture.

This little incident was richly suggestive to my mind. It starts the question for Christians, whether labours somewhat like this ought not to be more common in their individual practice. Of course, each one must keep his own vineyard. But "the field is the world;" "Do good to all men;" "The highways and hedges" are to be visited by the servants of Christ on errands of mercy.

Are there not some trees by the wayside which you can graft, and which, by the blessing of God, shall bear delicious fruit to regale some strangers and wayfarers on the pilgrimage of life? When you are applying a diligent hand to keeping your own heart in the love of God, and to home culture, and to the Sabbath school, that garden which the Church cultivates for Christ,—seeking there from the children the precious fruits of early piety,—it is Christ-like to look beyond home interests, and bestow labour also upon neglected spots, where now only wild and worthless fruit is growing. Is there not some neglected child that you can bring into the Sabbath school?—or some Sabbath wanderer whom you can influence to go to the house of God?—or some fallen one, struggling with temptation, cast off, and thinking within himself, "Nobody cares for me," whom you can reclaim and save?

Selfishness and love of ease may repress the rising purpose of benevolence, by asking, "Who will eat the fruit? It will do me no good." But it should be remembered that there is reward enough in the satisfaction of having done the beneficent work. The richest blessedness is in giving, not in receiving. The great Master, who always remembers the cup of cold water given in his name, will see to it that your labour of love is not in vain.

Let me give examples. A lady, in walking to church, met a vagrant boy standing at the corner of a street. She spoke kindly to him, and persuaded him to go to the Sabbath school, where he became a Christian. Afterwards he became a devoted and useful missionary to the heathen.

A man gave a tract to an orphan boy with a word of Christian counsel, which was the means of leading him to love the Saviour; and then he felt that he wanted every little boy and girl to have "a book about Jesus." That boy was manifestly the means of leading many souls to Christ.

Many a narrative of conversion has been like that of the young man who said in a little Sabbath evening conference meeting, referring to the instrumentality of a tract given to him, "My friends, a week ago to-night I was without hope and without God in the world; but I think the Lord has forgiven my sins, and that I have become a new creature in Jesus Christ. The reading of a tract which was kindly given me was blessed by the Holy Spirit to awaken my heart and conscience, and lead me, I trust, to the Friend of sinners. And oh, what a Friend!" The instances of the usefulness of evangelical tracts and of tract distribution are too numerous to be reckoned up, and too dearly owned of God as the means of converting sinners of all classes, to be doubted. Go out into the highways and hedges; carry tracts with you as scions to graft into the young and growing trees that now yield unsightly and bitter fruit. "Be not weary in well-doing."

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

ROOTS OF BITTERNESS; THE AILMENT AND THE CURE.

A SERMON TO CHILDREN BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT, AUTHOR OF "ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BOOK OF PROVERBS," ETC.

"Looking diligently lest any man fall of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled."—HEB. xii. 15.

HERE is a whole parable in a single verse. The apostles had learned from their Lord to employ pictures in order to make their lessons more striking and memorable. Their pictures were taken sometimes from the history of human life, sometimes from the habits of animals, and sometimes from the growth of flowers and trees. The lesson which this verse teaches is found growing in the ground. The apostle Paul shows us here how to gather wisdom from beneath our feet. Under the likeness of a root, this text teaches us something about the nature, the source, the effects, and the cure of SIN.

I. The NATURE of sin. It is a root; and the root is bitter.

1. It is a root. In many points sin is like a root. For one thing, the root is always below the ground; it is never seen. The surface of a field, when you pass it, may be smooth and bare; and yet the field may be neglected, and foul, and incapable of bearing fruit. Beneath the ground, unseen, there may be a multitude of strong living roots that will soon cover the whole surface with leaves, and flowers, and fruits. Such is sin in human hearts: it does not always lie hid; but neither does it always come out into view. There are times when no evil word can be heard from the lip, and no wicked act can be seen in the life, and yet the person may be very sinful all the while. As the stalks grow up at one season of the year, and disappear at another, while the root which bears them remains alive at all seasons under ground, so the sinful words or deeds may break out into great strength at one time, and at another time cease; while the root of sinfulness grows still strong in the heart, and is ready to bear its fruit whenever an opportunity is offered. Again, the root is always growing greater as long as it is left living. It never stands still; it is always striking deeper down into the ground, and spreading wider on every side. It is its nature not to stand still, but to be always increasing. Such also is sin in the heart: the longer it remains the stronger it grows. After one sinful deed has been done, there is a root in the evil heart beneath which will produce another; there is a growing root beneath which will produce another worse. If the sinful desires that grow in your heart this year be not crushed and killed, it will be more difficult and more painful to crush and kill them next year; if these evil desires are not plucked out while you are young, it will be all but impossible to pluck them out when you are old. In yet another point you may observe a likeness between sin and a root; while it is easy to destroy the flowers and fruits, and even the branches of any hurtful plant, it may be next to impossible to tear the root completely from the ground. A farmer is often sorely disappointed after he has cut the weeds over by the surface, and even tried to pull out the roots, to see the old enemy growing up as strong and thick as ever on the spot. Some portions of the root had been left in the ground, and from these the new plants have shot up again. Ah, parents have often found, after wicked actions have been checked by chastening, that the evil disposition has been left lurking in secret, and has burst into wickedness again whenever it found an opening!

2. The root is bitter. Everything depends on the nature and kind of the root that grows in the soil. The earth, and the air, and the sun, and the rain nourish every plant that grows. Good and evil trees may grow beside each other in the same field. The same ground ripens bitter fruit on one plant, and sweet fruit on another. One tree turns the sap and fatness of the earth into poison; another tree turns the sap and fatness of the earth into food. There is a plant called deadly nightshade, which may be seen in some parts of this country growing wild in the hedges. Both in the manner of its growth and the form of its fruit-clusters, it is like the grape-vine; but its fruit is a poison. Now, this plant might grow beside a vine; might twine round the vine, both in its roots beneath and its branches above the surface; the bunches of fruit growing separately each on its own stem, similar in form and colour, might touch each other as they hung half hidden among the leaves: and yet the two are as widely different as good and evil; the one is deadly poison, the other wholesome food. The fruit follows the root: no matter how rich the ground, how abundant the rain, how bright the sunshine, if the root be a "root of bitterness," bitter also will be the fruit. Thus sin, growing in the heart, turns all the powers of our nature into evil. The understanding mind and the glowing affections, the seeing eye and the speaking lips, the nimble feet and the cunning hand—all are turned into poison by the corrupt desire that nestles deep in the soul like a root under ground. These powers of our nature would nourish good fruit, if a new and holy tree were planted in the heart—a tree of righteousness, the planting of the Lord. Saul of Tarsus possessed learning, and eloquence, and energy, and perseverance, and a fiery, unfainting heart, that would stick at nothing on which it was bent; but the bitter root was in the man, and it sucked up all the sap of his being and turned it into fruits of wickedness. All his varied powers were employed in catching and murdering the innocent disciples of Jesus. But when the bitter root was burned out of him on the way to Damascus by the flash of Christ's redeeming love, and the plant of a renewed nature left living in its stead, all his powers were forthwith exerted in serving God and saving men. On the same soil, from which a bitter root had drawn poison, the new life of faith brought forth many fruits of righteousness.

II. The source of sin. I do not at present speak of the first tempter and the first temptation. I neither tell the story of our first parents' fall, nor explain the doctrine of original sin. Our business is with ourselves; and I ask you to think of this plain, but awful truth, that the roots of bitterness are not planted by other people, but spring up within ourselves. In the text we do not read, "Lest any root of bitterness be brought in," but, "Lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you." When we see a stream rushing downward to the sea, we sometimes ask the question, Where is its source? If you trace the river upward, you will find it springing out of the ground. Thus, when a sinful life is flowing like a stream, and any one asks whence it comes, Jesus leads us to the sinner's own heart, and bids us see it "springing up" there: "Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders," &c. (Matt. xv. 19).

Have you seen a field ploughed, harrowed, broken, and smoothed by the roller, and left brown and bare to the rains and sun of summer? If you pass the same field two or three weeks afterwards, you will find that it is no longer brown and bare; it is green all over. A multitude of plants that cannot be numbered have sprung up and covered its surface; they are all busily unfolding their leaves, and opening their flowers, and preparing to produce their fruit. They are all useless and hurtful; they are roots of bitterness every one. Whence came they? The owner of the field certainly did not plant them, for he grieves to see them growing, and he is preparing by much hard labour to kill them and cast them out. Perhaps an enemy hath done this? No; the man's enemies, if he has any, would not in our country and our day take the trouble of planting these seeds in his field. The useless and mischievous plants grow of their own accord. They are native in the ground, and whenever the field is let alone they spring up. Wheat and other good grain must be brought to the spot and sown; but weeds spring of themselves. The seeds and roots are lying beforehand in the ground.

How very like the growth of evil in human life! When good grows in us, the seed of it has been sent from heaven and sown in our hearts; but evil is native, and springs of itself. Have you observed how readily even a very young child will tell a lie to hide his own fault, or fly into a passion and strike a sister or brother younger than himself? It is a mistake to lay the blame on other people, and say that they have taught the child naughty habits; the child did not need lessons in sinning. The seeds and roots of these bad things lay natively in his heart, and sprang up of their own accord into open acts of wickedness. It is quite true also that bad example adds to the evil that grows within ourselves. Wicked neighbours do not first make us evil; but when we are evil in our heart first, they may make us worse. It is therefore right to guard against temptations from others; but it is wrong to suppose that we will be all right if our neighbours do not corrupt us. We are in ourselves corrupt, and there lies the greatest danger. There were weeds growing in the fields of America before the people of Europe discovered it; but now, other and worse weeds, that belonged to Europe, have been carried over, and have spread through all the land; so that in America there are some bitter roots growing that were native in the soil, and also other bitter roots that have been carried to it from Europe. And as it is with weeds in the ground, so it is with sins in the people's life. There were sins, many and great, growing in the hearts and actions of the North American Indians before the white men found them; but the white men brought over to them other sins that they had not known before; and now the poor brown men of the American woods are overrun with a terrible mixture of their own native, sinful habits, and the new sinful habits which the white men have taught them. Every child should first watch his own heart, where sin springs up of itself; and next be careful of the company he keeps, lest he learn from others wicked words and ways in addition to his own.

III. The effects of sin. I do not now trace out all the poisonous fruits which the bitter roots of sin bear in time and eternity; I speak only of the two which are named in the text—"trouble you, and thereby many be defiled." Sin troubles the sinner himself, and defiles his neighbours.

1. It troubles you. It troubles the world, a nation, a church, a family, a single person. But observe, although the bitter root springing up often disturbs the peace of a country, and rends asunder a Church, the root never springs from the ground between two persons or two companies; it always springs in the persons themselves. The troubler is not only among us, he is within us; and if he were not allowed to dwell within us, he never could contrive to disturb the peace between us and our neighbours.

The root of bitterness that grows strongest in one child is selfishness; in another, anger; in another, falsehood; in another, disobedience to parents. But though these roots are all as different from each other as thistles, and nettles, and thorns, they are alike in that all have sharp prickles, and the sharp prickles pierce the flesh of all who come within their reach. One is stung by nettles, and another is torn by thorns; but all are troubled in whom the roots of bitterness are allowed to grow. I have seen a group of children seated in a circle on the green grass at play; as I passed I saw that every face was beautiful as the flowers which they were weaving into crowns, and every eye sparkling like the sunlight in the brook that was flowing at their feet. When I returned by the same path, half an hour later, the circle was broken up, the half-plaited flower-crowns were scattered on the sward, the girls were running homeward in terror, and the two biggest boys were fighting and bleeding on the spot where lately they had played. Ah! a troubler has been here; and he did not come from a distance; he sprang up, not only among the merry group of children, but within the living, throbbing heart of a child. A secret thought of envy, an angry look, a bad name, a snatch, a blow—how quickly from the invisible seed the bitter root sprang up, and how sorely it troubled all the company!

Sin troubles the sinner with deeper and more enduring troubles than these. The stings of conscience in time, and the wrath of God in eternity, are the fully ripened fruits which this root of bitterness bears. Felix felt the one trouble, when he trembled on his judgment-seat; the rich man felt the other, when he lifted up his eyes in torment. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death" (James i. 15). Such is its dreadful end, unless it be itself taken away by Christ. For this very purpose Christ came into the world, that he might through his blood make an end of sin, so that the bitter root shall not in any of his people bring forth its fruit of the second death. Sin troubles even Christians while they live; but already they are delivered from its curse, and soon they shall be delivered from its presence and power for ever.

2. It defiles others. If a careless farmer permit thistles to grow, and ripen, and run to seed on his own field, he injures thereby the field of his neighbour. You may have seen on a sunny, breezy harvest day, a number of small white feathery atoms, sailing quickly through the air above your heads. These are the seeds of thistles and other similar weeds, hastening away to sow themselves on new ground, and so multiply their mischief. The thistles should have been torn out of the ground before they had time to bear their seed. The man who allowed them to ripen has both troubled himself and defiled the fields of his neighbours. On this account, there are laws in some countries providing for the punishment of those who allow certain hurtful plants to ripen seed on their ground. Such a root is sin: when it is allowed to grow in you, it spreads and pollutes your neighbours. For example, many grown men, and not a few young children, take the name of God in vain, and otherwise utter profane words. These sounds from foul lips fly through the air, like thistle-seeds on the wind, and falling on the ears of the young, deeply defile their hearts. Beware! Let no word or act proceed from you that would corrupt another. There is a law in heaven, if not on earth, that will not hold you guiltless, if you permit evil words and ways to spread and pollute a neighbour. Each of us is our brother's keeper; and if by our sins we defile his soul, God will require his blood at our hands. Beware lest you get harm from another; beware lest you do harm to another. Look unto Jesus, and follow his steps. He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners." Those who are called by his name should copy his character.

IV. The cure of sin. In the text it is expressed by these words, "Looking diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God." It appears, then, that two things go to the cure of sin—or the killing of this root of bitterness; these are, our diligence and God's grace. This does not mean that we owe our salvation partly to ourselves and partly to God. No: Christ is all our salvation; he alone has finished the work. No part of it is of our working; it is all his free gift. But it is also true, that God expects us to watch, and pray, and strive to get his mercy that we may be saved; no one who is true and honest will refuse this. His free salvation is very precious; we should fear to miss it, strive to get it.

1. Our own diligent look. "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." "Seek ye first the kingdom of God." "Take heed, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief." In the Bible we are commanded to be watchful and diligent in turning from sin and closing with Christ; surely this is a reasonable service. "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?"

A farmer looks diligently after the state of his field. He cannot lie down to sleep in peace if his land is over-run with thorns and thistles. He watches them when they first spring, and labours to root them out, lest they destroy his harvest. We should go and do likewise, for the saving of our souls. If we carelessly allow worldliness, and vanity, and falsehood, and anger, and such like to grow and ripen in our hearts, and lips, and lives, we are throwing ourselves away. If in some part of your flesh a little knot should begin to grow, and spread, and strike its roots every day more deep; and if the doctor should tell you it was a cancer, which would soon destroy your life, you would not carelessly let it alone. You would say to the man of skill, with a piercing look and a fluttering heart, Can this deadly thing be rooted out of my body? And if it could be taken out, you would plead that it should be taken out now, ere it had time to strike deeper into the fountains of your life. Oh, if we could learn to look as diligently to the disease that is rooted in the soul, and endangers the life eternal! The cry, "What must we do to be saved?" is a very sound and sensible cry. He who raises it is in his right mind; and he is mad who puts off that greatest question till he be in his feeblest state and in his latest hour.

2. The grace of God. It is this that can save from the present power and future punishment of sin. Our diligent look cannot work our salvation; but we are told to look diligently lest we should miss the salvation of God, which has been completed by Christ, and is offered free. The grace of God means his free gift, and his greatest gift is the Son of his love.

The particular warning which the text gives is, "lest any one fail of the grace of God." It means, if in any of us the grace of God fail—if it do not enter into our hearts like the good seed, and grow and bear fruit there, the bitter roots will prevail and ruin us. Farmers use the very same word in regard to the good seed which has been sown in their fields. In some parts of the ground, from various causes, the seed either never springs, or withers soon after it has sprung. These parts are empty while the corn grows in other parts. The seed has "failed" in these places; this is the term employed to describe the accident. What then? Then there is not only the loss of the precious grain, but also the growth of hurtful weeds. It is when and where the good seed "fails" that the bitter roots spring up abundant. The same law holds good in "God's husbandry" within a human heart. If the good seed of the word is carried away by the evil one, so that it never springs, or springing on stony ground is scorched up and withered by temptations, the bitter roots thrive in the empty place. The Holy Spirit in the heart is the only power that will keep evil spirits out. The word of Christ dwelling in you richly will drive the vain thoughts away. A farmer sometimes speaks of "cleaning" his field, that is, killing all the weeds. But how can this be done? It is never thoroughly done except by getting it all covered closely by a thick thriving crop of good seed. It is when the good seed fails that the bitter roots prosper; and when the good seed thrives that the bitter roots are destroyed. According to the same law, we succeed or fail in our efforts to cast evil habits from a human heart. Sow the good seed there; if it is received into a softened soil and grows, the evil that has sprung native in that heart will be kept down and weakened by degrees, until it is at last cast out. If Christ dwell in your hearts by faith, sin will not be allowed to dwell along with him; but on the other hand, if he is kept out, all sorts of evil thoughts and habits will live and thrive within.

LIFE LESSONS.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON.

"Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear."—1 SAM. xvii. 36.

EVERYTHING almost has an enemy. The fox is after the rabbit, the hound after the fox; the hawk is after the sparrow, the fowler after the hawk. And all of us have enemies! Not that we make them by quarrelling.

If we are gentle and forgiving, we shall easily live in peace with our families, neighbours, and friends; but the enemies I speak of are spiritual—"We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers; against the ruler of the darkness of this world." Depend upon it, dear children, we shall never get on in the best things, we shall never get through this vale of tears, we shall never reach heaven, without much opposition—without many a battle. I do not want to frighten you, but simply to forewarn you. If you had a journey before you, which began in a lovely flower garden, but soon led on to frightful precipices and rugged mountains, would it not be kind to tell you the truth? If you had a voyage before you, which began in a lily-fringed lake, but soon led on to a rushing river full of snags and beset with pirates, would it not be cruel to conceal it from you?

But if we have these enemies to encounter, the Bible shows us how to encounter them; and I want to bring David up as a beautiful example of Christian courage. I say Christian courage, for his was not mere coolness such as young men boast of; it was, as we shall see, the fruit of his piety.

He was tending his father's sheep on the green hill-sides of Bethlehem. How happy he must have been in that quiet work! He could play his harp, and study the birds, and the blossoms, and the ways of his flock, and pray and sing—and none to trouble him. Yet he was far from being safe. In the thickets, and amongst the rocks around, there lurked savage beasts of prey, always on the watch to spring out, always whetting their lips for a dainty morsel. He and his fold seemed secure, just as you fancy yourself secure because your soul-enemies are not visible; but one day, whilst David was at a short distance from his charge, lo and behold! a lion—a Syrian lion, the image of that which is now in Regent's Park—stole forth, and, quick as lightning, seized a lamb, and bore it bleating away. But, quick as lightning, David ran to the rescue. "I went out after him," he says, "and smote him."—He hit him a blow either with a stick or stone, and he dropped the bleeding lamb, and flew at David; but now, "when he arose against me," he says, "I caught him by the beard, and slew him." Probably he means that he held him by the hairy under-jaw, so that he could not bite him, whilst with the other hand he continued to wield his club, until he fell dead on the ground. It was a noble act to follow an untamed lion, to infuriate him, and then to close with him for a death-grapple!

Nor was this his only feat. A hungry angry bear is perhaps more ferocious than a lion; but when a bear did what the lion had done, David was as undaunted as when the lion was the robber, and he did to the bear what he had done to the lion. The bear's carcase, as well as the lion's, testified to David's fearlessness. He never forgot those two occasions, those two spots, those two shaggy growling monsters, those two desperate struggles. Would you ever have forgotten them?

First, Notice that David fought these creatures though they were so terrible.

You may think that you would not have minded confronting them; but go to a menagerie and look at a real lion or a real bear. Even through the bars, they are formidable; but what would they be if the cage-door was thrown open, and you and they were face to face? A few weeks since a poor ostler in London was crossing the stable-yard, when suddenly a lion sprang on him and dragged him to the floor. How helpless he was! The brute tossed him about as a cat does a mouse! You recollect the picture of Dr. Livingstone lying prostrate under a maddened lion in Africa. I have read of American hunters whom wounded bears had pounced upon, and hugged till their eyes started from their heads and every bone was crushed! But here David challenged both the lion and the bear, and overcame them! So we are not to be afraid of our soul's enemies because they are so strong and so vengeful. We need not yield to their bidding or their threats. They may swell themselves and talk alarmingly, but if God be for us, who shall be against us? The devil himself trembles when the weakest saint attacks him valiantly.—“Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.”

Secondly, Notice that David fought these creatures though he was so young.

He was but a lad. “Thou art but a youth,” said Saul to him. And again, it is said of him, “He was but a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance.” Later in the chapter he is called “a stripling.” He was junior to all his brethren. Scarcely had seventeen summers bronzed his cheeks; neither his bodily nor his mental vigour were perfect. Had he been older and more accustomed to dangers, it would have been different. But immature as he was, he threw himself hardily on both the lion and the bear.

Children ask, “What can I do to withstand evil? I am but a boy or a girl; I am frail and feeble.” But you are able to defy your soul's enemies, if you do it rightly. They can no more compel a child than a grown-up person. If you are as resolute as David was, you will be more than a conqueror as he was. It is your own fault if the lion or the bear steal your purity or your peace—those tender kids. You cannot prevent them from assailing them, but you can prevent them from devouring them. An infant may be a hero; an infant may be a coward. I could point you to Sunday scholars who are wrestling with lions and bears every week.

Thirdly, Notice that David fought these creatures though he was unarmed.

This was remarkable. He was not a warrior in breast-plate and greaves, with shield and sword. He was not equipped even as Esau may have been, with bow or spear for the chase. He had no weapons. When afterwards Saul put his own helmet on him and his coat of mail, David was distressed.—“I am unaccustomed to these,” he said; and he begged to be excused from wearing them. For the combat with the giant, he took nothing but his sling and five smooth pebbles. These were familiar to him, these were the only things he had ever used. We may suppose, therefore, that these were what he subdued the lion and the bear with. In his common clothes, with these simple instruments, he pursued them towards their dens, met their onslaught and stretched them on the sod. Samson tore a lion's mouth asunder, but then Samson was a Hercules. David did not pretend to more than ordinary nerve and muscle.

We may be unskilled and apparently unprotected against our soul's enemies; but that is no reason why we should cower before them. God can cover us against their teeth and talons, and guide our “smooth pebbles” to their vital parts. He has expressly said that he employs “foolish things”—what appear to men to be foolish things—“to confound the wise.” It does not require learning or experience to rebuke a swearer, or a Sabbath-breaker, or an infidel, or a drunkard.

Notice, fourthly, that David fought these creatures though he was alone.

That, too, was wonderful. Who is not twice as daring when others are with him! David dared the advancing Goliath in the presence of tens of thousands of applauding spectators; but here he flung himself upon the lion and the bear without a witness—not a brother, not an attendant was near; there was no human succour for him. Had he been overmastered, the animals would have eaten him, and nothing but a crimson pool would have told the tale. So Daniel yielded himself to be lowered to the lions, alone, and yet uncomplaining. So Joseph had to endure the perils of Egypt alone. So Jesus encountered Satan alone in the wilderness. We shall have to meet many temptations alone—none can aid us. When we are solitary, as David was, our soul-enemies spread their nets.—It is their opportunity. They reckon on an easy conquest now. And we are apt to be timid then. But are we alone? Can we be alone with God so close by? Therefore we ought to be as bold and brave as if a whole regiment were at our backs, or a guard of angels hovering over us.

Finally, Notice that David fought these creatures in God's strength.

He was strong, but he was not strong enough of himself—nay, he renounced his own might, as he did Saul's suit of armour, and girded himself in the might of Jehovah. That upturned eye, that whispered breath, “God help me,”—it was David saying, “I cannot do it myself, but in thy strength I can do anything.” Hark how he lays it all at God's feet: “The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me from this Philistine.” He said the same to the scornful Philistine himself: “I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts. He will deliver thee into mine hand.” So, referring to these awful hours in his psalms, he sings: “He sent from above. He took me. He drew me out of the deep water. He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me, for they were too strong for me. Because thou hast been my help, therefore under the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice." That was the secret of his success; that was why the lion and the bear kissed the dust. He was strong in the favour of God, in faith in God, in the Spirit of God. When in his riper years he failed in these, he was no match for milder foes than lions and bears. What was the difference between Peter in the judgment-hall, denying to a silly maid that he knew Christ, and Peter in the council chamber glorying in being counted worthy to be scourged for Christ before the assembled sanhedrim? Was it not this, that in the judgment-hall he was trying to fight the lion and the bear in his own strength ("though all men should deny thee, yet will not I"), whereas in the council chamber, he was calmly resting on the strength of his sympathizing and suffering Saviour?

We are to apply to Jesus for strength for all our duties and trials.—"My grace is sufficient for thee." "Without me ye can do nothing." Memorable sentences. Lord, engrave them upon our hearts! Nor is it a fancy that he will give you his strength if you seek it. It is promised; and it is his delight to bestow it. When we are tempted to falsehood, he will strengthen us to be true,—when we are tempted to be angry, he will strengthen us to be meek,—when we are tempted to pride, he will strengthen us to be humble,—when we are tempted to be selfish, he will strengthen us to be loving. The converted Indian maiden said to her heathen torturers, "My new chief (Jesus) will go into the fire with me, if you burn me, and he and I shall laugh at the flames,"—she understood that Christ would be her strength in martyrdom. And so, whatever befalls us, we shall come out of it bright as gold, if we do but go into it leaning on our Saviour's bosom. The lion and the bear will vex us to the last, but, "looking to Jesus," we may hope never to be spoiled by them.

"JOY OVER ONE."

The sharp, quick sound of a crier's bell was heard above the rattle of carriages and the hum of multitudes hastening home as night came on, and the words, "Child lost! child lost!" fell upon the ears, and sent a thrill of pain to the hearts of fathers and mothers, as the crier slowly passed up the street to the next owner, where he stopped to give a description of the wanderer.

How many held their breath and listened!

"Child lost! Child lost! A little girl—not quite three years of age—her hair light and curly—eyes blue; when she left home she was dressed in a scarlet frock and white apron—has been missing four hours!" And again the bell was heard as the crier went on, proclaiming as he went the same mournful story.

And where all this time was little Lily Ashton?

Soon after she left her father's door, she made the acquaintance of other children in the street, with whom she played awhile, and then many things amused her as she ran along on the crowded sidewalk, unnoticed by the busy throng; but at length she discovered that her home was no longer in sight, and that no dear papa or mamma answered her call; and the poor little lost one sat down on a door-step and wept bitterly. A kind-hearted gentleman came that way—one who loved children, and who was never happier than when they smiled on him from their bright faces, which they could hardly help doing, when he smiled so pleasantly on them, and who was always ready to speak comforting words when they were in trouble.

"What's the matter, little Blossom?" he asked.

His voice was so full of love that Lily stopped crying, and brushing back her curls, looked up to see who it was that spoke to her. The light from a street-lamp above her shone full upon his benevolent face. "I isn't 'little Blossom'; I is Lily, and I want mamma," she said, and the tears began to flow again.

"But Lily won't cry any more, because we will go and find mamma. Will Lily go with me?"

Her tears ceased flowing, and she looked up into the kind face once more. "Has you got a little girl, and is she 'little Blossom'?"

"No, my dear; I have no Lily nor Blossom, only when I find one such as you; but I love little girls and boys, and I don't like to see you cry. Will you go with me to find your mamma?" Lily stood up and put her hand in his, for her heart was won.

The kind gentleman lifted the tired little girl in his arms, and carried her to the nearest police-station, where he knew he would learn what she could not tell him about her home. And in a short time he placed the lost darling in the arms of her mother, whose anguish was thus turned into joy. He found other children, brothers and sisters, in that home; and as the parents and children gathered about little Lily, lost an hour before, but now found, and as they laughed and wept by turns, he felt that he was receiving a richer reward in seeing their happiness—their joy over one dear child—than any thanks, however earnest, could be.

I know you do not wonder that this family were so glad to see Lily again. But their gladness reminds me—perhaps it has reminded you also—of some of the words of Jesus, "Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." Can you tell why the happy family of the redeemed in heaven are joyful when a sinner repents? A sinner, you know, is one who is disobeying God—who does not love nor trust in Christ—who is lost in the world, and who will never find the way to that beautiful home above unless he repents. Do you not think that if you were in heaven, and could hear that some one on earth, who had been wicked, had repented and begun to love Jesus, and was coming to be in heaven too—happy and holy for ever—you would be glad?

Perhaps some dear friends of yours are there now, and they are hoping to hear that you are in the way to the same home, if you are not already in it. Dear child, have you begun to walk in that path which leads to the "beautiful city built above?" Come with the children of God, and there will be joy in heaven over you far beyond that which was felt in Lily's family when she was found, for One is there who loves you far more than any friend here on earth can love, and he will receive you gladly into the number of the blessed.—The Child at Home.

"THE POOR YE HAVE ALWAYS WITH YOU."

It was a bright, beautiful June morning when I met upon one of the quiet streets of the city, a poor, miserable-looking cripple. A thrill of pain first impelled me to pass silently by; but then the thought came into my mind—Perhaps a few kind words might prove like sunshine to his heart.

He was pitifully deformed, the cords and tendons of the system having become contracted, so that his crooked limbs crossed each other, making him walk in a tottering, staggering manner. His arms were curved so that they could no more be straightened, and his fingers drawn up so that they looked more like the claws of some large bird than parts of a human hand. His long, light hair falling from beneath a crushed hat, partly shielded his distorted face from notice. One arm pressed against his side a portfolio of cheap pictures, by the sale of which he gained the pittance that still held the soul to that poor, suffering body.

He was pleased to have his pictures praised, and though he could hardly talk plainly, he did not seem unwilling to receive a little wayside call. I asked him if he did not get weary with his heavy portfolio?

"Oh yes, ma'am," said he, "but it buys my bread. It is all I can do."

"Have you a mother living?"

"I had one, ma'am, who always took care of me; but she died four years ago."

"Have you no father?"

"I never saw my father. He is dead too. A kind man took care of me after mother died, but he's been dead a year now, and I've no friends—no home."

"You know of God and heaven?"

"Oh yes, ma'am," and his face gleamed with a holy light, as looking heavenward he said, "I have got a trust, ma'am."

How beautiful he seemed then! Like one transformed I saw in him the image of our dear Saviour, as I answered, "Oh, you have a home, then, and a rest not far away. If you are Jesus' child nothing can really harm you; for with a great deal of love he is watching over you. Life here looks dark and full of trouble; but your best Friend suffered more even than you. He was lonely. He had no home, and enemies were all about him; but he is in a beautiful home now, and if you truly love him, he is preparing a mansion there for you too."

"Oh yes; there I shall be like any other, there I shall be like—him."

The faith of this simple, humble Christian, whom the Saviour calls "one of the least of these my brethren," awakened emotion too deep for other words, and simply saying, "Good-bye, my friend; I hope we shall meet one day beside our Saviour," I hastened to the silence of my room to dwell upon the wonderful love of Him "who seeth not as man seeth," but makes "his dwelling with the humble and the contrite ones."

A few days after I learned that this poor youth was suffering the taunts and jeers of rude boys, and that even well-dressed ladies and gentlemen stood upon the street-corners laughing at his awkward gait. Oh, how I wished they could have shared the secret which that bright morning revealed to me,—that he was one of Jesus' friends.

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me," are the words of Christ. Be careful then, boys, how you treat the unfortunate. The weakest and most miserable children have the tenderest care of the Great Father. Act toward the poor as you would to the Man of sorrows were he beside you. Then when all his friends shall throw off the mask of poverty and human wretchedness, to be clothed upon with a Redeemer's righteousness, you may be welcomed as one of those who, through kindness to some of them shown on account of love to the dear Saviour, have entertained the Master himself unawares.

A LITTLE CHILD'S NIGHT-THOUGHTS.

Now my mother dear has left me,
With her sweetest good-night kiss;
And the dark is all about me,—
Oh, how very dark it is!
And I've said my little prayer
To my Father in the sky:
"Heavenly Father, keep me safely, While all night asleep I lie."

My dear mother says the angels
Watch all night beside my bed,
With their loving eyes wide open,
And their shining wings outspread.
What, then, should I be afraid of?
Though 'tis very dark, I know,
That's no matter to the angels,
Their bright eyes can pierce it through.

Oh, how kind is God to spare them
From their singing by his throne!
Just because his little Mary
Does not like to be alone.

Little angels, how I love you,
 Though I cannot see your eyes;
 But I love Him best who sends you
 From your home up in the skies.

You are his own little children,
 And obedient children too;
 For I know you never murmur
 Whatso'er he bids you do.
 Little angels, when the day breaks,
 And my mother calls me too,
 In my bed I will not linger,
 But I straight will think of you.

And I'll thank our Father kneeling,
 For his kindness through the night;
 Asking him to keep me safely
 All the while that it is light.
 And then all day I'll remember
 How you never disobey,
 And my feet and hands shall gladly
 Do whate'er my parents say.

So at eve my mother'll whisper,
 When she kisses me good-night;
 "May God bless my little angel,
 Keep her safe till morning light."

THE GREAT TREE AND THE LITTLE BUSH.

BY JENNY BRADFORD.

Oh, children, do let me tell you about something curious I saw the other day. It was a currant-bush growing on a grand old elm—the largest elm in the country, they say. Shall I tell you how it came there—as high as the roof of the house?

One dark night, years ago, a furious storm came howling around the brave elm, and seized one of her fairest boughs. The frightened thing clung shivering to its mother, and its sisters crowded around to protect it; but nothing would pacify the angry storm. He shook, and twisted, and wrenched the poor branch, until at last it was torn from its mother, and dashed to the ground. Ah! you should have seen what the sun saw the next morning, when he came to visit his favourite elm—how the poor branch lay wet and trembling on the earth, and how its mother showered her tears upon it, as she swayed to and fro in her grief!

Well, years past away, but the noble elm never forgot her beautiful child. The wound in her heart was healed, to be sure, but it left a very deep scar.

At last it happened, one day, that a little bird, a robin red-breast, I think, hopping about the garden, picked a stem of ripe, red currants, and said to himself, "Now, I'll fly up in the big tree, and have a dainty little feast." So up he flew, and lighted on the very knot from which the great limb had been broken. And when red-breast had finished his meal, and flown singing away, just one little currant-seed was left. When birdie was fairly out of sight and hearing, this seed began to say to itself:—

"Well, I should like to know what that robin expects! He must know this is a pretty place to leave a currant-seed—way up here where it never can grow! Why couldn't he have dropped me down in the garden? and I would have grown to be a nice bush, with round, red currants for little Mary to pick; but here—"and the poor seed sighed a sigh of despair.

But at last it said to itself, "Every currant-seed must do the best it can. Maybe I can be of some use even here; I'll try."

Now, the summer wind had gathered into the crevice of the tree where it was lying a handful of dust from the road below. Into this little bed our lonely seed nestled. The kindly old sun warmed it; a gentle shower moistened it; and before long, a slender root was searching its way down through the earth and into the soft wood, and two tiny currant-leaves were peering up to the light. Wasn't it a happy seed then? All summer it grew as fast as ever it could, and when winter came to wrap it in its white nightgown of snow, it was almost as tall as your baby. There it flourishes yet, and I do not believe there is a more happy or useful currant-bush in any garden than this, growing three times as high as any hand can reach. The birds call it their bush, and many a merry dinner-party they have in it, bobbing their pretty heads this way and that, chirping and pecking the fruit to their hearts' content.

Every one who looks up as he passes, smiles to see it trying, in its small way, to fill the place of the noble branch.

But the old elm herself loves the little stranger nearly as well as her own children. Its bonny green leaves and red berries brighten the place of the lost one, and the great tree has been comforted in its sorrow.

Now, if one tiny currant-seed can do so much good in God's world, what do you suppose he means you to do in it? Who would have thought that proud, lofty elm could be cheered by such a little thing? Dear child, you have no idea what a blessing you can be, if you try. Some strong man or woman may be comforted by you, little one!

We make allowances for you because you are children. You must make allowances for us too. When the "grown-up folks" look dreadfully sober, or even speak harshly, to believe they have some trouble or care you don't know anything about, and be all the more gentle and kind yourself. Try if your little deeds of love cannot charm away the cloud. The next time your father comes home anxious and silent, think what you can bring him he likes; see how you can make the "sitting-room" more cheerful and quiet. If your mother ever gets hurried or tired, be very careful not to tease her with questions, but find some way to help her without any questions ; run to get what she wants before she has time to go for it herself ; take to yourself the care of the smaller brother or sister, whether anybody tells you so or not ; you will be a sweeter comfort than any grown person could be.

Whenever you can see anybody looking lonely or sad, try to be as much to him as the little currant-bush is to the great elm, and the dear Saviour will smile as he sees you.

A COWARD.

"A coward, Tom ! That's what you are ! Why don't you strike him, and not walk away so, and let him call you names ? Catch me to take it so quietly ! I would let him know who he had to fight. Oh, you are a coward !"

"Was Jesus Christ, our Saviour, a coward, Jack ? And what did he do when he was scourged, and struck in the face, and even spit upon ? Did he strike back ? Or when he was reviled, did he do the same ? No ! we are told that he answered not a word ; but when on the cross, in suffering and agony, he prayed God to forgive them ! Shall we not try and follow his example ? I intend to try as far as I can to be like Jesus, meek and gentle, and forbearing and forgiving. I have not done anything to offend Will, only refused to play truant with him, and advised him to go to school too, when he struck me, and because I did not strike back, he called me names."

What effect, do you think, my little reader, this good boy's conduct and words had upon the other two ? I will tell you. Will walked up to Tom, and told him that he was sorry that he had struck him, and that he would go to school with him. Jack joined them, and said he had never thought before that Jesus had set an example not to fight ; and that he would remember it, and also the good effect of his young companion's words and conduct which had explained it to them ; and that he would read his Bible more. Who knows how much more good this may do him ?

"WILL YOU BE THERE?"

Beyond this life of hopes and fears,
Beyond this world of griefs and tears,

There is a region fair.

It knows no change and no decay,
No night, but one unending day.

O say, will you be there ?

Its glorious gates are closed to sin ;
Nought that defiles can enter in
To mar its beauty rare.

Upon that bright, eternal shore,
Earth's bitter curse is known no more.

O say, will you be there ?

No drooping form, no tearful eye,
No hoary head, no weary sigh,

No pain, no grief, no care ;

But joys which mortals may not know,
Like a calm river, ever flow.

O say, will you be there ?

Our Saviour, once a mortal child,
As mortal man, by man reviled,

There many crowns doth wear ;

While thousand thousands swell the strain
Of glory to the Lamb once slain !

O say, will you be there ?

Who shall be there ? The lowly here
All those who serve the Lord in fear,

The world's proud mockery dare !

Who by the Holy Spirit led,

Rejoice the narrow path to tread ;—

These, these shall all be there.

Those who have learnt at Jesus' cross
All earthly gain to count but loss,

So that His love they share,

Who, gazing on the Crucified,

By faith can say, "For me He died,"—

These, these shall all be there !

Will you be there ? You shall, you must,
If, hating sin, in Christ you trust,

Who did that place prepare.

Still doth His voice sound sweetly, "Come !

I am the way—I'll lead you home—

With me you will be there !"

GOD'S WORK MUST BE DONE.

A MISSIONARY in the West Indies having called on the people for a little help in spreading the gospel, a negro with a wooden leg came forward, and putting his hand in one pocket, pulled out some silver, saying, "That's for me, massa ;" and another parcel from another pocket, "that's for my wife, massa ;" and another still, in all upwards of twelve dollars, "that's for my child, massa." When asked if he were not giving too much, he said, "God's work must be done, massa, and I may be dead."

Boys, girls, as well as grown-up people, let us do and let us give what we can. "God's work must be done, and we may be dead."

THE TREASURY PULPIT.

THE WOMAN OF CANAAN.

PART SECOND.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"O woman, great is thy faith."—MATT. xv. 28.

"GIVE strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts," so says the Bible; and out of what case can there be extracted stronger, sweeter, better wine than that of the woman of Canaan? Nor is hers a singular case. One that illustrates the freeness and the fulness of grace, it is but one star in a bright constellation. Give us time and room, and, from the Bible alone, I could gather a cluster of them,—such a cluster as that the dusty spies brought back with them from the land of Canaan, and the purple vineyards of Eschol.

To confine our attention to a single class of them, that of sainted women, look at our Lord's genealogy as given by Matthew! From Mary back to Eve but four women are named whose blood flowed in Jesus' veins, and was shed on Calvary for our redemption; and how curious, to say the least of it, that God puts in the very four that many, (and certainly a Jew, cherishing the pride of ancestry,) would have kept out—an incestuous person, a harlot, an adulteress, and one of the cursed race of Moab. Had this list professed to be a catalogue of the mothers from whom Jesus sprung, Truth, with the impartial pen of history, though blushing as she wrote them, must have inserted the names of Tamar and Rahab, Ruth and Bathsheba. But these are brought in apparently without occasion; for the list is one of our Lord's male, not female, ancestors. The family tree would have stood entire without them. What explanation have we to offer of this? Why are the very women specially and only mentioned whose antecedents were such as to reflect no honour, but, in the world's judgment, rather dishonour on the Saviour? This is what a hostile biographer, an enemy, would have done. And are we to account for this as for the appearance of tares among the wheat by saying, "An enemy hath done this?" Assuredly not. The record is from the pen of a disciple, and was written by the inspiration of God.

The truth is, that hope for sinners hangs nowhere more within our reach than on these branches that pride would lop off—there, the lowliest penitent, the vilest wretch, writhing like a crushed worm in the dust, may pluck the fruit of the tree of life. Without these names we should have wanted one of the most remarkable proofs that the honours of the heavenly kingdom are bestowed on the dishonourable; and that the graces of salvation, given without respect of persons or regard to merit, are free as the winds of heaven. How does it relieve our fears, and sustain our hopes, and wing our prayers, to read such names there? Some Sabbaths ago, on returning from church, I saw a little bird seated on a leafless spray of lilac; and as he sat there with red throbbing breast, and his large, bright, golden eye turned on the setting sun, he sung most beautifully a carol of the spring; and to my ear his notes fashioned themselves into the words of a song that celebrates the departure of gloomy winter, and how soft the "westlin breezes" blow. And to my fancy the names of these women in the roll of the ancestry of the Saviour of the world, the Prince of life, and the Lord of glory, speak hope to us. Give these women speech, and they say, If Jesus was not ashamed of us, neither will he be of you; if he was not ashamed to own us as his mothers, he will not be ashamed to call you his sisters and his brethren.

Once on a time our Lord said, "I tell you of a truth, many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias; but unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Elisha the prophet; and none of them was cleansed, save Naaman the Syrian." These words of grace had hardly left his lips, when the audience, starting to their feet, left their seats; and, incensed, infuriated, made a rush at the pulpit. Plucking the speaker down, they dragged him forth; cast him out of the synagogue; and, pouring in angry tide along the streets, thrust him out of their city. For the mercy and free grace of that declaration, we welcome him to our assemblies; and, as the trumpets of salvation sound the King's advance, throw open the doors, crying to them, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in;" and to Him, "Hosanna to the Son of David, hosanna in the highest, blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Unless pardon is bestowed on the guiltiest, and honours crown the vilest head; unless men are chosen to eternal life, not out of regard to merit, but of the freest, fullest mercy; unless they that are far away are brought nigh by the blood of Christ; unless the dogs, so to speak, may not only crawl under the table, and eat the crusts and crumbs off the floor, but transformed into men, may sit down and eat of the children's bread, "What dost thou here, Elijah?" what hope for us? Thanks to God for this blessed story. Woman of Canaan, bright star of the East, lead on! We follow thee,—thy example and success assure us that none come in vain to Jesus who go with thy earnest heart, thy frank confession, thy touching plea, "Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their master's table."

Consider—

I. Her humble confession.

I believe in the dignity of human nature. Like an old roofless temple, man is a grand and solemn ruin, on the front of which we can still trace the mutilated inscription of his original dedication to God, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour." There are points of view from which an angel of heaven may regard us as but a little lower than himself; as the next link in the chain of creation; as raised on a platform where our heads are, at least, on a level with his feet. We enter the study of a Galileo or a Newton—in him we see the dignity of human nature. Image of his Maker, he is holding converse with the heavens, measuring the distance between star and star, following the comet on its fiery track, weighing not hills only, but worlds in his scales, suns and planets in his balance. Leaving these scenes of calm and lofty thought, we next see the dignity of our nature when man, subduing the elements to his will, binds fire and water to his wheels; makes the forked lightning his messenger; compels the stubborn earth to supply his table, and the worms to spin his dress; and, spreading his sail to the wind, God-like, has his way on the sea, and his path in the mighty waters. Nor to feel our superiority, and justify such expressions as the dignity of our nature, is it necessary to enter the quiet study of a Newton, or amid the sounding anvils and roar of its machinery the workshop of a Watt. We see it in that little child, that with sapling in her hand and her naked foot on the flowery sward at dewy eve drives the cattle home, controlling the sulky leader of the herd with her infant voice, and turning him with a wave of her infant hand.

But turn the subject round, and look at the moral aspect of man; alas for the dignity of human nature! A bright intellect and a dark heart; likeness to God in mind, and unlikeness to him in morals; the union in one creature of the intellect of an angel and the passions of a beast.—Nature never gave birth to such a monster. This is the work of sin; not of God. And we have only to look at our race, at ourselves, in this aspect, to subscribe to the Canaanite's confession,—to justify the language of a man of the loftiest genius, beside whom our giants are but dwarfs, and who said, —I quote the words of David,—"I was as a beast before thee."

A beast! Of all the creatures which passed in long procession before Adam, take that one which furnished our Lord with his figure of speech, with whose habits we are best acquainted, and which Easterns hold in such foul contempt,—Job saying, "Whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock;" Hazael saying, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Goliath saying, when the stripling went forth to meet him, "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" Yet look at the dog! Look at him as he lies there, with wakeful eye, on guard over his master's property, ready to spring at the robber's throat; to die of hunger rather than desert his post and betray his trust. How faithful! Who has been as faithful to his God? Look at him, again, as he lies here when spring has melted the wreaths in the corrie, stretched out in death on his master's corpse; "faithful unto death," his last act was to lick the dead man's face; his dying moans, that sunk lower and lower as the frost congealed his blood and the snow drift gathered over them, saying, "Where thou diest I will die, and there will I be buried." Did our hearts ever glow with such love to Christ? The dumb ass rebuked the prophet, the dying dog rebukes us. Look again,—see how he watches his master's eye; how happy a kind word, or even look makes him! with what bounding, noisy, overflowing joy he hails our return; dashing through the blithe group that fills the doorway, the poor, fond dog is the first to welcome as he is the foremost to defend. He will not desert his master as we have often deserted Christ, as the disciples deserted him in the garden,—where they fled, he would have stood, and fought, and died. Look at him again when his master dies! He lingers beside the coffin, or walks mournfully through the house, seeking one he cannot find; and when the children have returned from the church-yard, to part the dead man's estate, and, perhaps, quarrel over the spoil, he stops behind to howl over his master's grave,—saddest, truest mourner for the dead.

When I look at that, and when I think of all that a loving God and a dying Saviour have done for us, and contrast with that our disobedience, our coldness, our base ingratitude, our great unfaithfulness, I stand rebuked before this dumb, devoted creature. Who may not say with David, "I was as a beast before thee?" with Ezra, "O my God, I am ashamed, and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God; for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up unto the heavens?" with Job, "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes?" with Jacob, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which thou hast showed unto thy servant?" with Paul, "I am less than the least of all saints?" and with this blessed woman, "Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table!"

II. Her thankfulness for the smallest mercy.

Objects seem large or little according to the medium through which they are viewed. In the microscope, what a remarkable change do they undergo! The humble moss rises into a graceful tree; the beetle, armed for battle, flashes in golden or silver mail; a grain of sand swells into a mass of rock; and, on the other hand, a mountain looked at through the wrong end of a telescope sinks into a mole-hill, and the broad lake contracts into a tiny pool. Even so, according as we look at them, with the eyes of self-condemning humility, or of self-righteous pride, God's mercies seem great or little. For example, a minister of the gospel passing one day near a cottage, was attracted to its door by the sound of a loud and earnest voice. It was a bare and lonely dwelling—the home of a lonely man who was childless, old, and poor. Drawing near this mean and humble cabin, the stranger at length made out these words, “This, and Jesus Christ too! this, and Jesus Christ too!” they were repeated over and over in tones of deep emotion—of wonder, gratitude, and praise. His curiosity was roused to see what this was that called forth such fervent, overflowing thanks. Stealing near the patched and broken window, he looked in; and there in the form of a grey, bent, worn-out son of toil, at a rude table, with hands raised to God, and his eyes fixed on some crusts of bread and a cup of water, sat piety, peace, humility, contentment, exclaiming, “This, and Jesus Christ too!”

Such was the spirit of this woman's reply. It says, Lord! deserving nothing, I shall be thankful for anything. To ask for myself, or poor child, such honours as the mother of Zebedee's children sought for her sons; to minister, like these favoured women, to thy necessities, and with these hands to supply thy table, or spread thy couch; to follow thee as thy shadow, and, bending, unloose the latchet of thy shoes; to kneel by thy side in prayer; like Martha and Mary to receive thee beneath my roof;—these are honours I ask not for—I dare not aspire to. A poor Gentile, all I seek is but the crumbs of thy table; among thy many and mighty miracles, in pity do some little thing for me; it will cost you but a word,—speak the word, and my daughter shall be healed; save her, good Lord; I ask the least that I can do with. Let others sit at thy side, and lie in thy bosom, but grant my petition; and, a happy mother, I will be content to sit among the dust, and sing at thy blessed feet.

This woman is a model for Christian artists—what grace and beauty in her humility! and who that has ever been brought to weep for his sins at the foot of the cross, will refuse to be content, unless he sits on heaven's highest throne, and wears its brightest crown? A drowning man, plucked from the jaws of death, is happier with three feet of bare rock than others with thousands of broad acres; the wrecked, borne shoreward in the life-boat that dashes to the land through roaring seas and winter storms, are happier than Egypt's queen when the sun gleamed on her golden galley, and silken sails swelled in the summer breeze, and the world's great conqueror knelt, a suitor, at her feet; and there is no humble Christian, lover of Jesus, but is happier with the hope of heaven, with Christ in him “the hope of glory,” than the men of the world are when their corn and their wine do most abound, and all things go well with them,—though a beggar, he parts not with that for all the wisdom and the wealth of Solomon. To get but within that blessed door—to get a place, not nearest the King, but on the outside of the circle round the throne—to bear the lowest title among heaven's nobles—to be the weakest child of God's family, the humblest servant in Christ's house, the dimmest, smallest jewel in his crown, the least, and less than the least, of all saints, is a hope that sets the heart asinging—

“Transported with the view I'm lost
In wonder, love, and praise.”

III. Her plea, she appeals to our Lord's generosity.

It is told in the life of a great criminal, who, though often apprehended and tried, was never convicted, that he made a rule of never answering any question, nor admitting anything, and thereby, as many do, committing himself. Thus while others, less cautious, paid the penalty of the law, he escaped the gallows, and died in his bed. One would think that men expect that by not admitting their guilt they shall be able to elude also the justice of God. They don't admit that they are sinners, or if sinners, they don't admit that they are great sinners. On the contrary, like the pharisee of old, they thank God that they are not as others are—not they! Guilt meets no pity at their hands; to save it, they would not touch it. Stand aside, they say, I am holier than thou. “It is monstrous to be told,”—wrote a lady of this school to the Countess of Huntingdon, when finding fault with George Whitefield's style of preaching,—“it is monstrous to be told that you have a heart as sinful as the common wretches that crawl on the earth; and I cannot but wonder that your ladyship should relish any sentiments so much at variance with high rank and good breeding; their doctrines are most repulsive, and strongly tinctured with disrespect toward their superiors, in perpetually endeavouring to level all ranks, and do away with all distinctions.” What darkness! miserable, fatal ignorance! Who would not have their soul bound up in the same bundle with the poorest Magdalene, that stands trembling, weeping, timidly knocking at the gate of heaven, rather than with this haughty dame who, pushing the poor penitent aside, ruffles up to it as if obsequious porters would throw it open at her appearance. How different the spirit of the Canaanite! As Mary, by the tears she shed on Jesus' feet, this woman in that word “truth,” puts in a plea of guilty, unclean, unworthy. Catching at the word and figure which our Lord uses, and casting herself on his generosity, she says, “Yet surely you will treat me as kindly as a man treats his dog.” Blessed humility! happy thought! touching, eloquent, irresistible appeal!

The plea is as good as ever. We have, and we need no other. Does God say, You have been a sinner! We reply, Truth, Lord. You have been a great sinner!—Truth, Lord. There is no commandment of mine you have not broken, no mercy of mine you have not abused!—Truth, Lord. You have crucified my Son!—Truth, Lord. You have grieved my Spirit!—Truth, Lord. You deserve to be cast into hell!—Truth, Lord. Into the deepest, hottest hell!—Truth, Lord, that is all true; but, God of mercy! so is this, that thou never saidst to any of the sons of men, Seek ye my face in vain—that thou art not willing that any should perish—that thou hast no pleasure in the death of the wicked—that thou didst send thy Son to seek and to save the lost—that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin—that the woman was successful, and why should not we? We will hope in thy mercy, for it is said, “The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy.”

The woman's plea good as ever? It is better than ever. We can go with more freeness and boldness to the throne of grace. That harsh, reproachful word, “dog,” is blotted from the Bible. Ever since Jesus died, all differences between Jew and Gentile abolished, his lips have never uttered it. Sent to save the lost sheep of the house of Israel, with Jews for the objects of his mercy, and the Holy Land for the orbit of his mission, in the kindness shown to this miserable mother, our Lord, in a sense, exceeded his commission; and to save this poor, struggling, sinking creature, he overleaped the barriers of ancient covenants. He took time by the forelock, and anticipated the hour when there should be neither Jew nor Greek, nor bond nor free. How great her happiness had been if, in reply to disciples, saying, “Send her away,” he had answered, “No, I will not send her away; why should I send her away? it is to her, and to such as her, that I am sent.” At such words how had the blood rushed to her pallid cheek; how had her heart beat loud with joy, and throwing herself at Jesus' feet, as she clasped and kissed them, confident of getting all she asked, how had she mingled praises with prayers? What in that case had been her position is now ours. Weak faith has no longer to pursue a departing Saviour. Distress has not to address itself in piteous accents to an ear that seems deaf. Jesus is not now passing by silent, reserved, and wrapt in thought of other objects than us. He looks on us, he pities us, he loves us,—with open arms he invites us to his bosom. Throned high on the mercy-seat, he stretches out the golden sceptre, saying to every suppliant, What is thy request, and what is thy petition, and it shall be granted thee? “The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee.”

THE REV. T. G. RAGLAND.*

COLLEGE LIFE.

“I AM thankful,” wrote the excellent Bishop of Madras, Dr. Dealtry, “that it has been determined to publish an extended memoir of that eminently distinguished servant of Christ, the late Rev. Mr. Ragland. He was one of those self-denying, devoted followers of the Lord Jesus, whose memory ought not to be permitted to pass away, and whose example ought to be held up for universal instruction. I have hardly ever known one that was a more ‘burning and shining light’ in his day and generation.” The memoir of Ragland is now before us, with its rich portrait of a spiritual mind of rare humility and self-abnegation; that combined with meekness and lowliness an energy in action, and firmness of purpose, and calm strength of deliberative judgment, that made him—though the most diffident and least obtrusive of men—the natural leader in a new and most important missionary enterprise. His life, as opened by his biographer, has its twofold division: its early student period; its later missionary labours. It has been studiously and successfully contemplated in the preparation of the memoir, to render the many beautiful points of his character, that so deeply impressed his companions in the university of Cambridge and his associates in the mission field, a profitable study for young men in the prosecution of their studies at that or at any other university.

We love to trace the man in the boy, to read in the streaks and shadows of the morning the future day. Even the truest insight into a man's character is to be found in the story of his childhood and youth, as the nature of a spring is to be discovered at its source, and before its waters have become combined with the thousand ingredients in its course. From his boyhood Ragland was distinguished by the gentle sensitiveness and winning cheerfulness that were characteristic of his riper years. He loved his book more than his sports, his corner more than the play-ground. If he joined occasionally at the game of his school-fellows, and took his turn at cricket, he speedily stole away again to a quiet spot to resume his volume of ancient or modern history, or some of the tales of chivalry: “The Seven Champions of Christendom;” or “Amadis of Gaul,” of which, when young, he was passionately fond. At this period the patient industry and self-denying power of the future man might have been seen as he started in the winter mornings as the clock struck four, and, by the kitchen-fire, which was allowed to burn all night, studied his “Homer” or “Virgil.” It is only what we expect from the tutor of such a boy, when we find him

* “A Memoir of the Rev. Thomas Gajetan Ragland, B.D., Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Itinerating Missionary of the Church Missionary Society in North Tinnevely, South India.” By the Rev. writing, "Young Ragland makes great progress in the Latin and Greek languages, and his knowledge of botany is already very considerable." But it was not the purpose of the relative, an uncle, to whom the orphan boy had been committed, to train him for a learned profession. At the age of fifteen he entered his uncle's office at Liverpool. Neither the choice of his guardian, nor any marked predilection of his own, indicated at that time the direction of his subsequent life. Like his eminent contemporary in the Indian field, Bishop Wilson, his life began in the warehouse and at the desk; and neither had reason to regret his apprenticeship to business. Active, exact, disciplined habits were the fruit in both of their early years' training. Whilst preparing for mercantile life, young Ragland did not cast aside his previous studies. Throughout his seven years' counting-house service his literary tastes were cultivated, his sphere of knowledge studiously enlarged. History became his favourite study. With the intensity of a passion he entered into the curiously, often perplexingly involved department of historical study that relates to the genealogies of the reigning families of Europe, and to the changes which have taken place in the boundaries of their territorial possessions. In this study he spared no research, chronicling in well-executed maps and charts the results of his labours. With secular history was interwoven the study of the history and genealogies of Scripture, and an extended acquaintance thereby gained with the letter of the sacred volume, which, in after life, was to be turned to the highest ends.

Of his religious character and convictions at this time we possess no record. On the subject he was always reserved, refusing to speak, in the fear that he might speak beyond the truth, or for self-exaltation. To the question of a friend referring to his early religious history, he wrote from India so late as 1857, "To the request in your letter my mind at once said, 'Oh, no, this cannot be.' However, I will think about it. When we are in heaven, then I will tell you all about my early life and feelings. But I am afraid until then it would do me harm to write it. However, may the Lord direct me!" To the same friend, who renewed the request, he again wrote, "I must return my former answer until I have well thought over it. In heaven we shall be able to tell about our sins, and the Lord's mercies to us, without either shame or pain, or injury to our own spirits in any way; but to do so here I have generally found hurtful." He appears to have been one of those instances in which divine grace exerts its influence from the earliest years, and the natural and spiritual life unfold together. Even when a boy his cheerful obedience and docility were so remarkable, as to indicate more than natural amiability. His most intimate friend at school could not call to mind that he ever heard him make use of a light or improper expression. Of his daily drive during his business years from his uncle's country house to Liverpool, he spoke in after life as a season of frequent and happy communion with God. It was often spent in silent prayer, concluded as he reached a fixed point of the road at a certain distance from Liverpool by the Lord's prayer, without which he then thought no prayer should be closed. As the habit of the family in which he lived was to retire early, and to require that the candle should be put out at an early hour, while he accommodated himself to the rule of the family, it was yet found that he continued on his knees in prayer in the dark. The communion with God, so striking a feature in the character of Ragland, and so eminently the secret of his holy life, was thus early begun. Indeed the germs of this character appear in him, as in a young Samuel, from his first years. On his visiting a French lady at Gibraltar on his way to India, who had known him in childhood, recalling the past, she exclaimed on hearing what was the object of his voyage, "Ah, vous étiez toujours très religieusement disposé!"

Till the age of twenty-two he continued actively engaged in business, cheerfully serving God in his profession, and apparently without either the desire or the prospect of change. At no period of his life did he run unsent. His mind was pre-eminently deliberative. From the time he entered into the business of his uncle nothing had occurred to break the link then formed, or to indicate that higher work was before him. Strange that the event that should naturally have settled him for life in his mercantile pursuits determined for him his new path, and transferred him from the counting-house to the university. His uncle, Mr. Birch, about to retire from business, liberally proposed to advance him the capital to start as his successor. The offer was tempting to a young man. It was just what he could have desired for securing his prosperity in life. But difficulties had come across his mind as to the possibility of combining mercantile success with the maintenance of high Christian principle. We shall not say that these ought to have driven him from his post. It was worthy his attempt to have united them. He would have found that the merchant as well as the minister has his mission, and that his is a great work who proves to the world that the transactions of commerce can be conducted, and conducted successfully, in consistency with the maintenance of the highest Christian principles and the most scrupulous Christian honour. For himself, he found the difficulty insurmountable. The idea then arose for the first time of his changing his profession, and entering the university. After an interval of intense anxiety and earnest prayer it settled into a fixed purpose. When communicated to his uncle, he generously provided the pecuniary assistance for his college course, and the young merchant was transferred to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, to be an example, for a season, of how a college life ought to be spent.

When he first entered his college he had no idea of reading for honours. His simple aim was to take an ordinary B.A. degree; and so humbly did he estimate his own powers, that he doubted whether even that would be within his reach. But from the beginning he was thoroughly a student. Whilst he had learned to seek first the kingdom of God, he had learned also to be diligent in business; and such was his punctuality that it began, at an early part of his course, to be remarked of him, "You might set your watch by Ragland." His tutor was not long in discovering the range of his intellect and his rare powers of application. He was confident he would succeed in the competition for mathematical honours, and advised the attempt. For four successive years Ragland received the prize of the silver cup. One of the cups, nineteen years afterwards, was dedicated to the service of God in the native church of Kalbadhu, in North Tinnevely, a small Church mainly gathered through his exertions; and all of them were destined by him for the communion service of the Churches which he hoped would spring up in Northern Tinnevely as the fruit of his itinerating mission. With what student-like ardour, yet with what Christian moderation, he gave himself to the study of mathematics, may be gathered from his own words. Writing to his cousin and sister in 1838, he says, "I am sometimes afraid I shall be as fond of mathematics as of genealogies. There is something so beautiful in conic sections, which I have just been reading! What stuff I have given up myself to all my life! First to those most philosophical romances; then to genealogies for seven years. And if I should be tempted to be as fast bound by mathematics, I shall not show myself a bit the wiser. What a happiness it would be to have the same eagerness in pursuing the duties of a pastor as I have had in these other things! The latter are pleasing to human nature, and gain an easy conquest over the heart; but I hope the power that has raised up so many faithful watchmen from time to time may be exerted in my case. Remember me, my dear friends, in your prayers, and particularly the ensuing month, and, above all, on my three examination days. It would be hypocritical to disguise my feelings about success, but I do not know but that the reverse might be better for me. There is One who knows what is best, and who will give it too."

But neither the studies in which he was engaged nor their success divided his heart, or separated him from the field of active Christian usefulness. Whilst he never lost sight of self-improvement with a view to future ministerial service as his first and most incumbent duty, he did not decline taking his part in the Christian agencies which had been organized by his predecessors at Cambridge. Devoted to his studies, he felt it to be a safeguard to his own spirit to have a point of contact with the wants, and especially with the spiritual wants, of his fellow-men. Even during the hours of his busy week he might have been seen, with his bundle of tracts under his arm, on his way to Barton, a village between four and five miles from Cambridge; and on Sunday the mathematical student was transformed into the humble teacher of Jesus Lane Sunday School, instructing himself and others to aspire to higher than academical honours. On the Saturday evenings he was rarely an absentee from the prayer meeting formed of the freshmen of his own college. He felt that they that wait on the Lord renew strength. It was at one of those seasons of Christian fellowship that the writer of the following letter, whose heart still glows as he writes with the fire of his early friendship, first met Ragland, whom he so happily characterizes. It shows that the ardour of his mathematical and scientific studies did not quench the purer flame of devotion,—that both burned, and in harmony. "It was," writes this college friend, "at a prayer meeting to which I had been invited that I first saw Mr. Ragland. We met at each other's rooms every Saturday evening for the purpose of reading the Bible and for prayer. It was on the first of these occasions that I saw him, and was so struck with the devotedness of his manner, his strong sense, and his unaffected humility, that I said at once within myself, 'That shall be my friend.' I never made a more correct judgment of any character than in this case. Throughout our college course I was on the most intimate terms with him. Our rooms adjoined, and we saw each other at all hours. Our conversation was frequently led by him into deeply spiritual subjects. Sometimes sitting in each other's rooms, sometimes taking our walk to Grantchester or some other neighbouring village, and not unfrequently, long past midnight, pacing to and fro in the New Court, have we communed together on the things of God, our future prospects as ministers of Christ, and the rest which remained for us in the kingdom of God. Never do I hear the well-known words,— "What peaceful hours I once enjoyed, How dear their memory still," without referring to those days. He was one I ever consulted on any matter which required careful deliberation. I had a perfect reliance on his judgment, and knew how much I might draw on his affectionate regard. Never did I find it to fail. It was always his habit to say, when his advice was asked, 'Come, my dear brother, let us commit the matter to the Lord; and he would kneel down and ask God's guidance in the most simple manner, just as a child going with loving confidence to a gracious father. He had always time to give to those who needed assistance in their studies, and with the greatest patience and clearness would explain their difficulties, and help them onward in their course.' Prayerful diligence was the characteristic of his college, as it was of his ministerial and missionary life. Each study, and each day's study was begun with prayer. On the morning on which he expected the important news from Cambridge as to whether he had been allotted the place he had striven for in the mathematical tripos, he retired, some hours before the post arrived, to his own chamber, and there spent the interval of suspense in prayer and communion with God. He was armed for defeat, it would not have cast him down, and the tidings of a triumph would not have elated him. When the joyful announcement was made to him that he was fourth in the list of wranglers, his first exclamation was, "What an undeserved mercy!" Returning to his chamber, and again closing the door, he remained for a time alone. On re-admitting his family, who were anxious to offer him their congratulations, his first act was to invite them to kneel down and thank God with him for the success which he rightly regarded as a gift from him; so truly did he live in the habitual spirit of his favourite passage of Holy Scripture, "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy patha." In his piety there was nothing gloomy or severe. He was cheerful and conversable where he felt himself free and unrestrained. After attaining his fellowship, and while employed in his college in delivering lectures on mathematics, he cultivated a friendly intercourse with the under-graduates, and took pleasure in gathering them around him at frequent and liberal entertainments. "So naturally playful was his mind, that he has been known," says his biographer, "within the august walls of a college to propose to an undergraduate a run round the court, and then, laughing, to win the day by availing himself of his privilege as a fellow, to run unfinned across the grass plot." His influence amongst them was great, but more from what he was than what he said. In the words of his friend, Mr. Deck, the excellent incumbent of St. Stephen's, Islington, he effected a great deal in his college; but it was with quiet, not with noisy energy. He kept himself beneath the surface, and asserted his powers more like the screw which, unseen beneath the waves, propels the steamer in its course, than the splashing paddle, which is seen and heard commanding attention to its vigorous strokes. His great and constant effort was to work unseen, that God in all things might be glorified.

As might have been predicted, from the order of Mr. Ragland's talents, from his reserved nature and constitutional shrinking from the public eye, he was wanting in those qualities that constitute the attractive preacher and the popular minister. In the curacies which he successively filled in Barnswell, a suburb of Cambridge, he was remembered more from his private than his public ministrations. His influence was that of a heavenly mind. When afterwards removed far from those scenes of his early ministry, and engrossed with his foreign missionary work, his messages of earnest warning to his old parishioners of Barnswell showed how interwoven their spiritual interests had become with his thoughts. At no period of his life did he overcome his first difficulties as a preacher. These lay deeper than his constitutional diffidence—his weak voice and peculiarly quiet manner. To the preparation of a sermon he always addressed himself with reluctance, and found its composition arduous. There was a tradition in college after he had left for India, that though not generally a frequenter of the combination-room, he was mostly to be found there on a Saturday, and would linger on as though willing to defer some irksome occupation. On a Saturday evening, in the long vacation, he might be seen pacing the grass plot in the college quadrangle in evident trouble about his Sunday sermon. He often went to bed at three or four o'clock on the Sunday morning, and rose again at seven or eight to complete his task. In India we find him in the same trouble. "Saturday morning," he writes to a friend from Madras, "has found me sermonless, and Saturday night, at eleven o'clock, saw me go to bed with only half a sermon, though I have the whole of Sunday's duty myself, and with that half I was not quite satisfied." And again writing to the same friend, he repeats his old complaint: "I preached on the occasion of the visit of the venerable bishop, Daniel Wilson, at the cathedral. It was a very heavy trial preparing. I could not divest my mind of the unusual auditors I should have, although convinced of the folly and wickedness of caring for any one but Him who walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks. I commenced early, but could not get on. All Friday was fruitless labour and thought. Several hours of Saturday miserable through unbelief, discontent, and rebellion; and I seemed to have nothing to do but to sit down hopeless. But I was not forsaken, felt encouraged to recommence, and although I sat up great part of Saturday night, my sermon was comfortably completed. It was to my own mind just of that happy standard which leaves me neither discontented nor puffed up."

That a man of prayer, of deep devoted piety, of learning, of large comprehensive mind, and of an overflowing missionary heart, should have experienced a continued life-long difficulty in his preparations to preach, may to many seem an inexplicable mystery. Those that have passed through a similar trial, yet resisted the temptation to abandon the ministry, will find their consolation in the experience of a brother compassed about with a like infirmity, yet whose labours were eminently owned and blessed to the Church. The mystery is solved in the teaching of the apostle, that "there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. . . . For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; . . . to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues; but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."

The special gift of Mr. Ragland for the ministry of the gospel will appear as we open from his "Memoir" in a subsequent paper, his Indian life and labours.

THE CHILDREN OF THE KINGDOM.

I.

THE afternoon sunlight, streaming brightly through the windows of the little, old-fashioned church, gilded the fair young heads in the choir, and down a broad golden path slid a quivering crown upon the good old minister's silver hair. Daisy and Bob Saybrook sat in the square pew under the pulpit, tightly wedged in between Aunt Skinner and mischievous Cousin John, and listened with more than their usual attention to the words of the sermon. The text was so very sweet,—“Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.”

The tears came in Daisy's eyes. She looked at Uncle Skinner, but he had settled down with his eyes shut, probably so that his attention might not be distracted by anything earthly. John (a thoroughly bad boy,) was scrawling in the hymn-book, drawing pictures of dogs and cats, and another one, which made Daisy shudder, of a man hanging on a gallows. But Bob—that was a comfort—gave her a bright look of sympathy, and, pressing each other's hands, they listened with eager ears.

Now Bob and Daisy were orphans, and it was only a few weeks since their dear mother had died, and they had come to live with Uncle and Aunt Skinner. No one in all the world can take the place of a precious mother; and so, although Aunt Skinner tried to be very kind, they could not yet feel at all happy in their new home, and they had to struggle very hard against a feeling of positive dislike towards their cousin John. He was older and stronger than Bob, and was continually doing everything in his power to make his young cousins uncomfortable. Even now, as they sat in church, he would now and then vary his occupation of drawing by giving Daisy a violent pinch, which would make her start off her seat. Then Aunt Skinner would give her such a sharp look that the child's heart would be nearly broken. So it is no wonder that these little children listened so eagerly to the comforting words of the good old minister. He told them such wonderful things of the glorious King who made all the shining worlds, of his great white throne, and his angels, beautiful because they had stood so long in his light, the harpers harping with harps, and the cherubim veiling their faces because the glory was so great. But this wonderful King so loved the little world that he sent his Son to die upon the cross, that all his sinful, wandering earth children might come back to his love. And he, the great King, would be their Father, Jesus his glorious Son their Elder Brother, and they with him should be heirs of the kingdom. “Behold what manner of love!” said the good minister, with tears in his eyes. “Through this dear Elder Brother we can even come nearer God's heart than the angels.”

Daisy looked at Bob with a glad surprise, and, when service was over, they walked slowly home, talking it over together. They had often talked before with their dear mother, and, when she died, she hoped that she left them both “followers of God as dear children.” But Daisy felt troubled.

“Bob,” said she, anxiously, “do you really think we are children of the kingdom?”

“Why, I hope so; but I'll tell you what I did in Church, Daisy. I gave my heart to God over again, and I promised to study his book more, and find out all he wishes me to do, and then do it with all my might.”

“Then I will, too,” said Daisy, lifting her clear eyes to heaven.

“But I'll tell you what, Daisy, we'll have a tough time trying to do some things. What do you think of ‘Love your enemies!’ Now, there's John”—

“Well, to be sure, my arm is all black and blue; but then I feel now as if I forgave him, and, indeed, Bob,” said she, slowly, “I'm not quite sure, but I think I could almost love him.”

“Ah, indeed!” sneered a voice behind them, “don't put yourself out too much.”

Daisy coloured violently. “Have you heard all we said?”

“I've had the privilege,” said John, in a nasal tone, “of listening to most of your edifying conversation. It was a great treat for such a poor sinner, I assure you. It's so very affecting to think that these dear lambs of the flock can love a poor goat with such very long horns,” and he pretended to wipe his eyes.

“Now, John,” said Daisy, deprecatingly, “you know we did not mean to say anything so bad. We want to love you very much, but you will not let us.”

“And why not, pray, Miss Sanctity?”

“You need only look at her arm,” cried Bob, indignantly, “and you'll have one answer. And I'll tell you what, John Skinner, you'll have to stop that fun.”

“Ah!” said he, with provoking coolness. “Will the little lamb fight? I thought it could only bleat, and cry for its ma.”

The tears sprang into Bob's eyes at that heartless allusion to his recent sorrow, and a voice whispered in his heart, “It's no use—give up trying to be one of God's children, and punish John Skinner just once.” But he struggled against the feeling, though his hands clenched involuntarily all through his busy prayers for help. Daisy, too, would not trust herself to speak, and walked on silently, while John sang scraps of psalm tunes profanely all the way home.

Arrived at the door, John turned to Daisy. “My dear Christian friend, I have such a pleasant surprise for you.” Daisy followed him apprehensively through the garden to the barn, when, opening the door, out walked her little pet kitten, Pearl, her pure, white fur dabbled with streaks of red and yellow paint, looking like a little clown kitten.

“You see,” said John, while Daisy uttered an exclamation of dismay, “I knew your taste in colours, because you admired the sunset so much last night. I'm so glad I've pleased you,” he grinned maliciously.

The kitten mewed piteously, as if in great pain.

“I declare,” said John, “I believe she has been trying to lick it off. I hadn't the least idea that she had a taste for colour, too,” and he laughed loudly.

“You're a cruel boy, John,” cried Bob, coming up. “That poor kitten has swallowed too much paint, and will die before night.”

John only laughed louder, while Daisy tenderly took her kitten, and with Bob's help washed it with soap and warm water. The poor kitten seemed grateful, but lay languidly in Daisy's lap till night, when, as Bob predicted, it died.

Daisy could not be comforted, and Bob indignantly told Aunt Skinner the whole story.

"Oh, John is always up to his tricks," said she, a little impatiently, "but I don't think that little bit of paint hurt the kitten at all. It always was sickly. Daisy played with it too much. But don't cry, child," she added, more kindly, "you shall have another some time."

"It will never be like Pearl," sobbed Daisy.

"Dear sister Saybrook," drawled John, passing her little stool, "your affections are too earthly."

"Daisy," whispered Bob, as they lighted their candles to go to bed, "could you love John now?"

"Don't ask me," cried poor Daisy, in a choking voice. "It's as much as I can do not to hate him to-night."

Nevertheless, Daisy prayed so earnestly that God would take all bitterness out of her heart, that in the morning she was able to look quite cheerful, and spoke so pleasantly to John that he was greatly disappointed.

"She didn't love her kitten so much, after all," said he to himself.

But now Bob was in trouble. One of his boots was nowhere to be found. His other pair had gone to be mended, and it was almost school time. High and low pattered the willing feet of little Daisy, but all in vain.

"You're a very careless boy," cried Aunt Skinner, "John never did such a thing in his life."

"I believe John has done it now, then," sighed Daisy to herself.

"Then I must stay home from school," cried Bob, bitterly, "and I was so anxious not to lose my place."

There was no help for it, and Daisy left her brother with an aching heart.

"It's all John," cried Bob fiercely, when he was left alone. "Now I've lost my place up head. Oh, I just hate—"

"Stop a minute, Bob," said his good angel. "There are worse things than losing one's place at school. Remember your Father sees everything, and if you do right, and conquer these wicked thoughts, John can't make you lose your place in the kingdom."

"To be sure," said Bob, more cheerily, "how could I forget it for a moment?"

Just then a bright idea came in his head, and hurrying to the barn, he found an old-cast off boot of Uncle Skinner's. It was much too large, but Bob drew it on, and clattered bravely away to school. There was a great laugh when he made his appearance, but he kept his place up head, and felt very happy.

At night John sullenly threw the missing boot into the room.

"Where did you find it?" asked Aunt Skinner.

"Under a chair in his room."

"O John," cried Bob and Daisy together.

"It's true," said John, "but you're just a couple of bats."

Bob and Daisy looked at each other, but knew it was useless to say any more.

A day or two after John came to them, saying:—

"I'll tell you what, if you'll give up trying to be such saints, I'll give up plaguing you."

But Bob and Daisy could not agree to that. So day by day their trials increased. Their books and most cherished treasures disappeared mysteriously. They were taunted and provoked in every possible way. But still these little children of the kingdom struggled patiently on, and in the Book they studied to learn their Father's commands, they also often found his beautiful promises, and this was one—

"As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

"Ah, Bob!" said little orphan Daisy, "how sweet it is to be children of the kingdom!"

II.

In the chill December air Bob and Daisy were again wending their way home from church. The sweet voices of the village choir came floating on the wind—and in Bob and Daisy's hearts were still ringing the words of the text, "I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," &c.

"Am I a soldier of the cross?"

"Daisy," said Bob suddenly, "I don't think I fight enough."

"What can you mean, Bob?"

"Oh, I think I take things too easy. When John provokes me (and Aunt Skinner always takes his part), I think it's enough if I don't say a word, or don't strike him, when I'm just longing to do it. O Daisy, if you only knew how angry I feel all the time. Sometimes I have to run out to the wood-shed and saw wood just as fast as I can, and sometimes I get the hammer and nails, and pound on the new chicken yard just as if it was John's head, and I just let all sorts of wicked thoughts run on, and don't try to stop them. Now, if I'm in the King's army, that the good old minister told about, I ought not to run away so like a coward. I ought to stand firm, and fight down all these wicked feelings—come out like a man into the front ranks, and stand the fire."

"Dear me," sighed Daisy, "what do you think of me? I don't know how to fight. O Bob, must all the children of the kingdom be in the King's army?"

"I suppose they must," said Bob, half laughing, "but then you, dear Daisy, don't you remember what the minister said, that some had more fighting to do than others. Each one must do something, but there must always be some one to look after the baggage—"

'Bear one another's burdens,' you know, and then some one must carry the banners. Now, I think you'd make a capital flag-bearer."

"How do you mean, Bob? Could any one see my flag?"

"Why, yes, you must be so gentle, and forgiving, and patient, and loving, that when any one looks at you, they will read something as plain as print on a banner."

"Well," said Daisy, with sparkling eyes, "what banner shall I carry?"

"I'll tell you what I read," returned Bob, looking at her affectionately, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Daisy coloured painfully. "O Bob, don't make fun of me; I'm so bad—no one would ever think of that."

"I'm not so sure," cried Bob, kissing her round dimpled cheeks.

They opened the garden gate, and walking up paused a moment to look over the broad fields of snow, rosy in the light of the setting sun. Bob's heart was full of gentle and brave resolutions.

"I'll tell you what, Daisy, you shall carry the banners, and make the music, and I'll try to be a real, faithful soldier, and—"

His remarks were cut short by a very unexpected shower of icy water from the windows above.

"This is a little too much," cried Bob angrily, "over our Sunday clothes, and your best bonnet, Daisy, I'll—"

"Take care," whispered a voice in Bob's ear. "Is this the way you 'stand fire'?"

"Dear me," cried John's voice above, in an affected tone of surprise and concern, "who would have thought of your being down there? Dear pilgrims, with your new clothes just fresh from Vanity Fair, and that beautiful pink bonnet! How well it is that Sister Saybrook never took any pride in it!"

Daisy bit her lip, for she remembered looking in the glass that very morning, and feeling quite pleased with the pretty pink reflection on her cheeks. She also remembered feeling very uncomfortable at hearing John singing in the hall, in his disagreeable nasal tone—

"Why should our garments, made to hide
Our sin and shame, provoke our pride?"

"I hope you'll be able to forgive me," whined John.

"Oh, certainly," replied Bob, who had quite recovered himself.

Now, this was not at all what John wanted. He was greatly disappointed in not seeing Bob fly in a passion. So he called again—

"Oh, you precious hypocrite, to tell the truth, I did it on purpose!"

"Never mind," cried Daisy's cheery voice, as they hurried in to repair damages, "we forgive you just the same."

This was too much for John, and he did not show himself again till tea-time.

The next morning, as Bob came out of his room, he found chalked in huge letters on his door, "Saint's Rest," but he, smiling, wiped it off, and took no further notice of the intended taunt.

So the winter passed on with daily conflicts, but also some grand victories. To be sure, the young soldiers would often be very weary, and greatly discouraged, but they were never entirely conquered, and sure of receiving fresh strength from above, they were always ready to come bravely back to the battle. And Daisy carried some very beautiful banners.

Towards spring there was to be a grand examination in the village school, and some rich gentleman had offered two very handsome prizes—one for the best scholar in mathematics, and one for the best composition. Now John, who was very ambitious, and a boy of good talents, was determined to have them both. In mathematics, Bob, Fred Grey, and he, had already distanced all other competitors, and it was hard to say which would be the victor. But one day John failed utterly in the demonstration of a difficult problem, which was successfully worked out by Bob. This was more than John's spirit could bear, and for several days he went around with such an air of sullen gloom, that no one dared to sympathize with him. At last he suddenly betook himself with such energy to his composition, in which there was good prospect of success, that Bob believed his mortification was forgotten.

Everything went on smoothly till the day before examination, when Bob came hurrying in after school, saying, "Oh, I've so much to study. Don't call me to tea, please Aunt Skinner, I couldn't eat a morsel," and he sat himself down in a western window, to improve the last ray of light. Suddenly he uttered an exclamation of dismay.

"What's the matter?" cried Daisy.

"Why, some one has torn the leaves out of my Algebra, right in the hardest part."

"Why do you lay it to some one else?" said Aunt Skinner, sharply, "you've probably been careless yourself."

"I kept it just like a new book," said Bob, mournfully. "O John, won't you let me take yours?"

"By-and-by," said John; but though Bob begged and pleaded, he would not stir to find it till after tea. Then he came down stairs, saying with a yawn, "Oh, I'm sorry, Bob, but I just remember I lent mine to one of the boys yesterday."

Bob looked intensely disappointed, and seizing his cap rushed to the door.

"Where are you going?" asked Uncle Skinner, coming in with his coat dripping, and using all his force to shut the door against the driving wind. "It's a terrible storm."

"I don't mind it," said Bob. "I must try and find an Algebra."

"Are you crazy, child?" cried Aunt Skinner. "You shan't stir a step. Do you think I can have you on my hands with fever and ague all through the spring?"

Bob came back into the room very quietly, and leaning his head on his hand, spoke not a word for more than an hour. Neither did little Daisy, who knelt beside him with her head on his knee. At last he turned to her with a very pale face, but a sweet, wan smile,—

"It's all over now, Daisy. It has been a great fight, and I'm very tired, but I'm not angry with any one now. I'm pretty sure I shall lose the prize, but perhaps I should have been too proud."

Daisy only sobbed softly to herself.

John broke in fretfully, "Mr. Brooks said my composition would stand a good chance, if it were only a little fuller upon this one head. He said I'd find a great deal to help me in a book he told me about, but I can't get it at this bookstore, and I suppose the roads will be perfectly impassable over to Snowdon to-morrow. What shall I do? I could alter this one sheet at the last minute, if I only had the book."

No one answered, and he grumbling, again applied himself to his task.

Poor Bob was up the next morning with the first streak of light. He secured an Algebra, and never before did a brain travel at such express speed over the difficult problems and equations. But the class was called so soon, he was not more than half ready. Poor Bob! he passed a fine examination, and had many compliments, but he missed once in that very hard place, and the beautiful prize went to Fred Grey.

As the boys walked silently home from school, Bob turned off at the little bridge over the creek. "I don't feel quite well, John," said he, "and I believe a walk would do me good. Please tell Aunt Skinner that I don't care for any dinner."

"Your pride's hurt, that's all," cried John, "you don't want to show yourself, after being so badly beaten. Well, it must go down rather hard after all your superior airs."

"I forgive you, John," cried Bob, throwing back a bright look, as he dashed into the wood.

"Forgive me? What for?" screamed John, stamping his foot. "Do you think I tore your book?" But Bob had sprung out of hearing. "Well, it would be a pity to let such lovely Christian charity die for want of exercise," muttered John, and he loosened one of the boards of the little bridge, so that when Bob came bounding back, it would tilt up, and give him a heavy fall.

But John's conscience troubled him all the afternoon, and he could not even think of the composition which was to come off with such glory on the next day. As soon as the late school was dismissed, he almost flew down to the little bridge. Ah! his fears were too true! There at full length, in the dim, grey light, lay the motionless form of his cousin Bob. He had struck his head in falling, and was quite unconscious.

"I've done it at last," groaned John, in conscience-stricken despair. "I've killed him now."

He lifted him tenderly, for Bob's slight figure was a light burden, and carried him home.

"Bob has fallen and killed himself," he almost screamed, as Aunt Skinner came to the door.

Then all was hurry and confusion. The doctor came, and old nurse Comfort, and poor little Daisy never ceased to sob and kiss Bob's pale hands. John, too, could not keep away, and as he hovered near, he saw a little medal on a long black cord fall from his bosom. He took it up. On one side was scratched in Bob's plain hand, "Robert Saybrook, entered the King's army Dec. 10th, 18—;" and on the other: "My Father's promise, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.'"

John shuddered, and for the first time in his life he prayed earnestly—"Not yet, O God. Keep it for him a little longer. Spare him this time."

But John's cup of remorse was not yet full, for, carrying Bob's coat in the hall, a heavy book fell out. John picked it up. It was the very one he had been wishing for, and in it was written, "John Skinner, with the love of his cousin Bob."

"That is where he went, then," groaned John. "Poor, tired, disappointed Bob, went away over to Snowdon, for me. Oh, he'll die; I know he'll die! I've killed him!"

He went to his room, and threw himself on his bed in an agony. The long hours passed on, and at last some one knocked at his door. "Is it all over?" said John, in a low, fearful whisper, "Is he dead?"

"Oh no," answered the pleasant voice of nurse Comfort. "Your cousin will live, and I thought you would like to know."

No words can describe the happiness that thrilled poor John Skinner's grateful heart. Neither can it be told with what tenderness he waited on Bob through all his weary confinement. And at last when the boy was able to bear it, he made a long confession of all his wicked and malicious deeds, and humbly asked forgiveness. "For you see," said John in a faltering voice, "you have been such a good soldier, you have not only conquered yourself, but even me, your greatest enemy, and now I want you and Daisy to tell me how to join the King's army, for I too am determined to fight the good fight. O Bob, if you could only know how I thank you!"

"Don't thank me," faltered Bob, but could say no more for the happy tears.

But as Daisy looked at his radiant face, she whispered, "I know what banner you are carrying to-day."

"What?" asked Bob.

Daisy clasped her fair hands reverently. "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."—Congregationalist.

BIBLICAL HOURS.

BY PROFESSOR KENDRICK,

AUTHOR OF LIFE OF MRS. R. C. JUDSON.

"But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father."—MARK xiii. 32.

THE day and hour here referred to are, of course, the definite and exact period of that coming of the Son of man whose admonitory precursors he had just foretold. Of that precise period the angels and the Son are declared alike ignorant. This statement in regard to the Son has been a stumbling-block to many readers and interpreters of the New Testament, seeming, as it does, to come into irreconcilable conflict with the numerous Scripture attestations to that divinity of Christ, of which omniscience is a necessary attribute. Among the means employed for escaping the difficulty, has been the assumption that knowing here stands for making known—a mode of explanation, however, entirely untenable.

The writer of this has formerly held the opinion (and so expressed himself in his notes on Olshausen), that not merely on theological, but on exegetical grounds, we were required to find some mode of interpreting the declaration, other than that which lies upon its face; that the perfect acquaintance displayed by our Lord with all the accompaniments of the great consummating scene was scarcely compatible with an ignorance of the precise time of the event. Deeper reflection, however, has induced me to modify that view, and along with Olshausen and Alford, to take the language in its more literal acceptation. Of course, the Being who, from undervived knowledge knew all the accessories of the final event, knew also its time; and the only question here is, whether our Saviour was speaking out of that infinite fulness of knowledge which belongs to his divine nature, or under the limitations which marked his humiliation.

In looking at our Saviour, we must hold fast to the truth that he was a man. The doctrine of his real and true humanity is no less essential to an adequate conception of his character than the doctrine of his true divinity. Theoretically, indeed, we all admit it, but in fact are perpetually liable to ignore it, and half fancy that his display of human attributes is a sort of illusion, like the angel human forms of the Old Testament. But, in truth, the genuine and complete humanity of Christ enters into the very core of the New Testament representations regarding him. It is an essential condition and element of his substitutionary sacrifice. It behoved him to be made in all points like unto his brethren, to incorporate himself vitally with humanity, that his redemptive work might be brought to bear upon the race as legitimately as the ruin inflicted by its first earthly Head. His humanity, then, is no illusion; it is all just as real, just as positive as his divinity. It is just as true that he was finite as that he was infinite; that in his incarnation his knowledge and power were circumscribed, as that, as the eternal word, he was omniscient and omnipotent. Hence all the statements regarding his humanity are to be taken precisely as if regarding any other man. He grew in wisdom and in stature; he could hunger and thirst, could suffer fatigue and sorrow, could need and receive sympathy and consolation. How all this could be—how the infinite and the finite could meet in the same wondrous personage—how Deity could humble, restrict, hedge himself about with the limitations of the creature—is a problem which transcends, I think, all human and all finite capacity; it is one of the unfathomable mysteries which will form the growing wonder of eternity. Enough that we have the fact,—that He who was in the form of God, and counted it not robbery to be equal with God, made himself of no reputation (emptied himself), by assuming the form of a servant, and being found in fashion as a man.

And in this humble, limited, finite nature he wrought out his work as Messiah, and of course every part of it. He grew in wisdom and in knowledge, and in the study of the Old Testament, and in the growing developments of his internal life, the fact gradually dawned upon his childish spirit that he was the destined Redeemer of the world. He was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, sustained in his long fast by the same power that sustained Elijah and Moses, and when called to encounter the temptations of Satan, he overcame by weapons drawn from the word of God. He fortified himself habitually by prayer, spent nights in wrestling and communion with God, and learned obedience by the things which he suffered. He prayed at the grave of Lazarus, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me, and I knew that thou hearest me always;" and in his closing prayer he declares that he has kept in his Father's name those whom his Father has given him.

The Saviour's Messianic work, therefore, was wrought, not in his character of absolute Deity, but in subordination to the will and dependence on the power of his Father. And if this is true of any part of it, it is true of every part of it. It would be inconsistent with the fundamental conception of his position, as of one who had humbled himself to an inferior and dependent state, that he should, in a single instance, break over its boundaries, and act in his eternal and undervived nature and attributes. One such act would have been an abnegation of the state of humiliation into which he had entered, a breaking up of the arrangement for human redemption, and would have utterly disqualified him for accomplishing his work as Messiah. His condition must be one of unexceptional lowliness and dependence, from the cradle to the sepulchre, from Bethlehem to Calvary. This character must be preserved amidst all his miracles, his teachings, his prophecies. His miracles were put forth occasionally for specific purposes, and in the strict course of his Messianic office; when they were not thus put forth, he relapsed into the feebleness of ordinary humanity. He who fed the five thousand, himself hungered for food; he who trod the mountain billows of Galilee amidst night and storm, in his ordinary journeys was subject to the same fatigue with his companions. It was with him as with the elder prophets, as with his own apostles, who, though they could raise the dead, could not snatch themselves from the tomb; though they healed thousands of the sick, yet over the alarming illness of a friend were in danger of being swallowed up with over-much sorrow.

The Saviour's miracles, therefore, were his Father's miracles, not his own; the power he exercised was conferred upon him by his Father; and thus also we are bound to believe that he prophesied. His prophesying was not that of the Omniscience that sweeps all the future, but that of the heaven-inspired man who communicates what is revealed to him. And as the ancient prophets, amidst the ecstasies of inspiration, sought what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify, so the Great Prophet yet prophesied in subordination to his Father, and knew not the times or the seasons which the Father had placed in his own power. And this same ignorance evidently attended the apostles through all their ministry; they never knew the day nor the hour, but to the last believed it vastly nearer than time has proved it. We may therefore — salva fide et ecclesia — take the language of our Saviour here in its literal significance. It in reality involves nothing more derogatory to his divinity than the fact that he prayed, than the fact that he suffered hunger or fatigue, than the fact of his being liable to temptation, or in any other way subject to the limitations of humanity. We must bear constantly in mind that one real human attribute implies all real human attributes; that one essential attribute of divinity implies all the essential attributes of divinity. An omniscient man is as much a monstrosity as a non-omniscient God; and thus humbled, thus encompassed with the weaknesses of the flesh, our Saviour acted, taught, wrought miracles, prophesied, lived, died, rose again, all in obedience to the will of the Father. I repeat, how the great enigma of his twofold nature is to be solved—how divine power could lie folded up in that marvellous personage, slumbering, yet not annihilated, I pretend not to understand, and Scripture offers no solution of the mystery. It assures us that the Word who was with God, and who was God, became flesh and tabernacled among men, among them and of them, and so sharing their nature, that his sympathies could vibrate in unison with theirs through all the complicated range of their experience, while he yet displayed a glory as of the only begotten Son of God.

LEIGHTON AND HIS TIMES.*

No apology is ever needed to Scottish Christianity for any contribution to the narrative of the Covenanting era,—any honest attempt to throw a clearer light on the men and the deeds of that stirring time. In every country which has a national history worth reading, there are subjects which have in their very names a spell to arrest and fascinate,—epic themes, that by prescriptive right preserve perpetual freshness. It will be long before Germany hears the last of Luther and his table-friends; America, of the Pilgrim Fathers and the 'Mayflower'; England, of the Marian martyrs and the heroic Puritans of the Commonwealth. Historian or lecturer, or, as in this case, poet, who announces such a topic, presents himself to the public mind with a letter of introduction that secures a good audience and an attentive hearing.

The present is an original and skilful attempt to reproduce the marking features and spirit of an eventful time, as they appeared to one whose lot, mysteriously to himself, was cast in the midst of it. The point of view is altogether novel. It is not with the eyes of statesman in the cabinet, or soldier in the field, the homeless pastor in mountain cave, or the armed peasant on misty moorland, that we watch the seething, whirling elements of disturbance around; but with those of a sorrowful and contemplative recluse, surveying the outside world through "the loopholes of retreat,"—as from a quiet, studious chamber, one might look abroad on the forest boughs tossing and creaking in the storm, or in a kind of reverie listen to the wind as it sweeps past in fitful gusts, and marks its course by ravage and destruction.

We cannot wonder that one who has thoughtfully retraced those bygone times should have lingered long over such a character as that of Leighton;—that devout minds should always have had their sympathies powerfully attracted by his mild and gentle virtues, his Christian lowliness and sincerity, his sensitive recoil from discord and contention,—above all, by his deep and all-pervading spirituality. That a man who, from day to day, ruled his life so manifestly in the fear of God, and strove to walk in the steps of Jesus Christ, should have, in his public life, been associated with men whose names in their own generation were infamous, whose memories are branded with perpetual dishonour, authors of evil and wrong that have been burnt into the remembrance of after times, is indeed an enigma. How men of types of character so antagonistic as Robert Leighton and James Sharpe, the meek pastor and the domineering priest, the ascetic student and the time-serving politician, men whose natures must have repelled each other at every point, could ever have come to be identified with the same policy, embarked on the same desperate cause, and that opposed to all their earlier professions, appears one of the harshest and saddest contradictions that history can furnish.

It is this problem which the author of these striking poems sets himself to solve,—how, in his own words, "a servant of God found himself so strangely ranged on the devil's side in the great conflict of the age, though fully minded all the while to fight the battle of the Lord." To this task he has brought no common qualifications,—intimate acquaintance with the epoch, and that clear insight into intricacies and complexities of character which only genial human sympathies can give,—a power of vivid conception and picturesque description that imparts to his pictures the charm of fresh and brilliant colouring. The result is a life-like portrait of the man,—a finished study of character, which possesses all the interest of faithful biography. With loving appreciation of all that was really genuine and noble in Leighton, those rare attributes of soul and heart which one feels breathing through every page of his great Commentary like a gracious inspiration, he can see the real element of weakness in his character. There was in him too much of that "mystic spiritualism" which shrinks from contact with the coarse, hard-featured realities of life; and this unfitted him for dealing with the men and events of a stormy age to any useful and enduring purpose.

"I was not meant for action; I
Like wind-harp in the window sigh;
When breath of heaven is passing by;
But from a ruder finger fly
The long-drawn notes, and fall
Harsh and unmusical.

Lord, place me where thy breath may be Tremulous all day long on me."

This was a man better fitted for the cloister than for royal ante-chambers and parliament-halls. It is a touching and sorrowful picture this of the good bishop longing for peace, while all round him were still for war,—not seeing that in such times, when men's souls were stirred to their depths, and the issues in debate were so terribly solemn and real, it was only through war that any peace worth having could come. If ever a man by birth and nurture, and all the traditions which can endear to childhood a persecuted cause, might have been expected to resist to the death that form of Church rule which a perjured king and a venal parliament sought to "screw down" on a race of Christian freemen, it was the son of the man who wrote "Zion's Plea Against Prelacy," and had been visited with the most merciless penalties that the inquisitors of the Star-Chamber could devise. Surely with the other harassing thoughts that overcast so many years of his life with gloom, there must have mingled some remembrance of his father's wrongs to add to the bitterness of his self-reproach. Committed by a too mild and facile disposition to measures which he in soul abhorred, and struggling to escape into the pure, untroubled atmosphere of antique piety, disappointed, care-worn, weary, and at last retiring from the world to die of a broken heart, we cannot but grieve for him with tender pity. We might call him a Christian Hamlet,—the man of reverie rather than resolve, of speculation, not of action. The times were out of joint, and he was not the man to set them right. He was doomed to feel that once Providence sets a train of grand events in motion, they roll on with relentless and crushing force in their inevitable track, not to be stopped by timid and delicate hands, but rather to grind them to powder.

This volume takes its title from a favourite haunt of Leighton's, in the old cathedral town with which his name is connected,—a shady avenue of ash trees skirting the western wall of the grey old minster, from which you have glimpses of the clear bright Allan wimpling at the foot of the wooded slope below. Pacing up and down the green cloister, the bishop gives utterance to the thoughts that lie heavy on his heart.

"A frail slight form—no temple he,
Grand, for abode of Deity;
Rather a bush, inflamed with grace,
And trembling in a desert place,
And unconsumed with fire,
Though burning high and higher

And over all that noble face
Lay somewhat of soft pensiveness
In a fine golden haze of thought,
That seemed to waver light, and float
This way and that way still,
With no firm bent of will."

Sundered from all with whom he had in earlier days walked in pleasant Christian fellowship,—thrown amongst men from whose low and sordid aims his whole nature recoiled,—powerless for good, yet knowing that his name and example are lent to the sanction of evil,—what is his dignity but a cross, and the mitre but an uneasy covering for the head, when it is lined with thorns! He could wish that the strife and trouble were well ended,—he longs for wings like a dove, that he might fly away and be at rest.

"The men I love my way deplore;
The men I loathe do hate me more;
With whom I live I have no ties;
With whom I left, sad memories;
With none have I the power
To help this evil hour.

O weary heart! O hapless fate!
O evil times of strife and hate!
The raven finds a carcass there,
The poor dove flutters in the air,
And longs again to flee
Unto the ark and Thee."

His pensive musings are broken by the appearance of one of his oldest and best loved friends, long parted from his side by the feuds of the distracted times,—a godly minister, driven from church and home for his faith, now seeking shelter from his pursuers; for he is hunted for his life, and is now faint and bleeding from a mortal wound. It has been his earnest wish to see Leighton once more—to hear a few last words of tender remembrance, and Christian comfort from his lips; for well he had known him of old as a son of consolation,—

"He used to go down with a soul
Into the valley dark of doom,
Further than any I ever knew."

He has but strength to falter out a few touching words,—to make an appeal that wrings Leighton's heart to the core, and then to die. The bishop feels that something like this was needed to rouse him from the languor and listlessness into which, through utter despondency, his spirit had sunk. It is a summons to gird up his loins for the work that, as a Christian man, he may yet do for his Master, during the time that remains,—labouring in the service of God in the faith that though the seed he casts may seem to perish in the world, it will spring up in far off summers that he shall not see, and the fruit be gathered by other hands than his own:—

“Yes, I will hope, O Lord, in Thee
That faithful work shall fruitful be.
Tears, bitter tears, may fall like rain,
Yet shower upon the earth in vain;
But the true work is never
A profitless endeavour.

Perchance the fruit is not to-day,
For the quick growth hath quick decay;
But we shall sow and others reap,
And they shall joy, though we may weep;
Yet in the harvest shall Be gladness unto all.”

We avow our admiration for the saintly virtues that threw so much of the beauty of holiness round the character of Leighton, our love for the man who wrote that book of which Coleridge has not shunned to say, that it stands “next to the inspired Scriptures,—yea, and as the vibration of that once-struck hour remaining on the air.” Yet we cannot but regard him as responsible for much of the wrong-doing and oppression of that evil time;—deeply blame-worthy in this, that while believing that those hotly-contested points of Church government and order were non-essential, he yet gave all the weight of his fair name and unsullied reputation to the attempt to impose them on men to whom they were essential, who put in the plea of conscience to show cause why they could not conform nor compromise. Granting, as we are by no means disposed to grant, that they were the weaker brethren in the controversy, the fact that this was a matter of conscience to them, while it was no more than a matter of expediency to him, rendered it a case in which the great apostolic rule of charity should have been enough to decide the public action of every Christian man. If a mitre or rochet made his brother to offend, he should not have worn mitre nor rochet while the world stood, lest he made his brother to offend. So did not Leighton act; and he was drawn into a course which marred his usefulness and dimmed his light, saddened the hearts of righteous men and pierced him through with many sorrows.

For the subtlety and skill with which the author's conception is wrought out, we must refer our readers to the book itself. It would be easy, though scarcely fair, to multiply quotations,—to show the power that condenses much thought into a single line with all the terseness and point of an epigram, and the fine fancy that enriches and illuminates the subject with gleams of sparkling imagery. The minor poems are a series of character sketches and incidents, designed to bring out in clear relief the features of the age. There is much genuine poetic faculty put forth in them, but we question the propriety of resuscitating characters so simply worthless and detestable as Rothes and the time-serving Councillor of Aberdeen. In the very attempt to photograph such men by letting them speak for themselves, there is risk of appearing to treat sacred subjects with irreverence and levity. The more life-like the portrait, the more repulsive must it be, and the more painfully does it jar on our moral and spiritual sensibilities. Of such personages, as their faces look out upon us from the darkness of the past, it is better, as Dante says of some of those whom he beheld in the visions of the City of Woe, not to discourse, but glance at them and pass on.

Not the least valuable part of this book is the prefatory essay, which contains a lucid exposition, much needed in these times, of the true character and vital importance of the great religious war of the 17th century in Scotland, as a struggle for civil as well as religious liberty. Such a passage as the following deserves to be maturely weighed:—

“The contest was in both kingdoms identical, though its form was in the one political, in the other ecclesiastical. And this difference arose most naturally from the historical position of the two countries. In England, liberty depended on a free Parliament; in Scotland, its foundation was a free Assembly. While the great statesmen of the south, therefore, contended for the privileges of the Lower House, in the north the patriot party fought for the rights of the Ecclesiastical Courts; both having precisely the same end in view. For in Scotland there never was a Parliament, in the English sense of the word.

“The only free popular assembly in which the people were represented, was the Supreme Court of the Church; and accordingly, the patriot party felt that to sacrifice this was to give up the only legal means they had of expressing the will of the people.

“Let this be remembered, and the ecclesiastical character of our Scottish struggle will appear to the English mind less strange and repulsive; and its formulas will be seen in their true significance and value, as the ensigns of an army, every one of which is precious, not for its inherent worth, but for what it represents.”

THE HIGHLANDS—“THE MEN.”

“‘THE MEN’ were so named, not because they were not women, but because they were not ministers.” When it was necessary to distinguish between the speakers at a fellowship meeting in the Highlands, the easiest way of doing so was by saying, “one of the ministers,” or “one of the men said so.” Hence the name designates “speakers at religious meetings in the Highlands who were not ministers.”

This class of laymen, labouring more or less occasionally in word and doctrine in the north of Scotland, have been chiefly known elsewhere on account of the extraordinary and exceptional position which, in some places and under certain circumstances, they took up. The world has been lately edified by the memoirs of Dr. Carlyle of Inveresk, the good-humoured, good-natured, good-tempered, and thrice worldly moderate of the last century. It is a pleasant book to read; but when you close it you feel as if you had been looking into a tomb, where the decorous embroidery of the vestments does not hide the odour of corruption. There is no life in that prophet's bones! Now, at the time when such men as Dr. Carlyle "led" the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ in Scotland, many men were settled as ministers in the parishes of the Highlands, not more destitute of religion than he, (for that was simply impossible), but about as worldly, and with less of accomplishment and ability to supply the place of honesty towards God. In a city this curse of a lifeless minister may be avoided. People can always leave the church where the words of God are not heard and go to another; but in the vast Highland parishes, some of them thirty or forty miles in length, it was impossible to travel to the next church, even in a favourable season of the year, and when the straths were not choked with snow. So what a godless ministry could not do a godly laity did. These "men," accustomed to speak on religious subjects at fellowship meetings, in their congregations and at sacramental gatherings, and looked up to with reverence by all the people on account of their gifts and graces, became naturally and inevitably the centres of religious influence and stewards of the grace of God. It was a good and worthy work, done for the Master's sake; and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was, we may not doubt, written before Him for those who in those dark days feared the Lord, and sought that those around them should call upon his name. Nor has the revived and more faithful Church in later days been slow to acknowledge the benefit thus bestowed. Yet, at the same time, the position thus thrust upon or assumed by laymen was a trying one, good for that present distress, but dangerous in ordinary times; and it was partially in consequence of this that, in some part of the Highlands, there appeared those cases of separatism and spiritual demagoguery which have brought an evil report upon the whole class. Mischievous as the men who assumed this latter position doubtless were, their faults have been greatly exaggerated by those who were unable or unwilling to perceive their many excellences. Nor is it of less importance to observe that these cases of undue assumption and turbulence were confined to certain districts of the country, and never pervaded the mass of the men in the Highlands. In Mr. Kennedy's book on "The Fathers in Ross-shire," which has given occasion to our noticing this subject, he rightly observes that in Ross-shire, at least, there was no such distortion, but that there the institution of the "men" might be studied in its uncorrupted integrity.

"When a godly Highland minister discerned a promise of usefulness in a man, who seemed to have been truly converted unto God, he brought him gradually forward into a more public position, by calling him, first to pray, and then 'to speak to the question,' at the ordinary congregational meetings." Having approved himself as a useful speaker at these "fellowship" meetings, he was thereafter called upon to speak at the more public "Friday meetings," on communion occasions, when multitudes were gathered from various parishes, and where the more eminent of the "men," from the whole district, or often from very distant localities, interchanged their views and experiences. By means of these great religious gatherings, those who were eminent in gifts and graces became widely known, and a spiritual aristocracy was formed, whom "the people magnified" as poor in this world's goods but rich in faith. And when we recollect that this was among a people scattered over wide-lying moors and straths, illiterate, if not unintelligent, and cut off from modern means of general intercourse by difference of language, we cannot but regard it as a privilege and a blessing. And if the expediency of the "Fridays" on sacramental occasions may be defended, still more may the ordinary "fellowship" or congregational meetings, in which the institution is represented as taking its rise. "Of the question, 'How far lay agency may be employed for the edification of the Church,' the wisest practical solution has been furnished in the service of the fellowship meeting. It is surely desirable that, if there are talented and godly men in a congregation, an opportunity should be afforded for securing to others the benefit of those gifts with which the Lord has endowed them." Yet, while this is true, it must receive considerable modification, from the fact of which we are informed by Mr. Kennedy, that the speaking at these church meetings was generally, or, as it would seem, invariably, restricted to discussion of a question as to the "'marks' of true believers, and the various respects in which they may differ from merely nominal Christians." Many will doubtless find, in this strange restriction of topic (or of method), a cause of the alleged subjectiveness and self-scrutinizing nature of Highland religion; but those who do so will fall into the old error of "putting the cart before the horse." It was not the cause, but the very unmistakable and singular effect. We do not suppose that, in any other portion of the Church of Christ, such a remarkable limitation of topics for the public communion of saints ever held force, in the midst of a strong and vital religion.

Yet, thus restricted by temperament and circumstances, the piety of "the men," or, at least, its manifestation in feeling and experience, seemed to become the more intense, as a fountain throws its jet to a greater height when you narrow the aperture from which it springs. At the "Friday meetings" especially, the deep and exercised godliness of many of these servants of God found wonderful utterance. To illiterate men, whose heart was filled with the love of Christ, a mouth and wisdom was given such as mere theology does not know. "Traces of learning, mixed with the halo of that light, would be spots of darkness." Some of them were indeed men of great natural powers, and their genius, uncultivated in other things, found amplest scope in contemplation and utterance of the things of God.

THE JOURNEY TO EMMAUS:

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT, GLASGOW.

THE Evangelic story increases in interest as it draws near its close: this journey to Emmaus is one of the most tender and life-like pictures in all the book. How full of simple nature it is; and how full also of glorious grace! It is like one of those engravings in milk-white porcelain, which have little meaning as long as you look upon them lying on the ground, but which shine out with a soft and heaven-like radiance when you look through them to the light. The simple, child-like talk of these two disciples on their journey constitutes the material and form of the transparency; and Jesus joining them is the light which gives the picture life. Abraham watching for an opportunity to entertain strangers, entertained angels unawares; but these fishermen of Galilee, these little ones of the new kingdom, are greater in privilege than the patriarch Abraham,—conversing about Jesus as they walked by the way, they were permitted, ere they were aware, to converse with Jesus. He was nearer than they deemed. To them that look for him he will appear; with them who love his company he will walk.

No word, no act of Jesus was of private interpretation and limited to one case. As sunbeams would be in a great measure wasted if they were thrown off only a short way from the sun's disc, and permitted to perish there like sparks, so words and works thrown off from the life of Jesus, would have been almost thrown away if they had reached and touched only the little circle that followed him during his ministry on earth. He is the sun in the centre, and his rays are the light of the world; the world's furthest corner, and time's latest day, have no other light. The rays which he scattered travel far; they reach the ends of the world and the latest day of time. When he prayed for the disciples who followed him, he made it known that the prayer was meant for all generations; on the same principle his teaching and his acting are meant for all generations too. "Neither pray I"—and we may add, neither speak I, neither act I—"for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word" (John xvii. 20). For our sakes he drew near to the two disciples that day on the road, and opened the Scriptures; for our sakes he lighted a flame of love in their hearts by contact with his own; for our sakes the act was done, the word spoken, and the record kept. Let disciples to-day take and use the legacy which the Lord has left to them.

I. The Way.—The journey which the two disciples made that day on foot was a part of their life-course over time. I do not know what their errand was. Perhaps it was to obtain food and lodging for the night. The city was not an inviting place in those days to the few Galileans, bewrayed by their rustic speech, who had followed the crucified One. There might be in the neighbouring village some relative according to the flesh, or some fellow-disciple of kindred spirit, who could give bed, and board, and welcome, to two destitute men. This, or some similar errand, drew them in that direction; for the Spirit had not yet been fully given, and the apostolic ministry had not yet begun. Here, then, were two men dear to the Son of God—bought by his blood and heirs of his kingdom, trudging in company away from a city where they had few friends, to seek shelter in a neighbouring village. These men were weary that day, but they are resting now; then they had not where to lay their heads, but they have mansions of their own to-day in the Father's house.

Now, reader, if you have closed with Christ for yourself, here is consolation for you. A stream is running at your feet that flows from the fountain of living waters. There is something here for a thirsty soul. If you are on the track of these two poor Galileans, as you cross the wilderness, you will soon join their company in their happy home. Remember it is not one or two kinds of sorrow that Jesus knows, but all kinds; it is not one or two kinds of wounds that he heals, but all kinds. You are an orphan, a stranger; you are poor or sick; you are cast off by those who should have been friends, or put to shame by the bad conduct of some who in nature are near you; you cannot find employment for yourself or food for your children; or although you have enough of this world's food, some poison drop has fallen into your full cup, and you are as much distressed as if you lacked food and raiment. What then? Then, though the way be rough, and the wayfarer weary, you may have—

II. Christ with you by the Way.—Let us try to live up to our privileges; it is not only Christ with you when you kneel alone to pray, with you when you worship with the great congregation, with you when you commemorate his death at his table; but Christ with you while you walk by the way in the ordinary toils of life. The spirit of the world is all out of its reckoning here; it desires to have some part in the Saviour; it will not altogether adopt the evil spirit's word, "What have we to do with thee, thou Jesus?" It has some business with the Saviour. It would have Christ at some times and for some purposes; but it strains hard to give him a wide berth at all other times. It would resign to the Lord some bits of life, but expects all the rest for itself and its chosen companions. The bargain which men would fain drive is, Let Christ go with us to the church, but let us go without him to the market by day and the ball-room by night. When they have work or play on hand, they desire to work or play in earnest, and therefore must have all their time and all their energy employed on the matter in hand; but when they go to church on the Sabbath, the time is lost at any rate, and they do not object to the company of the Lord of lords and King of kings. There is a blasphemy in spirit and act, as well as in words. The superstition of Rome, and the ungodliness of the mammon-worshipper, fall into one here, and work to each other's hands. The grand aim of both is to get Christ banished into a corner, and to reserve all the breadth of life's day for man's own pleasure.

The Master knows nothing of such a separation; neither does the true disciple. The Redeemer and the redeemed have much to do with each other. Did you ever pay a heavy price for a house or an estate, and was it much out of your mind for days and weeks afterwards? How often did you go to see it, and how long did you linger every time you were there? How would you have taken it, if you had seen one day as you approached your property, a ticket hung up by somebody who had no right there, intimating that you the owner would be admitted only once a-week, and that at a certain hour, and all this that the neighbours whose own it was not, who had paid no price for it, might revel in it at will, and not be disturbed by the owner's presence? You would take it ill; so He who bought you with his blood counts much on his purchase, and takes it ill when he is admitted only on certain days and at certain hours to his own. Disciples of Jesus, he loves to be with you when you walk by the way; you cost him dear, and, therefore, you are much upon his heart.

Take the promise, "Lo I am with you always," on both its sides, as a duty and a privilege. You must lie open for his incoming at your most prosperous moments; and you may expect his company when your heart is sad. Welcome his presence when your life-path is green and flowery, and he will draw near to comfort you when it is dusty or hard. But we need not try to disguise it; we cannot enjoy the company of one whom we dread. Even those who are called by Christ's name often entertain hard thoughts of him. They make up their minds indeed to seek his company, but it is because they cannot help it. They do it only because they must, and therefore they put it off as long as they can. They are afraid of being cast away at last if they do not become Christ's disciples, but they feel that it damps their joys to come near the Saviour. Oh, it is the greatest mistake that was ever made by man! Read the history of the man Christ Jesus; trace every footstep of his path in life; listen to every word he uttered;—all is tenderness and love. He did everything to entice us to seek his company; nothing to keep us back. It is an evil heart of unbelief that misrepresents the loving heart of Jesus. It was the evil spirit—the father of lies possessing a man that said, when Jesus came near, that he came near to torment. He comes near to comfort. He came to the world to save sinners; he loves when they come to him; he delights to come to them, and do his saving work. His presence makes solitude pleasant and labour light.

When John Welsh was spending the night alone in the Church of Ayr, a man who went to listen, reported on his return that there were two persons in the Church, and that they were carrying on an earnest argument. That witness was true. The Master was with his servant there that night, and they were reasoning together. The Angel of the Covenant was there, and John Welsh wrestled in spirit with him, as Jacob had done in body and spirit both long before.

III. Christ opening the Scriptures to the disciples by the way. A shut Bible does not save. In the Revelation, when John saw a sealed book which no man could open, he began to weep, because its secret could not be unfolded; but one of the elders said unto him, "Weep not, for the Lion of the tribe of Judah hath prevailed to open the book." He who will at last open the book of judgment, opens now the book of grace. The same Jesus breaks the seals of both. If he open to us the first book, the second will contain nothing which we shall have cause to dread. He who is "the way unto the Father," is also the way into the Scriptures which make known the Father's will. If Christ had not come, and suffered, and risen, the Bible would have been a sealed book. Its shadows would have been spectres if he, the substance, had not appeared. His incarnation, and ministry, and sacrifice, gave a meaning to them all.

Sometimes when a door is barred, the people who congregate on the outside cannot open it, either by skill or power; but one within can open it easily. It is thus that Christ is the opener of the Scriptures. He is in them; not that he has been placed in the Scriptures, but that he was first, and they have been woven round him. From within he opens; and through the opening we behold himself: "They are they which testify of me."

He not only opened the Scriptures, he opened them to us. The book may be plain and intelligible in its own nature, and yet remain a mystery to me. It is not only that Christ, by his own life and death, gave meaning to the Bible; it is he who, by his Spirit, makes the Bible true and transparent in the experience of each. He who has not been born again cannot see the kingdom of God, although it lies before his eyes in the evangelic histories. To the natural mind the gospel is a sealed book. As long as you look on the outside of it you are ignorant of its meaning; it is when Christ becomes its light that the Bible becomes transparent, and the reader sees into its heart.

When he opens the Scriptures to me, he shows me that the blood of the Lamb takes my sin away; he gives me the promise in my hand, and closes my hand around it, and I feel that it bears my weight. It is in Christ crucified that I can see myself lost, and in Christ crucified that I can see myself saved.

IV. Our hearts burning within us in the company of Jesus. Here is the result of their Lord's presence by the way. It not only cleared their heads, it also kindled their hearts. Then they both understood Christianity and loved Christ.

Observe the kind, the degree, and the effects of this emotion:—

The kind: it was love. This is what the Lord desires; he is never satisfied till he attain it. "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" That is the final test of discipleship. All other things are stepping-stones to this. Faith, hope, love—these three, but the greatest of these is love.

The degree: it is a fervent love. It must be great, if it be at all. No little forgiveness comes from the Forgiver, and, therefore, no little languid love can lie in the heart of the forgiven. The opening of the Scriptures to the disciples was like the act of concentrating upon one spot by a lens the sun-rays that lay scattered over a wide surface. The scattered beams were cold, although clear; they imparted light, but did not kindle a flame. When the rays of Christ's love that are spread in the Bible are gathered to a point, and kept playing on your heart, they set that heart on fire. Those who are walking about in the diffused light of a Christian land—clear, but cool—are offended by the commotion of a revival. A neighbour's heart takes fire under the sudden inburst of redeeming love; but they cannot understand what is all about. Each is acting and speaking truly according to his own experience. Festus says, "Paul, thou art beside thyself;" and Paul replies, "I am not mad, most noble Festus." Each represents the matter correctly as it appears from his own view point. The one is cold, the other is burning; the one is hard, the other is melting. That makes all the difference.

The effects. This fire, when it is kindled, will burn out some things that occupied the heart unworthily. Many things can maintain their place firmly in a cold heart; which will melt and flow away when the heart begins to burn with love to Christ. The chambers of imagery, where there is only a name to live, may be filled with vanities as a carpenter's shop is filled with shavings, but when the heart takes fire, they crackle quickly off. The multitude of vain thoughts are driven like smoke before the wind. The union of Christians is another effect of this fire. Artificial efforts to bring together unkindred spirits are ever painfully unsuccessful. Even although both the lumps be true gold, as long as they are cold they are kept apart from each other by sundry crooks and corners in both, but the moment that they are melted, they flow, of their own accord, into one. The short-cut to the union of Christians is a great increase in love to Christ.

VOLTAIRE.*

MUCH superfluous terror for the fate of Christianity was once occasioned by the writings of Voltaire and that host of sceptical writers of whom he was the Coryphæus. It is sufficient to ask, at this distance of time, whether their works or the Bible be nearer oblivion,—whether they or it be most read? Is Christianity less powerful than when they commenced their crusade against it? Have they succeeded in diminishing the world's veneration for the book they hated? of checking its translation or diffusion? of making the nations who then professed Christianity renounce it? Nothing of the kind; their indiscriminate assaults on the fabric of Christianity have had the effect, indeed, of shaking down some ruinous turrets, of exploding some pernicious superstitions and abuses, and it would have been well if they had destroyed more; but as to Christianity itself—the religion of the Bible—their assaults on it only roused the slumbering zeal of its defenders and champions. Never since the apostolic age has this religion been more energetic than since the reaction against the great sceptical attacks of the middle and close of the last century. The nations that professed Christianity then profess it still, and generally with somewhat more enlightened faith in it and wiser love for it than they cherished then; partly, no doubt (let us candidly acknowledge it), owing to the hostile criticism of those who would fain have destroyed it altogether. The Bible speaks at this day in a hundred more languages than it spoke then, while cobwebs are already gathering over the greater part of the sceptical literature of the last century. The mass of it is fast being conveyed, like that of preceding sceptical epochs, to the dust of the upper shelf; or if, as in the case of Bolingbroke, Gibbon, and Voltaire, genius still redeems large portions from neglect, it is the portions, for the most part, in which their infidelity does not appear; those which it infests being generally considered as blots and not beauties in their works. But as for supplanting the Bible,—its circulation, the veneration with which it is regarded, and the efforts to make it utter the vernacular of all nations, are incomparably greater than in Voltaire's day. It is even ludicrous now to read in Voltaire's letters his unfulfilled prophecies of the approaching glories of the new dispensation of "Reason," in whose splendour the waning Bible was to be lost. On the contrary, the infidel literature of the day has, for the most part, gone into deep shadow, while that shines with a brighter and more diffused light than ever. The talent devoted to its vindication—its illustration—its criticism—and the toil and cost spent in its translation and circulation, have been far greater than at any other equal period since Christianity was first proclaimed to be "the truth of God." This, it may be said, does not prove Christianity true: it is admitted; but it conclusively proves this,—the folly of the vaunting tone ever assumed by every fresh storming party, and the equal folly of the transient panics as constantly felt by those who man the walls.

In truth, however we may lament that minds like those of Voltaire, Hume, or Gibbon, should have been prostituted to the cause of infidelity, or mourn the mischief which their writings may have done, especially during their own time, there is one point of view in which we can hardly regret that Christianity has met with such assailants. The attacks of such men on Christianity furnish most powerful proofs of its indomitable life. Its inherent strength would never have been so conspicuously seen except it had been thus tried; we can now more safely repose in the solidity of a structure on which so many storms have burst in vain. Never since Christianity entered the world have writers of greater talent or wider popularity conspired for its downfall, or under circumstances more favourable to the success of the enterprise (could anything have made it successful), than during the latter half of the eighteenth century.

Of all these writers, Voltaire was by far the most active, the most witty, the most variously endowed with the gifts of genius; the most voluminous, the most incessant in his attacks, the most widely circulated, the most eagerly read; and yet it is no paradox to say, that he has proved in reality one of the least dangerous. His general character has, in a great degree, destroyed his influence as an assailant of Christianity. Not only is there so much in his general writings which the universal voice of all decent society condemns—not only is the tone in which he speaks of all things revered by man, whether human or divine, so impartially profane—not only is his morality so lax, his estimate of human nature so contemptuous, his reputation for mendacity and malice so well established, as to make him a questionable ally of any cause; but it is impossible that a mind imbued with the least particle of candour or love of truth can fail to see all his worst traits conspicuously exemplified when he touches on Christianity. “Per fas aut nefas,” seems to be his motto, when the object is to discredit or cast ridicule on the Bible.

The libertine, who has come to a foregone conclusion, and is willing to accept anything which insults the religion he hates and the truths which are unwelcome to him, can alone gloat upon the perpetual ribaldry of Voltaire, or accept his jests and mockery for argument. The bulk of ordinary readers will ever feel, that it is passionate hatred which speaks, that there is no fair or honest attempt to investigate evidence, and that truth, candour, decency, are all perpetually outraged.

As far as argument is concerned, perhaps one of the best ways of conveying to the minds of general readers an idea of Voltaire's incompetency to deal with such large subjects as Christianity and the Bible, is to give a slight specimen of his mode of dealing with matters where prejudice and passion were not likely to be half so strong. We may there see, clearly enough, how completely his genius was the reverse of that of a philosopher, how unfitted to investigate evidence; how completely it was the slave of preconception; how incapable of breaking through the little circle of previous theory or presumed experience. His credulous incredulity—we know not what else to call it—is coaxed with strange facility into accepting anything which makes for a preconception, and rejecting everything that makes against it. . . . In the article “Shells” in the Philosophical Dictionary, Voltaire attempts to deal with the puzzling fact, then beginning to excite notice, that true marine fossils are found on the mountains of Switzerland, and in other elevated regions. He will not hear of it; no evidence shall establish it; and he resorts to the most ridiculous hypotheses to evade it. The “shells” may be “snails' shells,” or they are the “cockle shells” of the multitude of palmers who made their way to Rome over the Alps during the middle ages! It may be thought that this last is one of the jests by which his petulance was accustomed to turn the edge of any inconvenient argument. If it be so, what can be said of such a mode of getting rid of plain facts which imperatively required to be accounted for? But, in truth, he seems to urge it as a really plausible solution; and it is not incredible, since he resorts to others hardly less ridiculous. “Lastly,” says he, “I deny not that, a hundred miles from the sea we meet with petrified oysters, conches, univalves, productions which perfectly resemble marine ones, but are we sure that the soil of the earth may not produce these fossils? The formation of vegetable agate should make us suspend our judgment. A tree has not borne the agate that is like a tree, and the sea may not have produced the fossil shells which seem to be those of little marine animals.” Thus does incredulity become as credulous as superstition itself; and all this because Voltaire had resolved that, whatever came of it, the fact which seemed to say that the sea had once flowed over what are now high mountain-ranges, in short, pointed to a “deluge” of some sort, must be ignored or denied! It may be supposed that he had objections to “deluges” of all kind, but from the article entitled “Deluge” in the same work, one may shrewdly infer that it was chiefly the thought of the “Noachian deluge” that made him resolve that there should be no fossil marine shells in such inconvenient places. At any rate a genuine philosopher, whether he accepted the Noachian deluge or not, would have accepted the facts; hypotheses might come after. It was of a piece with the same credulous incredulity to declare, as he so frankly does in one of his letters to D'Alembert, that no evidence should make him believe a miracle; though to suppose it false, in the case he supposes, would certainly involve a greater mystery. “If a hundred thousand men,” says he, “were to assure me that they all with their own eyes saw a dead man raised, I should say that they were all dazzled.” That is, to avoid believing a great improbability, he would believe one that would amount to an impossibility.

DR. MORISON OF CHELSEA.

PART II.

THE SUFFERER.

THE activity of Dr. Morison's life was manifold ; his aim was one. The pulpit, the press, the platform were in succession channels through which the full tide of his fervent spirit and copious intellect found utterance. While Sabbath after Sabbath he studiously prepared for his public ministrations, the press teemed with his publications,—some of these, as his “Family Worship” and his “Commentary on the Psalms,” were of no mean magnitude ; and never, when his convictions were on the side of any Christian or philanthropic enterprise, did he refuse it the aid of his clear, lively, ready eloquence. Even whilst travelling, as was his frequent call, as the advocate of missions, his buoyant, elastic mind and earnest heart were on the outlook for opportunities of doing good. With happy art he caught up the incidents of the way and turned them to account, seldom allowing a journey to pass without depositing seeds in the heart of some fellow-traveller, the fruit of which remains to be reaped in eternity. Travelling from Bath to London, on one occasion, he found himself inside the coach in company with two young ladies, the daughters—as he understood before the journey's end—of a clergyman in the neighbourhood of London. The young ladies had just been visiting a religious relative at Bath, and seemed like birds escaped from imprisonment. Their conversation was full of life and merriment. “I could not stand it much longer,” said one of them, significantly ; “it was nothing but Methodism.” “Do you know what Methodism is ?” said Dr. Morison, quietly. “I think it is just talking about religion all day long, and nothing else. Now, I don't think that was ever intended,” was the lady's reply. The door was now fairly opened, and Dr. Morison pursued the conversation with that genial earnestness and consummate tact which distinguished him. One of the young ladies, however, stood out very resolutely against his views of religion. And when the coach stopped at a cross road, where friends were waiting to receive them, Dr. Morison said to her, “Will my young friend let me request that before you go to bed to-night, you will read a chapter of your Bible, and pray to God that he will enlighten you on these subjects.” “Well,” she replied, “I am much obliged to you, at all events.” “Not at all obliged to me,” he said ; “for I am obliged to defend the truth whenever I hear it called in question.” Many years passed away, and the circumstance had almost vanished from his recollection, when he was invited to dinner by some member of his church who had recently spent an evening in another part of London, and had met with a clergyman and his wife who spoke much of Dr. Morison, and were very desirous to see him : the object of the dinner party was to supply the opportunity. During dinner conversation flowed freely, and the clergyman's wife, young and interesting, was frequently observed looking towards Dr. Morison in silence, but with tears in her eyes. After dinner the party went into the garden, and walking with Dr. Morison alone, the clergyman said to him, “I cannot tell you, sir, how much I am indebted to you.” “I am not at all aware that you are indebted to me,” was the natural reply. “You have observed my wife,” said the clergyman, “she is the best of wives and the best of mothers ; Christianity has made her so, and it is through your words she became a Christian.” The circumstances were then recalled and their sequel related. The young lady that had stood so boldly out against his views of religion, in the Bath coach, went to bed that night, in spite of his parting counsel, without reading the Scriptures or bending her knee in prayer. But no sooner had she gone to bed than conscience began to work and would not let her sleep. The day's conversation—the parting admonition were recalled. She arose, dressed herself, and then read the word of God as she had never read it before, and prayed as she had never prayed before ; and the issue of it was her conversion to God. When the dinner party had re-assembled in the drawing-room, the clergyman said to his wife, “My dear, I have told him all ;” and the wife rose, and rushed to Dr. Morison as a child would to a father, and fell on his neck, and said, with an emotion which cannot be described : “Yes, if ever I get to heaven, I will own you for a spiritual father.” “Blessed are they,” adds the biographer of Dr. Morison, “that sow beside all waters, for in heaven such surprises and recognitions as these will be numerous and common.” It is a great faculty to preach by the way—shortly, lovingly, wisely, with a barbed word that will keep its place. Might not the gift be cultivated ?

Even whilst visiting amongst his ministerial brethren, he did not let slip his opportunity of speaking the word for the time. When travelling for a religious society, on one occasion, he happened to spend the night at the house of a minister whose conversation consisted mainly of violent censures of the National Church. He had attempted to divert the current, but in vain. On bidding his host adieu the following morning, he said to him seriously, “The next thing I expect to hear of you is, that you have gone into the Church of England.” “What do you mean ?” asked the astonished man. “Why, just this,” replied Dr. Morison ; “that I have rarely met with Dissenting ministers who have spoken so bitterly against the Establishment as you have, but I have sooner or later heard of them becoming connected with it themselves.” And so it was in this case ; for in singular confirmation of his shrewd discernment of character, the next thing he heard of that individual was that he had entered the Church of England.

Though a Dissenter and a Congregationalist, from conviction, Dr. Morison's spirit was entirely catholic ; and his judgment, whether pronouncing his editorial criticisms, or deciding on the merits of ministers of different denominations, eminently candid. When travelling in the Highlands of Scotland, he does not hesitate to contrast unfavourably a preacher of his own connection with one of the parochial clergy, whose sermon obtains his highest commendation. "We heard," says he, "on one of the Sabbaths we spent in the Highlands, a stranger, a young Independent minister from ———, who preached a good sermon, but too cold. We heard Mr. ———, a parish minister, in the evening, preach a sermon worth twenty of the morning one. It was full of the pith and marrow of the gospel. Oh, I wish our body would remember that our strength consists in a warm and energetic announcement of the gospel. It is delightful to find, among such inaccessible mountains, so fresh and fragrant an exhibition of the truths of the gospel."

It was a mind of this decided yet catholic character, at once firm and liberal, that was needed for wielding the editorial pen of the Evangelical Magazine, the organ and representative during its early struggles of English Evangelical Christianity. For more than thirty years, till from increasing infirmities the pen dropped from his hand, Dr. Morison added to his other labours the editing of that journal, often contributing with his own hand the articles of an entire number. When but a boy of nine years of age, and little dreaming of the relation in which he should one day stand to it, he used to travel monthly to the town of Banff for the new number of the Magazine. The distance was nine miles, and through the uncertain arrival of the sailing-packet which brought it, he had sometimes to go twice, sometimes three times before he obtained it. Often had he carried his shoes and stockings in his hand, and walked barefoot, till he reached the bridge which spans the Doveron. There, washing his feet, he would put himself in proper condition to appear in the streets of Banff. Having secured his Magazine he had often read every word of it, but the advertisements, before reaching home. When tired of reading as he walked, he would sit down by the road-side, and continue the perusal till he had finished it, foreshadowing the future editor in the boy, in that avidity for knowledge that was so characteristic of Dr. Morison, and that was never satisfied till he had perused every new book of note. How he found time, and possessed strength for the amount of work which he accomplished, was often a subject of wondering conjecture to his friends. The solution of his biographer is as strange as the fact to be accounted for, yet is as true as it is strange. Even his busy brain and industrious hand, says Mr. Kennedy, would have been altogether inadequate to the performance of so much labour, but for the necessity imposed upon him by disease. For nearly five and twenty years of his life he was so afflicted by asthma that he was oftener than otherwise compelled to leave his bed by two or three o'clock in the morning. And, although refreshed by occasional slumbers on his chair, it was no unusual thing for him to have done a hard day's work with his pen before the arrival of the breakfast hour. And at the breakfast table he would appear as fresh and cheerful as if he had only just risen from the enjoyment of unbroken rest. To this early working habit of Dr. Morison, a poor drunkard, who once accosted him on the streets of London bore a singular testimony. Asking Dr. Morison, as he staggered before him, how he was, the doctor replied that he did not think he was very well, for that he was on the way to ruin, and would assuredly bring the wrath of the Almighty upon himself unless he repented, and besought the Lord to pardon his sin. The man seemed sobered at once, and said, "Well, sir, I worked at a house opposite yours, and was often at work before four o'clock in the morning, but there was always a hand at work before mine. At a table, near the window, at No. 1 Walton Place, was that hand, and I thought how you were working for God, and I for the worst purposes, namely, to make myself like a brute."

There was more than too early hours at study and exhausting asthma to wear down the physical frame of Dr. Morison. The history of his family bereavements, as told by his biographer, adds a fresh and most touching chapter to the record of those who have passed through great tribulation. The stroke on stroke that left his house desolate would have crushed a mind of more elastic energy than his, had not his stay been upon a divine arm, and his strength drawn from things unseen. As star after star of his happy home went down under his horizon, he was sustained with the assurance that they rose in a heaven where they should never set. "Never," says his friend, the Rev. John Stoughton, "did I know a man who so suffered. While he was like Paul in labours more abundant, he was in stripes above measure; indeed, most of his work grew out of his sufferings; for owing to sleepless nights for many years, he devoted to toil the time we devote to rest; and I may add, much of his later sufferings grew out of his previous work, the disorders and infirmities of his final days being probably the weedy outgrowth of noxious seeds sown in hours of overtask-work. The robustness of his constitution, instead of preserving him from disease and pain, only served to render in his case disease the more terrible, and pain the more intense. After visiting him in the sick-room, and after listening to the quiet and even cheerful description he would give of his sufferings, I have gone home with the impression that all the ills which flesh is heir to centred in him. Domestic sorrow was added to physical distress. It is very wonderful to think of his afflictions, of what deep waters he had to wade through, what terrible billows he had to breast, and how the floods rose higher as life advanced—how the sharpest trials were the last. Some are fitted for heaven by toil alone or chiefly, others by tears alone or chiefly. Our departed friend underwent both kinds of meetening for the inheritance of the saints, and in almost equal degrees."

The first death which took place in Dr. Morison's family was that of a lovely infant fifteen months old. And his spirit mourned deeply but submissively over his Henry Martyn. In less than three months after the death of his Henry, he was called to weep over the loss of the mother he had loved tenderly in boyhood, and of whom he had often in the arduous and dependence of his young affections said, "I could not survive if my mother was to die." It was not long before the arrow again flew and laid low James, the son of his parents' most cherished hopes. James Murray is described as the most amiable and interesting of all Dr. Morison's sons. He is, said the father, the flower of the flock as to mere looks, he has good talents, and keeps in all things near the head of his class. In 1835 this beloved son was brought to the gates of death by the rupture of a blood-vessel. He was removed to Ventnor, in the Isle of Wight, where his mother remained with him for three months. His parents had hoped of James that he had been sanctified from the womb, so tractable and guileless a youth he had been; but on bursting a second blood-vessel a week after his removal to Ventnor, his mind came under great anguish about his eternal interests. Parental prayer and instruction were blessed to his great consolation; and he received the truth so as never afterwards to doubt of his acceptance of God in Christ. The issue of this affliction and the sentiments which it awakened are recorded by his father in a letter to a friend, which no young man can read without a deepened impression of the solemn call and blessed privilege of an early dedication to God. "The crisis," writes Dr. Morison, "to which we have been looking forward for more than twelve months has at last arrived, and our dear boy is now numbered with the spirits of the just. Never have I witnessed but one death equally triumphant. You might have supposed you were in the company of an apostle, had you not known that you were with a stripling—an emaciated youth of eighteen. He had evidently a foretaste of glory before entering it, and as full an assurance of his interest in Christ as ever Paul had, when he said, 'I know whom I have believed.' When the mortal foe began to contend with him in good earnest, he calmly and dignifiedly said, 'This is death; my Saviour is now coming: but Christ is with me; and I want to assure my dear parents that since he was pleased last year to manifest his gracious presence to me in the Isle of Wight, I have never been without it for one moment. It is not mere passive happiness I feel, it is real enjoyment. I know I shall soon be with Him; don't grieve for me, I am happy.' I observed, 'What a mercy it is that we may come to Christ as sinners!' 'Ah,' said he, 'in what other character can we come to him? I was a wretched sinner, and he received me, and filled my bursting heart with peace and joy in believing.' To his brother, Alexander, he said, 'Come in over to me, I want to speak to you. Are you prepared, dear Alexander, to give up your sins? Say to me that you will, and that you will give yourself to Christ. Oh, do not put off religion with the hope of being more serious in future! Mind your dying brother has told you this, and mind, too, that Christ is willing to receive you though a sinner. I have proved this.' To Joseph he said, 'Let me ask you to make conscience of secret prayer; and do you pray from the heart. Do not require to be drawn to Christ as I was by the awful visitation of divine Providence; but think of his great love, and devote to him your best days.' When no longer able to speak continuously, his face shone like that of an angel; and gathering himself up into a dying posture, he said, 'I see His face—how incomprehensible is his love! Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.'"

But a few years past and Joseph, so tenderly warned by his dying brother, lay on his death-bed, struck down by the same disease, from the rupture of a blood-vessel. From an early period he had been the subject of many anxious thoughts to his parents. His mind was reserved, his temper intractable. When but a child, having acted with some degree of rudeness to his mother, he was required by his father to ask her forgiveness. This he peremptorily refused to do. He was taken to another apartment by his father, reasoned with, and punished, after which he was still required to entreat forgiveness of his mother. But again he refused, and suffered a second chastisement. Still his spirit was not subdued. With an anguish never to be forgotten, the father returned with him a third time, and accompanied the use of the rod with prayer, that his son's heart might be touched with penitence. This last effort was effectual; the offence was confessed and forgiven, filial affections gushed out in all their tenderness, and from that hour to the moment of his departure out of this world, he never again entered into direct conflict with parental authority. Before the hour of his own final conflict he had learned submission to a higher Parent, and become obedient to the faith. From the painful experience of the temptations through which he himself had passed, he entreated, when on his dying-bed, that his father would continue his faithful warnings to young professors, especially to professing young men, observing, "There is much sin amongst them; far more, my dear father, than your kind heart will let you believe. Do warn them against worldly conformity and gay parties. They are the bane of true piety." Drawing towards him his brother, Alexander, to whom he was deeply attached, he seemed to agonize for his salvation, sometimes addressing him and sometimes God on his behalf.

After a short interval the destroyer again entered the dwelling of Dr. Morison to call hence his son Alexander, the one amongst all his children whom he feared was least prepared for the summons. Speaking of him at the time of the death of Joseph, he remarked, "Alexander is the only member in our family not in the Lord. He is a fine, frank, manly character, and would make a beautiful Christian, at present he is much impressed." The day of his affliction came upon him suddenly. He was all at once prostrated when his spirit became that of a broken-hearted penitent, pressing into the kingdom, he had long neglected, before the door was for ever shut. It may still the tumult in the heart of many a bereaved parent, who is unable to find satisfaction on the question of the everlasting state of a departed child, to read the thoughts of this deeply troubled father striving, if possible, to pierce the veil. "I was agonizing myself on the question," writes Dr. Morison. "What evidence can I have that this poor wanderer is saved? The dying thief had the testimony of Christ himself to his salvation. The following two thoughts were very refreshing to my heart: 1. His greatest agony of mind preceded the most alarming symptoms of disease. He was spiritually distressed before he or ourselves had any settled conviction that his symptoms were dangerous. I think it was not the mere apprehension of death that was at work. 2. The total revolution of his filial affections seemed to indicate to me that nothing but the love of God in the heart could have produced it. His gratitude, guilelessness, patience under extreme suffering, bore testimony to a moral change, the great and only true evidence of a relative change towards God. You cannot wonder that my mind struggles with the thought of my poor boy's salvation. Nor will you condemn me that I try, by such a process as I have indicated to you, to work out the problem of proof. Do you not think, with the natural pride of poor Alexander's heart, that the proof is as complete as the circumstances will admit of. But most thoroughly do I sympathize with what you say of the evidence being all that we can look for safely. How wonderful is the very idea of a sinner, who has long lived in rebellion against God, and with the fullest light in the conscience being saved at all. But after all, mercy in that day was Paul's only plea."

Scarcely had the weeping parents committed the remains of Alexander to the grave, when they received the intelligence that their beloved daughter, the wife of Dr. Legge, missionary at Hong-Kong, was no more. "I shall never forget," says the friend, whose painful duty it was to break the intelligence, "the sublime resignation with which Dr Morison bowed his head and held his peace, when I informed him of the decease of his beloved Mary in Hong-Kong." The history of the early childhood of "their dear Mary, for whom their love was so intense, whose end was perfect peace, the sequel to a life of beauty and brightness," is a deeply interesting episode in the biographical volume before us, and would alone entitle the volume to a place in every Christian family.

But one child remained after these successive bereavements, the first-born son of the family, John Edward. But, alas! he could yield no consolation to his sorrowing parents. Having emigrated to Tasmania, he there received a sun-stroke in his own garden. Being brought for advice and treatment to England, he still survived, but mentally unconscious, except at rare intervals, of the desolation that had fallen on his father's house. Afflicted, but not forsaken, Dr. Morison, in the review of these family bereavements, could yet write, "I think I have got some sweet glimpses of communion with God while his hand has been upon me; I am brought so far as to be enabled to bless His name for all that dear Mary was both by nature and grace, and to submit without murmuring to the dispensation by which she has been recalled. All our children, once a hopeful, healthful group, are gone, save one dear, very dear to us, who is under a cloud,—thank God not a cloud of sin! And to my God I cheerfully resign those who have departed, and seek grace to bear the mysterious trial connected with the living. We must try and live for dear Alexander's two sweet orphan children, and your (addressed to Dr. Legge) three motherless ones; we must live and labour for their good."

His own last illness was protracted amidst severe sufferings during forty-two long months. Keenly sensitive to pain, and to every species of sorrow, no expression of impatience ever escaped from his lip or his pen. Even when compassed with affliction, he continued to do more work than many have the power to accomplish in the enjoyment of health. There must have been some elements of great strength in his constitution to have withstood so long the force of disease. His biographer, who has so ably presented us with his life, introduces us as he closes his narrative into the sick chamber of his friend. It was an interview memorable to himself, and he has made it memorable to his readers. "I hope," says his biographer, "never to forget one interview which I had with him about six weeks before his decease. He was seated on a couch by his bedside. 'At this moment,' he said, 'there is not an inch of my body which is not full of agony.' But his face was unruffled. His expression was even cheerful. His voice was pitched in a lower key than usual, and his tones were gentle as a child's. He had no raptures to speak of; but neither were there clouds to darken his prospects. He spoke like a man who had again and again dug around the foundations of the faith which it had been his life's work to proclaim; and each time were they found deeper and stronger than before. He had likewise examined himself with the most anxious jealousy, and with deep humility, and with unwavering confidence he looked forward to the hour of death. On these themes, and on incidental topics, he poured out his thoughts in a stream of glowing words—the only parallel to which I can recollect is the death-bed utterances of Dr. Payson. I could only listen in reverent and grateful silence. To say that it was good to be there would but very inadequately convey my feelings. I felt as if I stood on the confines of heaven, and was listening to one who was more in heaven than on earth. In the patience, and peace, and love, and hope, which I was witnessing, there seemed to be a demonstration of the divinity of the gospel. And with a heart too full to allow me to say 'farewell,' I left the chamber of death, adoring God that he had given such grace to his servant."

His warfare of service and suffering ended, Dr. Morrison entered into rest calmly, and like a sleeping infant, on Monday night, 13th June 1859. Amongst his last words to a friend standing by were, "I am not afraid to die, but I am afraid to live." His thought, could he have uttered it, would have been embodied in the lines,—

"I go to life and not to death;
From darkness to light's native sky;
I go from sickness and from pain
To health and immortality.
Let our farewell then be tearless,
Since I bid farewell to tears;
Write this day of my departure,
Festive in your coming years."

ELUCIDATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

No. V.

"Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh; let us draw near," &c.—HEB. x. 19, 20, 23.

This passage is so far akin to the one last considered (John xii. 32, 33), that it also may be said to speak of the drawing power of the cross, and of the heaven-pointing aim for which, on the part of God, Jesus was lifted on it. With this common agreement, however, there is an obvious difference; and in the difference also a peculiarity—if not quite so marked as in the representation of the evangelist, yet such as at first sight carries a certain appearance of strangeness, and has given rise to some diversity of explanation. The general idea is plain enough; the commonest reader may apprehend it, as the humblest Christian may find comfort and encouragement in the thoughts it presents. Christ, it tells us, by his atoning death and subsequent exaltation to the heavenly places, has laid open for his people the way of access to God's gracious presence; so that they should be ever drawing near with child-like confidence, to hold direct and blessed communion with him in respect to the salvation of their souls. The peculiarity—so far as any exists—lies in the connection which the now opened way of access is made to stand to the flesh of Christ, and this again to the veil between the holy and the most holy place of the ancient tabernacle or temple. The way is actually opened or consecrated by the blood of Jesus; but it is represented as finding in his flesh what corresponds to the former veil, and deriving therein its peculiar fitness and efficacy. "We have boldness in respect to the way into the holiest," so it is by the most literal rendering, "in the blood of Jesus, which he consecrated for us, a way fresh and living, through the veil, that is, his flesh."

It is not to be forgotten when comparing the lines of resemblance here drawn between the new and the old, that in the earthly sanctuary, as had been previously stated by the apostle (x. i.), there was not the very image, but only the imperfect shadow, of the things pertaining to the person and the work of Christ. Hence, to bring out the truth concerning such things in some degree corresponding to their manifold fulness and variety, the old needs to be viewed in diverse aspects, and presented under several distinct relations. Yet in doing so there must be nothing—as in Scripture itself there is nothing—arbitrary or fanciful in the representations given; however exhibited, there must still be found in it the elements of a real similitude and connection. The flesh of Christ may thus be justly regarded as taking the place of very different things belonging to the former dispensation, according to the point of view from which it is contemplated—if only care be taken in the mode of explanation not to let the one view run into the other, so as to produce a confused impression of the truth. For example, the temple, viewed as a whole, was the house of God—the innermost apartment, or the holiest, being his most peculiar dwelling-place; and in this respect the flesh of Christ, or his human nature generally, came in the room of the old, since in that as its living and real habitation Godhead dwelt, and was for the people of God in a higher sense what the material temple had been in a lower. So in various passages of Scripture we find it represented (John i. 14; ii. 19; Dan. ix. 24, &c.); and when so represented, the relation between the new and the old must be viewed in its general character, without respect either to the subdivisions of the temple on the one side, or the details of Christ's work on the other.

But when the details of Christ's work are the subject of discourse, as they are throughout this epistle, then the temple also, as a matter of course, must be considered in respect to its several apartments, furniture, and services. As regards Christ, too, it is not what he is or does simply as the God-man that is made account of, but rather what he is and does as the great high priest of our profession, having to minister in our behalf before God, and secure the acceptance of our persons and services. The temple or dwelling of God is now, therefore, necessarily contemplated as out of himself: and though very God as well as true man, he has to do a work of priestly mediation between heaven and earth. Earth itself is, in this case, but the outer court of the temple, in which certain portions of the service must be performed; but the immediate and proper dwelling of God is above, in the heaven of heavens—there now is the holiest of all, to which a way of access must be laid open for those against whom, on account of sin, there lay the ban of heaven's condemnation. It is actually laid open, as the sacred writer once and again declares, by the blood of Christ, which prevails with its infinite efficacy to blot out for all believers the guilt of sin, and establish their perfect reconciliation with the Father. But the flesh, he also testifies, which furnished that atoning blood, stood in a certain relation to the veil that hung before the most holy place, and formed the one doorway of access. How should it have done so? It is not enough to say here what is true, or important; the thoughts must be suited to the matter more immediately in hand. That the flesh of Christ served as a sort of "veil to the divine nature which dwelt within him, and as the veil of the tabernacle concealed the glory of Jehovah in the holy of holies from the view of man, so the flesh of Christ concealed the higher nature from our view that dwelt within this veil" (Stuart)—is perfectly true in itself; but, it will be observed, has to do with the constitution of Christ's person, not with the nature of his work as the high priest of his people, and is consequently out of place in such a connection. Nor is it altogether appropriate to say with another learned commentator (Delitzsch), that "the weak, circumscribed, mortal flesh of which Jesus made himself partaker, in order to die for us, was found to serve as a veil here below between him and the heavenly holiest of all; that the pathway for him to the celestial fellowship with God in glory lay through death, wherein he laid aside his flesh, as fashioned after the state of the old Adam, in order to resume it as fashioned after a heavenly condition," &c. For this, however important as bearing on the completeness of Christ's work, and the final issues of his redemption, can scarcely be said to stand in necessary and immediate relation to the proper subject of discourse in the passage before us,—namely, a present, free, and gracious intercourse for sinful men with the God of heaven. This is the one grand point under consideration; and to bring in other aspects of the work, connected with its future glories and results, is but to take off our regard from the few simple, but all-important ideas, on which they are here sought to be concentrated.

What are these ideas? That now, as of old, there is but one door-way of access for sinful men into the gracious presence and fellowship of God—that this in itself is of a nature fitted to obstruct, rather than to facilitate their admission—but that when associated with the appointed blood of atonement, it offers a free approach into the holiest. So far both were alike; what was true of the old holds equally of the new. The veil in the old, however, did not, like the flesh of Christ, furnish the blood, through which it became an open and consecrated way; and in failing to do so, it was not a perfect image of what was to come. But in the new, also, the blood furnished by the flesh of Christ was not the whole,—it was but the material part—the sign and bearer of that spiritual and divine life, which gave its real worth and efficacy to the death of Christ as an atonement for sin. Till by this complex sacrifice the work of atonement was accomplished, the flesh of Christ, like flesh generally, stood as a veil of separation from the sanctuary above; for, in assuming that flesh, he became the representative of men as sinful, and though personally the Holy One of Israel, he could not appear in the presence of the Father as our high-priest, until he had shed his life-blood in expiation of the guilt that lay on him. Then the veil of separation became the way of approach; the heavenly sanctuary opened its gates to receive him to its highest honours and ministrations; and spiritually it stands open to all who come in faith upon his blood, that they may have fellowship with him in the endless life to which he has risen. Thus, again, we are made to see how all in the scheme of God hangs upon the atoning work of Jesus, which so many would explain away, and others would render important, only by bringing into view some incidental thoughts or results connected with it. It is itself a thing of infinite moment, the central fact of Christianity; and in proportion as it is understood and appreciated, or misconceived and neglected, the Bible must be a plain or an obscure book—a fountain sealed, or a well-spring of life and blessing.

MOUNT ZION.

IF, in the actual survey of Jerusalem, the mount on which the Temple stood becomes the central point of interest, illumined still as with the mystic light of its old Shechinah, it is the neighbouring hill of Zion that more frequently represents to the mind those ennobling memories to which the Holy City owes its fame. As the rock of the Capitol stood pre-eminent among the hills of the Tiber, as identified with the imperial majesty of Rome, the embattled steep which David crowned with his house of cedar gathered round it all the glory and beauty of Jerusalem, and passed into Hebrew thought and speech as the symbol of all that was sacred and august in the national traditions. It was by the name of Zion that the true-hearted of Israel prayed for the city of their faith: "Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities." By this name Hebrew poets sang of its splendour and beauty, and prophets denounced it for its guilt, and wailed over its desolation: "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King"—"How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger!" And when the glance of prophetic inspiration pierces furthest through the future, and beholds the glory of the Church of Christ, it is still this name to which the music of its loftiest strains is set: "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone"—"The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion"—"Ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God."

The earliest notices of a site so memorable have an interest of their own. The most southern of the hills on which Jerusalem was built, Zion first appears in sacred history as a stronghold of the Jebusites, one of the aboriginal tribes of Canaan, who long maintained their independence in this rocky fastness. The children of Judah could not drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 63); and all through the time of the Judges and the reign of Saul, the groves of Zion must have been polluted with the dark rites of Moloch and Ashtaroath. Not till David was anointed king over all Israel in Hebron, were the Jebusites expelled from their fortress, an exploit due to the warlike enterprise of Joab. The castle of Zion became the palace of the king, and this quarter was called "The City of David." Hither David brought the ark, and placed it in a tent; from which time the mount acquired a kind of local consecration: "The Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation"—"In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion." The buildings which gradually covered the sides of the hill formed the "Upper City" of Jerusalem, separated from Acra, or the "Lower City," by the long curving valley of the Tyropœon. Under the splendid sway of Solomon, the regal hill, beautified with the structures on which he lavished the wealth of his kingdom, must have presented a scene of unparalleled magnificence. It is probable that the three great palaces he built were connected by terraces and corridors, as well as joined to the Temple by superb approaches. Zion, in those brilliant days, was the Palatine of Jerusalem, rivalling in the costliness and grandeur of its erections the Roman mount crowned by the Golden House of Nero. The "House of the Forest of Lebanon" seems to have derived its name from the crowd of cedar pillars that propped its gilded roof, and may perhaps find its nearest type in the gorgeous architecture of the Alhambra. There the royal gardens filled the summer air with fragrance and bloom, and fountains cooled it with their silver mist of spray, and the voices of unseen singers blended with the melody of pipe and viol; and there was all that could enchant the senses, and steep the dreamy mind in ravishment. Yet even there "all was vanity and vexation of spirit;" and the great king, in his sumptuous pavilion, envied the sleep of the labouring man who pruned his vines on the sunny slopes of Engedi.

Zion was always well defended by walls and bulwarks. Its massive citadel, from which the Turkish standard floats, close to the Bethlehem or Yaffa Gate, preserves the site of the ancient Hippicus, the tower so famous in the Roman siege of Jerusalem. It was spared by Titus, when the rest of the city was levelled with the ground. The modern wall sweeps along the ridge far within the ancient line of defence, leaving a large tract bare which was once covered with buildings. Unlike the stony ridges in the vicinity, which give Jerusalem such a look of desolation, the soil is fruitful; and wandering over the hill one may pluck some ears of wheat, in token of the prediction that Zion would be "ploughed like a field." The glory of the "City of David" is departed, but the name of its founder is still inscribed on its ruins. The north-east tower of the citadel is called the "Tower of David;" the southern gate, by which you descend to the Pool of Siloam in the valley, is the "Gate of the Prophet David;" and on the crest of the ridge, overlooking the Valley of Hinnom, is a group of buildings which attracts the eye in every view of the city, revered by the Mohammedans as the tombs of David and the princes of the line of Judah. Near the Gate of Zion stands the Armenian Convent, said to be built on the site of the house of Caiaphas, and, of course, a spot fruitful in monkish legends. The different sects divide the sacred localities among them, as the Roman soldiers did the Saviour's garments, though not with the same justice; and, in the unequal partition, the stone which sealed the sepulchre, and the broken column from which the cock crew, have fallen to the share of the Armenians, and form, indeed, their chief source of revenue. In this neighbourhood the new English cemetery has been laid out. In digging away the slope to level the ground, the workmen came upon a tract of smooth rock, which the old Jewish builders had scarped for the foundations of the ancient wall.

On the eastern or inward side of Zion there is still a considerable slope, but the ravine which in ancient times separated the upper from the lower city has nearly disappeared. This is owing to the mounds of rubbish which have accumulated during the various sieges the city has undergone, and the long sabbath of her desolation; so that the whole platform on which the lower city stands has been slowly elevated.

Even during the first captivity it was predicted (Jer. xxx. 18) that the city should be "built upon her own heap;" and since then the waste of thirty centuries has choked up her hollows and worn away the sharpness of her features. In digging the foundations of the English church, which stands on Zion not far from the Turkish citadel, the workmen pierced to a depth of fifty feet through the debris of ancient buildings. An old Greek chapel has been recently uncovered, the floor of which is twenty-five feet below the level of the adjacent street. Thus, like the Egyptian Sphinx buried to the neck in the desert sand, or the time-scarred columns that rise out of grave-like chasms in the Forum, the Jerusalem of David and Solomon,—of Titus and Constantine,—even the later capital of Godfrey and the Latin kings, lies many feet below the surface of the city trodden by the traveller of to-day.

And year by year signs of change are more perceptible, in many respects for the better. Dr. Robinson, noticing the improvement which had taken place since his former visit, writes in 1852: "A process was going on of tearing down old dwellings and replacing them by new ones, which reminded me somewhat of New York. There were, at this time, more houses undergoing this transformation in the Holy City than I had seen the year before in six of the principal cities of Holland." Nor are there wanting indications of a parallel improvement in her spiritual condition,—tokens that a new life begins to stir and throb in the shrivelled frame of Judaism, so wonderfully preserved from decay through ages of spiritual death. It is something to those who pass by that a church of the reformed faith opens its gates on Zion, to a band of Hebrew worshippers,—that Jew and Moslem may there see a purer type of Christianity than is witnessed in those rival shrines where Greek and Latin devotees make prostrations before tawdry images and coarse pictures, and desecrate the Holy Sepulchre by their miserable quarrels.

The voice of Christian praise which now ascends each

Sabbath-day from Jewish lips on Zion, is but the prelude to those songs of everlasting joy with which the tribes of Israel shall yet, in the City of David, hail Jesus of Nazareth as Lord and King. Then "many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

J. D. B.

STORE OF GRACE.

Is there not a fine roll about the following proclamation? The verse, as one has remarked, reads like poetry:—

"Whithersoever he entered, into villages, or cities, or country, they laid the sick in the streets, and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment; and as many as touched him were made whole."

It sets forth the store of grace and power treasured up in Him who undertook to be the world's Deliverer.

Observe, the outgoings of his grace are not limited by locality, or by those arbitrary distinctions which society makes among men. No matter where the parties lived for whom his favour was sought, whether in town, or village, or country, none of them were cast upon his mercy unregarded. In his esteem, it mattered not whether a man moved in the politer circles, and was accustomed to the manners and customs of city life, or was a simple husbandman, tilling his own fields with his own hands. The only question asked was, "What is his personal condition? Is there any affliction which embitters his life, and from which he would fain, were it possible, be delivered?" If there was, the help required was tendered freely.

Then, notice the comprehensive term under which the objects of Christ's compassion are summarily classed. They were not the lame merely, or the leprous, or the paralyzed, or the possessed. They were all of these put together. They were just in one word the sick—all the sick, whatever was the matter with them, and to whatever lengths the disease had gone. As there was no limit to the outflow of his mercy, in so far as localities or classes in society were concerned, so there was no restriction in respect of the kind or extent of the ailments which he undertook to cure.

And next, see in what an easy and sovereign way he removed the evils which were brought under his notice. The virtue in him was, as it were, so abundant, that it overflowed. He did not need to put forth any great exertions in order to effect his end—to employ such a laborious system of means and appliances as might have suggested the idea that if he did heal, he did so with difficulty. "They laid the sick in the streets, and besought him if they might touch were it but the border of his garment; and as many as touched were made whole." In Eastern countries, when a man would humble himself to the very utmost before another, he kisses the hem or border of his garment. The border of the garment sweeps the dust, and is held to represent the least honourable part of the dress, and therefore of its wearer. When, therefore, it is intimated that the sick in the streets were healed, not by the laying on of his hands, not by a word of his mouth, but by a touch of the border of his garment, there is symbolically set forth the truth, that so full of glorious power was the divine Redeemer, that what was lowliest about him was pervaded with a sovereign virtue, and that the Store of Grace in him was abundant to overflowing.

Once more, notice how completely and unfailingly efficacious was the healing power which, in his mercy, he was pleased to put forth. As many as touched him (there were no disappointments, no mistakes, no failures, no hits and misses in his practice)—AS MANY AS touched him were, not merely made better—put in the way of regaining health—caused to experience some present temporary relief—that is all that can ever be expected from the first visit of the most skilful earthly physician—but, it is written here, as many as touched him were made instantly, and perfectly, and permanently whole.

Now, Jesus the sick-healer is always, in a manner, to be taken as a type of Christ the soul-healer; and in looking, therefore, at the grace and power manifested by him in the former character, we are to see represented his grace and power in the latter. The use, then, we ought to make of such a passage as that now under notice is obvious. We ought to use it for the purpose of stirring ourselves up to the exercise of a heartier faith in the mighty and merciful Saviour revealed to us in the gospel. This, indeed, is the grand end of all preaching. The worst thing that is the matter with the world is, that it does not believe in the name of the only-begotten Son of God; and the best thing that could possibly come upon it would be the removal of this unbelief, and the implanting in its room of a living principle of faith. And why do men not believe in him? There are many reasons; but here, at any rate, is one of them: It is because, notwithstanding all the fulness of information which they have regarding him, they cannot be said really, and adequately, to be acquainted either with his history, his character, or his claims. And hence, they do not see him to be possessed, in the highest perfection and degree, of all those qualities required in one who, like him, has undertaken to seek and to save the lost. It is by the study of such a verse as the above that this fatal ignorance may be expected to be removed—teaching us, as it does, so richly and so clearly, that the grace of God which bringeth salvation is not limited in its manifestation to any one particular place, nor confined in its operation to any one particular set of sinners, nor scanty and limited in its quantity or measure, nor at all uncertain in the character of its effects, and thus revealing the transcendently glorious character of Christ.

THE HIGHLANDS—THE DAYS OF THE FATHERS.

Books on provincial religion, if faithfully and intelligently written, might not only be very interesting, but of great use to the Church—more so, often, than those more ambitious Church histories which follow the whole stream of a nation's course. From one of these, devoted to Ross-shire, but touching upon the state of religion in the Highlands, we have already extracted some information for our readers, but, before parting with it, should like to refer to a few of the more general views which it contains or suggests. This book has two ulterior objects: to defend the religion of the Highlands as opposed to that of the Lowlands, and to magnify the days of the fathers as opposed to those of their children.

To extol the religion of the Highlands we hold to be a good work, and though it is undesirable that this should be done in the spirit of a partisan, still it is better that it should be so done than that it should not be done at all. In every such work of memorial, what there is of mistake and prejudice quickly perishes, while what is genuine and valuable remains the permanent inheritance of the Church. And there was much danger, in this particular case of the Highlands of Scotland, that the Church universal might be defrauded of her inheritance. Good and great men were passing away, and their witness was in heaven, and their record on high, but not on earth. Lowly flowers of holiness bloomed solitarily in many a distant strath, flowers now transplanted to heaven, but whose fragrance, if wafted wide, might cheer the hearts of the desolate, and bring grateful returns of praise to Him who nurtured them with divine tenderness and grace. It is good that the work of memorial has been so well commenced, as in this book on Ross-shire, and the smaller but more unexceptionable one by the Rev. Mr. MacGillivray on a district of Sutherland; but it is very desirable that it should go on. The field is rich, and but a small part of it has been reaped. The field is rich, and unless it is soon garnered into permanent memorial, it must perish from the memories of men.

To extol the religion of the Highlands is a good work; to portray it would be still better; to defend it is more doubtful. For a defence must always turn on the peculiarities of the thing defended; and there can be little doubt that the peculiarities of the religion of the Highlands are chiefly due to the peculiarities of the Highland character. And as it is God who has made all nations of one blood upon the face of the earth, but has also made each nation differ from all the others in temperament and characteristics, there is little use in quarrelling with his decree, and as little in defending it.—The Highland temperament is grave, earnest, and enthusiastic; keenly logical on the one hand, and highly imaginative on the other; impulsive, and unpractical, and not calculated for steady or sustained work. They would have made famous ascetics, noble mystics, deathless martyrs; but they would require much of God's grace to excel in either patience of hope or labour of love. Had they not been delivered, three hundred years ago, from the spiced cup of Popery, there is perhaps no nation in the world that, from its peculiar temperament, would have clung to that system so greedily and so long—even as the sister nation of Ireland does to this day. They are thus what may be called a naturally religious race—not in the sense in which the apostle James defines true religion and undefiled, for in this respect some other nations (the German, for example) have more natural proclivity to the good; but in the sense of having a large measure of those feelings of veneration which constitute the capacity of man's nature for worship and for praise. Now, when the grace of God that bringeth salvation appeared among a race such as this, and the pure gospel was preached with power and received in the Holy Ghost, it was to be expected, according to the ordinary manner of his working, that there would be wonderful results in individual conversion and saintship. The profound sense of sin, the abiding feeling of the majesty of God, the peculiar unworldliness and spirituality of their faith, the keen love of theology as a science, the inward alternations of utter gloom and solemn gladness—all these things could never have appeared so intensely in a race differently constituted, however deep and true the divine work might be. The grace of God is one, but the vessels into which it is poured are many. And as with the excellences of the Celtic character, so with the defects. An idealistic and enthusiastic race will find the duty of worship far easier than the duty of work. In some parts of the world we are shocked by the anomaly of a high morality and a low religion; among a Celtic race the danger is far greater of a high religion and a low morality. Among Lowlanders there is often an exceedingly coarse texture of mind in religious matters, and a great ignorance and inaptitude as to the things of God; while there may be, at the same time, a certain candour and honesty in their dealing with what they do know and feel, which make up for the want of a finer appreciation. In the Highlands, on the contrary, nothing is more common than to find men with the keenest theological views and the finest religious instincts, who are not religiously earnest men, and have no intention of becoming so. Of course, in such instances, it would be vain to expect that a merely intellectual and imaginative religion should exercise an influence on the heart and life. And even in the case where the religion is not false but true, no one can doubt but that in such a temperament, where it fills and possesses the imagination so easily, it must find peculiar difficulties in taking complete hold upon the will, and making the daily walk before God straight, and honest, and true. In such a character the danger of self-deception is at the greatest. The power of religion is apt to be wasted, not used; wasted in metaphysical struggles and theological distinctions; wasted in intense contemplations and resultless self-torturings; wasted by blowing off steam inwardly, instead of turning it all upon the will, and proelling the machine in the way of God's testimonies. It has happened to many men when witnessing the worldliness of Lowland religion, its shallow views, and neutral tints, and vague doctrine, and light feelings, and commingling of things that differ, to long earnestly for the intensity and depth of the solemn Gaelic faith. And as often has it happened to such to be glad again to escape from that which they had unwisely sought—from the asphyxia of an atmosphere of theology inadequately ventilated by the breath of life; from high experiences and deep feelings, too partially represented in honourable practice; from a fear of God which was not a fountain of life, to escape from the snares of death. And then they find that, in both cases alike, they have been seeking the living among the dead; that the mass of men have only a false religion, fixed in the imagination in one case, and playing lightly over the life in the other; that the God of truth is not a God of the hills or of the valleys, but that he works in all the earth a "salvation manifold," for whosoever from all kindreds and people will come unto him. Yet, while we are persuaded that this is the way to view any opposition of Gaelic and Lowland religion in Scotland, it must be added that if we are to lean in favour of either, it should be in favour of the former. We have said already that the Celtic is a naturally religious race; and this, if it means anything, means that they are peculiarly fitted for displaying the heights and depths, the trials and progress of Christian experience. Their harp is more finely strung; it responds to the Spirit's breath with a prompter and more touching melody; its notes of sorrow are deeper, and its tones of triumph louder than that of other lands can utter. And, one thing more—it is a language that is passing away, and a race that is mingling with others.

And this brings us to another subject—the complaint that in the Highlands spiritual life is passing away; that it is not now as it was in the fathers' days. We are disposed at present to accept the complaint as true; though it is perhaps difficult to ascertain how far it means that true religion is passing away, and how far merely that the Highland form of true religion is passing away. Yet, let us take it as true in its largest and saddest sense. There comes for us then the urgent question, "Men and brethren, what must we do?" Now, whatever other answers may be given to a question so great, this at least has to be said, We should not look back to the past. There is no help for us there.

The habitual laudator temporis acti has always been held to do an evil work in his generation; not the less when the burden of his song is true than when it is false.* For even in temporal matters, God will have us not to live a second-hand life; and it is the surest sign of a nation's decay when it begins to live only in the past, and to count itself unworthy of greatness in the present. And how much more is this the case in spiritual life! God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; and because "all live unto him," they are bound to live in a solemn and infinite hopefulness. True, there is much cause for sorrow. "The fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live for ever?" But when this is made the first and the last word in a publication addressed to living and immortal men, we are driven to the question, with which a child once startled a bereaved mother from her languor, "Mother, is God dead?"

We believe it has never once been the case in the history of the Church of God, that a generation which has fallen into a state of declension and decay, has been revived through means of being pointed to former and better days. The fact, if it be a fact, is a very striking one, and not according to our first ideas of what would be the wisest thing to do in the circumstances. Yet the reasons are not far to seek. If we asked the philosophers, they might tell us that human nature, like the soil of the earth, needs a certain rotation; that human experience never exactly repeats itself; that the soul cannot live on stale bread;—and all this may not be utterly false. But the higher reasons are the safer and the true ones. It is God's prerogative to give life, and he is jealous for his own prerogative. No prophets' bones may share the glory of the gift. It has ever been the tendency of the Church to lean on the past; and it has been the practice of God, age after age, to break it off from the past, even rudely and violently. Yet it was all in vain; and the generation that rejected the Son of God were building the tombs of the prophets, and garnishing the sepulchres of their righteous. He came to that generation, and they received him not. So he comes to every generation, in the majesty of his mercy; dealing with them, not as the sons of evil fathers, nor as the sons of fathers who trusted in his name, but as human sinners, standing between the eternity past and the eternity that is to come.

We have been forced into this line of reflection by feeling how necessary it is for us, in recalling the memory of the blessed dead, carefully to think of them as saved by the grace and to the glory of God, with whom we also have to do. Unless we do so, we shall perhaps be unable to avoid positive injury to ourselves from the retrospect; and only by doing so can we connect the saints of a former generation with the preachers of the present, and make the days of the fathers fruitful for the children.

THE GREATNESS OF SMALL THINGS.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUTLER.

A YOUNG reader—fired, we trust, with a true spiritual ambition—writes to us for a few practical counsels on "attaining the greatest measure of success in the religious life." As this friend may represent many other readers, we will reply to him in the same columns that meet their eyes also. Growth in godliness should be the chief aim of every renewed heart.

* "Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? For thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this."

Young friend, you state that you are already hopelessly converted. You have already attained a certain measure of piety; the question now is, how to attain the highest and the best. With much distrust of our own judgment, we would commend to you the very simple principle laid down by our Saviour, that whosoever shall do and teach one of the least commandments, "the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." The principle is, that success and eminence only can be reached by the closest attention to SMALL THINGS. This principle is as true in religious as in secular affairs. Napoleon was the most effective man of modern times. "The secret of his greatness was, that while his plans were more vast and various than other men's, he had the talent to fill them up with promptness and precision in every minute particular of execution. Numbers, times, spaces were all distinct to his eye. He knew them all. The wheeling of every legion was mentally present to him. The tramp of every foot was in his ear. The numbers of troops were all supplied; the spaces were passed over; the times were met; and so the work was done."

Equally applicable is this principle to the vital business of serving the Lord. Success depends upon details. You have, perhaps, a vague idea of some wonderful and splendid achievement in godliness that shall come upon you in a way that you can scarcely tell how. You are quite mistaken in your day-dreams of sudden and supernatural attainments. Your growth, your usefulness, your eminence in godliness will be measured by your obedience to the very least and humblest commandments of your crucified Master. In this you have his divine example; for the life of Jesus on earth was a patient carrying out of heavenly religion into the minutest actions and events. His startling overpowering displays were few. Only once he took on an appearance of dazzling glory, but every day and every hour his countenance beamed forth the lustre of a spotless holiness. It was only upon a single occasion that we hear of his treading the waves of the sea; but how often did he walk on long journeys to teach poor fishermen—to visit a humble family of Bethany—to relieve a Canaanitish woman—and to restore the child of a heart-broken ruler. The gentle reproof of Martha for her excessive absorption in household affairs, the payment of a few pence in taxes, and the message to impulsive Peter after his resurrection, all show that Christ overlooked nothing and neglected nothing that his divine wisdom deemed worthy of his notice. Holiness in all things is the beautiful and blessed epitome of our Saviour's life and character.

Great principles of godliness carried out in details is the apostolic conception of practical religion. Paul gives as minute directions in his letters as your good mother used to give you when you were a student in M— university. Peter presents the only sure method of spiritual growth when he says, "Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, to your virtue knowledge," &c. This implies growth by daily addition—by joining one attainment to another. It is the construction of a great spiritual temple by laying stone upon stone. A vast and imposing edifice, made up of small commandments faithfully kept—or rather of great commandments kept in the smallest particulars—is the life of every eminent saint who ever adorned and blessed the world. How do trees grow? How did that imperial elm by your father's gateway attain its colossal dimensions? By keeping all the commandments. It obeyed the laws of vegetable growth, it never despised the smallest accretion from the soil beneath, or from the reservoir of air that surrounds it. So must you grow in grace. Despise not the day of small things. Count nothing a trifle that bears on your Christian character. Excellence in the kingdom of Christ is only attainable by constant, patient, prayerful progress. This progress is to be made by conscientious attention to the least particulars of your daily life. Healthy piety overlooks no command of God; slights none; twists none out of its due place and proportion. Your mistake is that you are looking for growth by sudden leaps, by occasional tremendous efforts on extraordinary occasions. It is very probable that you will go to your grave without ever encountering a single "extraordinary occasion;" for God may never call you to such. But he will give you innumerable small everyday occasions in which to glorify him; and if you do not serve him in "that which is least," neither would your graces be found equal to great emergencies.

You are shocked when you read of the stupendous defalcations in public offices. But are you just as scrupulous about cheating the Government out of a postage-stamp as you would be of robbing a half million from the "Department of the Interior?" You are horrified when you read of exactions under the lash on a cotton plantation. But the harsh blow given to your little boy in a fit of passion, or the sharp bargains made with your poor seamstress, are sins of the same kind and colour in the sight of Christ. You loathe cowardice in high places. So do I. But your Master also loathes our time-serving spirit when we connive at fashionable wickedness, or keep our lips closed when we ought to "stand up for Jesus." You applaud the heroism of those missionaries who stood their ground during the late bloody scenes in the East. The same spirit in kind, if not in degree, is demanded of you, when you are called on to walk two miles every Sabbath, and teach a ragged class of unwashed boys in the mission school. Peter did not deny his Master on a grand, premeditated occasion. It was when suddenly assailed by a small person with a small taunt, that his heedless lips bolted out the contemptible falsehood. Look out for sudden temptations of Satan to commit "small sins;" they will be the little leaks to sink the ship, the little foxes to spoil the vine of your Christian character. Look out for the first neglects of your closet under the pressure of business, or of personal fatigue. Religious declension begins at a neglected closet-door.

But why go over the whole field of practical Christianity in one brief letter? We write you in order to enforce this one precept, that success in the Christian life depends upon obedience to "the least of the commandments." You are right in aiming high. Your ambition is noble. Do not be satisfied with a meagre, half-developed, compromising piety. The world has had quite enough of such. Everything that ought to be done at all ought to be done well. Never take hold of anything without determining to be in that thing successful; if possible, to be eminent. In religion, success and eminence both depend on numberless details of duty faithfully and conscientiously carried out in the strength of God. The Master whom you serve has said, "Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." May your strength be equal to your day!

"BUSY HERE AND THERE."

ABSORBED in inferior matters, the confession has fallen from many lips, "As thy servant was busy here and there he was gone" (1 Kings xx. 40).

The Holy Spirit, kind and gracious, powerful to change the inner man and impart a meetness for heaven, has gone. The day in which to secure the great end of life has gone. The period of youth when the heart, though depraved, is not yet hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, and the conscience, though defiled, is not seared as with a hot iron, has gone. That sermon adapted to my case, worthy of being remembered and reduced to practice, has gone. Those kind words, prompted by Christian affection, exerting for the time a softening effect, have gone. Those serious impressions, pungent convictions, often the precursors of hope, have gone.

Sad has been the acknowledgment from many a disciple, "As thy servant was busy here and there," engrossed with topics remote from present duty, losing sight of covenant engagements, "he was gone." That neighbour, acquaintance, unbelieving friend, for whose eternal welfare I ought to have made direct exertions, has passed for ever beyond my reach. That opportunity of benefiting such a family or neighbourhood, of prevailing on such a neglecter of the public ordinances to frequent the sanctuary, has glided away unimproved. That season of hopeful indication for Zion, betokening the dawn of a better day, has disappeared, and no mercy drops descended.

Nor has this confession been a stranger to the Christian parent. "As thy servant was busy here and there," not duly mindful of the home vineyard, the work there required, my child has gone, perhaps, to the grave and to the world of retribution, no more to hear the teachings of maternal affection, nor those lessons which a father's position and experience qualify him to give. Or if living, he has gone from the atmosphere, the example, the influence of home. Not as I might and should, have I taken advantage of that forming season when the heart is most susceptible, and the voice of God is heard. "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth." My child has gone, passed through the different stages of early life—gone not fortified to meet the temptations of an ensnaring world. Owing to my neglect, he may become a victim of vice, a wretched wanderer in some of the avenues of crime.

And so the child favoured with a pious parentage, taught betimes by a devoted mother to rest his hope on the blessed Saviour. Wrung with anguish, not a few have confessed, "As thy servant was busy here and there," little appreciating a mother's advice, with the pencil of the imagination drawing delusive pictures of the future, sketching scenes and paths of earthly bliss, she has gone. Her lovely form has receded from my view. Those lips, accustomed with all gentleness to give line upon line, and precept upon precept, will do so no more. Henceforth, near the throne they will be occupied in praising redeeming love.

Many a Sabbath school-teacher, entrusted with a bright, active class, has been obliged to exclaim, "As thy servant was busy here and there," explaining the truths of the Bible from Sabbath to Sabbath, conversing of Christ and religion, anticipating many similar opportunities, not dreaming about the arrows of disease, the coming of the pale, silent messenger, he or she, a promising lad, an amiable girl, was gone. Their seat is vacant. Whether faithful or unfaithful, my work for that scholar's good is ended.

Many a young man, having left the beaten track, the great highway of truth for one of the by-paths of error, has said when too late, "As thy servant was busy here and there," now devouring the contents of this infidel book, pamphlet, newspaper; now hearing this sceptical lecturer or preacher; now mingling in circles which calumniate the gospel, its ministers, and disciples:—thus "busy here and there," the principles of truth, early and faithfully inculcated, are gone; gone from my bosom is that hallowed influence which leads the soul earnestly to inquire and seek after salvation.

Surprised by their last sickness, without adequate preparation, many a wasted, emaciated one, hardly able to speak, is saying at this moment, "As thy servant was busy here and there," intent on pleasure, honour, wealth, life with its opportunities has vanished, probation with its means and influences has terminated. "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved."

"The night cometh, in which no man can work." Work while it is called to-day.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE AND THE LAST VIEW OF JERUSALEM.

WE had left our visit to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre until our last day in Jerusalem, not purposely, but because localities more satisfactorily ascertained, and less desecrated by superstition, had engrossed our attention.

There are three distinct sets of historic association which give interest to this land of ruins: the events of the old Jewish history, of the sixty years during which the New Testament was lived and written, and the Crusades, that great revulsion of European life to the East.

With the first of these periods the Church of the Holy Sepulchre has, of course, nothing to do. With the second, is has (at least in the opinion of many) but a very doubtful connection. One verse in one Gospel might have set at rest for ever, in a few words, the question of the situation of Calvary, and therefore of the Sepulchre. No such verse exists, and in the absence of direct proof, one can only hope that the place which is annually desecrated by an imposture and a fight amongst those who bear the name of Christ, is not Calvary.

But with the third period, the era of the Crusades, or rather the whole of the middle ages, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is the great central point, the inmost sanctuary and shrine of mediæval faith, the sacred relic around which the battle of Moslem and Christian raged for centuries.

In visiting this Church, we felt as if we were leaving the home of Jewish kings and prophets, and the earthly footprints of the Son of God, to enter on a region full, indeed, of deep human and historical interest, but altogether on a lower level, more of an interest akin to that which we feel in Rome or Canterbury, although in an intenser degree.

Our thought, as we descended the steps into the court outside the Church, was not so much of Golgotha, or the tomb hewn in the rock, as of the countless pilgrim-feet which had trodden those steps for centuries, of the innumerable hearts which had throbbed with eager joy, or almost stood still with awe in approaching those sacred walls.

The front and the arched doors are very massive and elaborately ornamented. You compare them mentally, not with anything in the Bible, but with Venice, or Milan, or Cologne. You are transported into the middle ages, the middle ages orientalized. You pass from the burning sacrifice into the dark church. You are no longer in the city where David dwelt—where Nicodemus came to Jesus by night—by which the Brook Kedron flowed—to which her King came, lowly and riding on an ass—and which the little children entered, singing Hosannas, in the light of the spring morning—where the blind and lame were touched by those healing hands, and walked and saw. You are in another world, lighted, not by the blaze of the Syrian sun, or the starlight of the Syrian night, but by faint rays stealing through mediæval windows. The air around you is no breeze from the Great Sea, or the mountains beyond Jordan, but the air of a vault perfumed with incense.

The group of Moslem soldiers sitting on a raised matted stone platform at the left of the entrance, reminds you for an instant of the scenes enacted here at Easter, when Turkish sabres have to restrain Christian worshippers from tearing each other in pieces in their eagerness to light their torches at the "sacred fire," a singular collision of three religions, Mohammedan, Christian, and Pagan. But passing on, you forget this strange discord, and are back again in the days of Richard Cœur de Lion, or of Godfrey of Bouillon, and then mediæval religion seems to rise before you allegorized in stone.

The Church of the middle ages is indeed the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Although there can be no doubt that throughout the middle ages there was always a Church of the living Saviour, it is a most significant fact that the centre of Christendom in those days was a tomb. A sacred tomb, indeed, but yet with reverence be it spoken, a tomb not sacred even as that of Stephen or Paul would have been, for it was an empty tomb.

The grave of the humblest Christian contains relics which one day are to be quickened into glorious, incorruptible beauty. The sepulchre of Christ, could it have been found, would have contained nothing but the stone ledge, "the place where the Lord lay." The dust of the grave-clothes might be there; the angels had gone back to heaven, or were ministering to some lowly Hagar or little child on earth; the embalming spices had never been needed there. May we not feel that the lowliest sod beneath which the dust of a Christian lies, and over which the eyes of Christ watch to awake it into immortality, is more truly sacred than that empty sepulchre? May we not be sure that the body in which the Holy Spirit dwelt, and which shall awake in the likeness of the Lord, is more truly a relic of our Redeemer, than the abandoned grave-clothes and the empty tomb? Yet it was by this empty sepulchre that mediæval Christendom stood without, like the Magdalene, weeping. The best and most characteristic of its hymns are tinged with deep melancholy. Their fragrance is that of the embalming spices, rather than of the reurrection morning. Their gaze is into the darkness of the sepulchre, instead of towards the light into the face of the risen Saviour.

Surely those pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre are as contrary to the whole spirit of Christianity, as the worship of the glorified Virgin Mother—"Mary the immaculate," which has succeeded them. To turn from the living Lord to the abandoned tomb is as strange a perversion as to turn from the dying Redeemer on the cross to the mournful mother beside it,—

"Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
Oh life, not death, for which we pant—
More life and fuller that we want."

And ours is a religion of life; our Lord the Prince of life, the Bread of life, the Life itself, who burst the bands of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of them. All this presses sensibly on the heart in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It is the religion of the Crusades petrified, and the spirit of the middle ages comes over you as you stand within these massive walls.

The wretched rivalries of the various Churches, and the "narrowing lust of gold" which fosters these rivalries, are on a lower level again. But these did not build the grand arches, or heap every sacred spot with precious stones and metals. It was a true devotion which is represented here, however below the truth may be its objects.

That flight of steps leading to a stone platform, which to you may seem little more than the rood-loft, or the Calvary of any mediæval church, is what Crusaders died to win. Countless forms have been prostrated there in passionate adoration. We saw a man reverently embracing and kissing column after column. As you stand there the thought comes overpoweringly to you, "Can this indeed be Calvary? the place where the Cross stood, the three crosses? Did our Saviour's dying eyes indeed look down from this height on the sea of curious and mocking faces of those who had come to see that sight, and on the three women and one apostle who ventured to stand close beside Him, before that angry crowd, and confess that they loved Him?" If so, you feel that in order to form any realization of the scene, you must shut your eyes and exclude all the incongruous treasures with which the industrious devotion of centuries has encumbered the place. If this once irregular hillock were indeed Golgotha, and the new sepulchre wherein never yet man lay, beside which the voice of the risen Saviour was first heard, was indeed where that shrine now stands, then what a desecration this building is! What one would give to be able to sweep away this heavy roof, and this wretched gold, and these marbles, and look up from this very spot to the sky which was veiled at mid-day, and over the guilty city which had poured out her multitudes to witness, without a remonstrance, the perpetration of that unequalled crime! We guard with jealous care every trace of our national heroes or our beloved dead,—the pen laid down as it was left, the poor chairs and table where Luther and his Catherine sat, the unfinished work, the garden walk "where prayer was wont to be made." Why, then, can Christendom have combined to destroy everything which was characteristic in this place of most sacred memories to us all?

The only thought which enables one at all to comprehend it, is that in the Empress Helena's time, when the "Invention of the Holy Cross" took place, the memory of the cross as an infamous punishment had not passed away from the world. Golgotha was a place of ignominy, and we can easily imagine the devotion of the Christian empress leading her to bury every trace of her Saviour's rejection beneath all that the imperial treasures could offer of costly magnificence. Well as one can comprehend such a feeling, how far more precious to us would have been the broken ground, the bare, roughly-hewn rock, the open view of Olivet, Jerusalem, and the sky!

The Holy Sepulchre itself is one mass of gold and silver, and precious marbles, seen by the dim light of silver lamps.

There are some less ornamented tombs—one called Joseph's—in a vault belonging to the Copts. Latins, Greeks, Copts, Armenians, Syrians, all have a corner in the sacred edifice. The various Churches seemed to have taxed their ingenuity to find sacred names and events to consecrate their several territories, and to secure some especial attraction for their especial votaries. We are sinking into a region below that of religious sentimentalism, or even of ecclesiastical controversy, to the lowest deep of petty mercenary competitions. In every sense it is a relief to escape from the dim church, with its heavy atmosphere, into the daylight and the fresh air.

For ours is indeed a religion of life and light, not of sepulchres or relics. Our sanctuaries are not the twilight of umbrageous groves, or the night of oracular caverns or monumental vaults. Precious, indeed, is every relic of the work of the hand we may touch no more, but the hand of Him we adore is working around us everywhere. Every star that shines, and every blossom that opens is not a relic of His absent work, but a token of His living presence. The voice which said, "It is finished," is not silenced for us. We know it. It speaks to us day by day in ever loving words. The true reliquary of the Church of Christ is the Bible. Let us treasure, if we will, every relic of the dead we honour. But Christ is not dead. He is risen. He was dead and is living again, and behold he liveth for evermore.

There is, indeed, a sense in which we on earth are said to be absent from the Lord, but never is it said that the Lord is absent from us. On the contrary, He is with us always until the end of the world. Death removes us to be present with Him. Resurrection gathers together the whole Church to be for ever with Him, consciously, visibly, eternally. But now to-day, and "all the days," He is with us. He makes His abode with us. He will never leave us nor forsake us.

Have not all representations of the Church as a "widow," or a "widowed bride," a tendency to sentimentalism? The Bible never uses this language. The image employed in Epistles and Apocalypse is one of an entirely different character. The widow is desolate, lonely, her gaze is towards the past, to the life finished and closed. The heart of the betrothed bride is in the future, in the day which ends separation, in the new life opening before her. The Bible compares the Church, not to the widow, but to the betrothed bride. The marriage supper has yet to take place. The new and everlasting home is being prepared; it has yet to be entered. The attitude of all healthy Christianity is not stooping down and looking into the sepulchre weeping, "They have taken away my Lord," but looking up to the risen Lord, and listening to his voice, and answering, Rabboni.

We left the church and ascended the steps worn by the feet or knees of so many pilgrims, and descended the Via Dolorosa with its "widow of the Ecce Homo," and its various legendary stations.

What a strange reversal of the parables the Crusades were—a Pilgrim's Progress read the wrong way; the body making a pilgrimage to a material Jerusalem; the Christian armour, mail or steel, instead of faith, and the word of God, and prayer; the Christian warfare against the bodies of Moslems instead of against fleshly lusts and wicked spirits. If the Crusades had only been an allegoric drama enacted for the benefit of posterity, they certainly might be valued as tending to give vividness to our conceptions of the true warfare of the Cross. But the Crusaders were men and women with human hearts and deathless souls. Among them must have been some who really longed, like Christian, to get rid of that terrible burden, who travelled all that weary and perilous journey with the fond hope that at the Holy Sepulchre they would in some way be nearer heaven, would obtain spiritual deliverance, and receive spiritual blessing. To such, what hours of agonizing conflict and bitter disappointment must have been spent here, when the first rush of enthusiastic devotion had subsided! The burden of guilt unremoved, the power of sin unbroken, heaven as far as ever, the Saviour as invisible! Yet, perchance, on many such, as they turned their steps despondingly homeward, the glad tidings dawned that the crucified and risen Lord could be as near them in Germany or England as at Jerusalem, and that the Holy War, so often a defeat in Palestine, might in his strength be always victorious in works of faith and labours of love at home.

We returned from the Church of Helena and the Crusaders to the Turkish city of to-day. Everywhere we were surrounded by tokens which showed how the great conflict of the middle ages had ended. Moslem shopkeepers sat composedly smoking in the bazaars; Moslem women passed us with their veiled faces; Moslem domes crowned the heights of Moriah; Moslem muezins called to prayer from the galleries of the minarets. The very name of Christian is a bond. We must lament that the curse of Moslem rule should fall on any spot on earth. Yet we cannot but feel that as regards the sacred association of the Holy Land, Moslem listlessness, and even Moslem fanaticism, have done less to destroy them than monastic superstitions. Two or three centuries of Crusading rule would have left little but a mass of mediæval legends to guide us through Palestine. Turkish rule has, at least, left it Oriental. The language of the peasantry is still allied to that in which our Lord awoke the dead maiden to life, and uttered his own cry of agony. The names of villages, and fountains, and towns are still essentially the same as those in the Old Testament. The traditions of monks who would find you the locale of any scriptural narrative (whether parable or history) within convenient distances of each other, on sufficient notice, are valueless indeed. But the traditions of peasants who have never read the Old or New Testament, and yet spake of Shiloh, or Nazareth, or Tyre by names David could have understood, are absolutely satisfactory. Our wonder in the Holy Land was, not that we could trace so little, but that we could identify so much. Once leave the narrow streets and Saracenic gates of the city itself, and you are on the very hills and valleys where Jesus "went about doing good." Deeply did we feel this, as on the afternoon of the twentieth of June we at length collected our muleteers and horses, and set off two or three hours before night for Bethel. The hills which stand round about Jerusalem, the valleys and the brook, were real and familiar places to us for evermore.

We had toiled through the stony bottom of the dark valley of Hinnom. We had sat one sunny Sunday afternoon on the Hill of Evil Counsel, looking across the valley to the slopes of Zion. We had gone round about the walls of Jerusalem, commanding from different angles the table-land on the west, the deep valleys on the east and south. We had drunk of the clear, cold waters which flow underneath the temple. We had stood by the ancient reservoirs, one of which must have been Bethesda, and another the Pool of Siloam, for since Roman times no energetic and enlightened rule has continued long enough to commence useful public works of any such extent as these. We had groped our way through the rifled sepulchres, whose entrances no one, for centuries, had cared to "whiten" or adorn. We had carefully guided our horses over the rough ground outside the gates, and among the broken cisterns and deserted wells, which made such dangerous "pits" for them to fall into. We had rambled over the slopes of Zion, and gathered the long dagger-like thorns which grow on the prickly bushes there. We had explored the Temple area, and stood on the very place where the blind eyes had first seen, and lame feet had first walked, and the deaf ears had been unstopped at the touch or word of Jesus;—where, in the women's court, that all might approach and learn, our Lord taught openly, and even as he spoke words of eternal wisdom, and answered every subtle cavil, was at leisure to watch and mark with his approval the poor widow casting her mites into the treasury.

We had crossed the brook Kedron, and wandered up the valley, in some quiet nook of which, among the olives, was Gethsemane. We had watched from Olivet the sunrise light up the roofs of Jerusalem, and the sunset glow behind them. We had seen the city over which, when He beheld it, He wept, burst suddenly on our sight, in that ascent on the road from Jericho. We had sat on the Mount of Olives, and gazed across the Kedron valley to where the goodly buildings had stood, now overthrown. We had gone over and over again the footpath to Bethany, with the wild fig-tree beside it here and there, until its rugged way had grown familiar to us. Seated on those very slopes under the shade of trees, more abundant no doubt than now, treading those very paths, sheltered in the recesses of that same valley, the voice of Jesus had been heard in familiar conversation with the disciples. On that same level summit of Moriah, His voice, in more powerful tones, had taught the listening multitudes, and silenced the cavilling Pharisees and Sadducees, not with the majesty of thunder, or the voice as of a trumpet, or as the sound of many waters, but a human voice, whose tones would have been inaudible at a few hundred yards distance,—a human voice, thrilling with every emotion of the heart. The words have gone forth to the ends of the earth, the voice would have been inaudible across the Kedron valley.

Within sight of those walls near the city, the three crosses had been raised, with the three agonized sufferers on them, exposed to the un pitying gaze of the multitudes who came to see the sight, and the careless mockeries of those that passed by on the high road from Jerusalem. The mystical shadow of one of those crosses has since then embraced the world, and within it a great multitude, which no man can number, have found shelter, and safety, and rest. But then, before the midday darkness came over the land, there was nothing to distinguish it from the other two, or from the number of similar crosses which afterwards terribly exposed the agonies of their victims to the gaze of besieged Jerusalem. There was nothing gigantic about it, infinite as its results will be. It overshadowed, not the city, but only a few yards of earth beneath it, and at a little distance you would not have distinguished one of those three tortured forms from another, infinitely different as the sufferers were,—the Saviour, the saved, and the lost.

And on these heights of Olivet, above Bethany, that human voice had been heard again, in familiar tones, blessing the disciples. The hands that had been stretched out and nailed to the cross were lifted up to bless. And there, in the act of benediction, the well-known form was parted from them, and carried into heaven, mastering all planetary laws with divine majesty, yet, like another human body, lessening to the upturned gaze of the disciples in the distance above them, until the intervening cloud hid Him from their sight.

It was this truth of the humanity of our Lord which so often came on us with startling distinctness in these pathways He had trodden, that He was actually a man. Our dim and imperfect thoughts vibrate so easily from one mistake to another, in endeavouring to realize His twofold nature, unconsciously mystifying His humanity into something super-human, illimitable, half divine, or humanizing His Deity. Yet in the perfect distinctness of the two natures is the glory of their perfect union, and on it depends much of our practical comfort and strength,— Perfect God and perfect man: of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting.

Equal to the Father as touching His godhead: and inferior to the Father as touching His manhood, Who although He be God and man; yet He is not two, but one Christ,—

One, not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the manhood unto God.

One altogether, not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person.

It was with thoughts such as these that we rode silently away from Jerusalem on the afternoon of the 20th of June. Our road lay across Scopas, and the site of the camp of Titus. On this ground the armies of Rome had encamped, slowly but surely clasping the infatuated city in their deadly embrace, and here those who may have been left to guard the camp in the day of the capture, must have seen the avenging flames burst forth from the Temple on Moriah, no more as from a sacrificial altar, but as from the funeral pile of the guilty city, from which every single disciple of the Saviour it had crucified had previously been rescued.

Once more on the height to the north (to which Mr. Nicholayson had guided us in our first ride, as presenting the finest view of Jerusalem), we paused to take our last view of it. The only human feature in the desolate landscape, the city rests couched on the edge of the high tableland of Judæa; the mural crown enclasps the brow of the hill, the white roofs, and domes, and minarets gleam from afar, still with something of a queenly dignity. The brown hills stand round about it, the blue mountains of Moab gird the distant horizon. Beautiful for situation it stands, the mountain city, the city where David dwelt, the holy city, the city which God chose, the city over which "Jesus wept;" desecrated by man's darkest crime, consecrated by the most marvellous manifestation of God's redeeming love.

THE VALUE OF A SOUL.

AN ASTRONOMICAL ILLUSTRATION.

THERE are values which arithmetic cannot compute, as there are depths in the ocean which no plummet has yet sounded. A soul is one of these values. The human line runs out in the measurement of its duration; arithmetic fails in the summation of its worth.

We can weigh mountains in scales, and hills in a balance. We have determined the mass and gravity, as well as the path, of each planet in the starry host. But the value of a soul is a problem that waits solution. In our Lord's computation, the largest of earthly values, the world itself, is put into one scale and a soul in the other, and as the computation is being made, the question is put, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" There is confessedly not even an approximation to its value in the comparison of our Lord. And if world should be cast after world into the scale with our earth, till the sun with its planetary system, till the universe of matter were in one scale, and a soul in the other, we should have approached no nearer the solution of the question? What is the worth of a soul? Alas! that in contrast with its inherent preciousness should be the practical everyday value put upon it. It is a monarch incognito—a glory veiled. What so cheap in the market of the world! What coin so small as will not buy a soul! What mess of pottage that will not tempt some Esau to throw away his heritage! Even the man whose life is an offering on the service of the faith, and who burns with zeal for souls, with difficulty sustains his estimate of their preciousness. It is the deep wail from many a missionary journal: "How insensible have I become to the degradation of the heathen! How difficult I feel it to realize amidst their own insensibility the preciousness and peril of their souls!" To this state of mind, whether experienced by the minister at home or the missionary abroad, the following letter of the Rev. T. G. Ragland may bring fresh quickening. It is the illustration of a high Cambridge wrangler after he became missionary in India, of the value of a soul, drawn from his previous astronomical studies, and affords a beautiful evidence of the deep yearning love of the heart of the true missionary over the most abject in that land—the wretched, outcast pariah. Writing home to a friend, he says:—

"An idea some time since formed itself in my mind, and I have at this moment a violent fancy to form it more definitely on paper. Dear Deck used to tell a tale of a simple Suffolk ploughboy. Walking home one moonlight night he fell in with the youth. He was a servant of his brothers, 'And is not that moon,' said the lad, 'much larger than it seems?' 'They say so,' said our friend; 'but what size do you think it to be?' 'Why, indeed, I can't say for certain, but somehow I should think it was just about large enough nicely to lie down in our meadow!' So much for the ploughboy's fancied knowledge and real ignorance. To moralize upon it: Apply it to the manner in which men, and thinking men, and Christians, and real Christians, judge of the human soul. They value it, and think they value it highly; they will do something, and think they do much for the salvation of the souls of their fellow-sinners. But indeed, and in truth, I think the knowledge which a blessed eternity will bring us will prove our fancied knowledge to be no more extended, if so much so, as the Suffolk ploughboy's about the moon. But cannot we correct our knowledge a little? Let us go and learn a lesson from the astronomer. How does he correct the knowledge, the first knowledge, which simple vision brings him in? How is he sure that the moon is larger than a green cheese, or that those little planetary specks have a greater magnitude than pin's heads? Why, first of all, having discovered by a process which it is unnecessary to describe, that the little dot of light is, in fact, thousands of miles distant, and having discovered by telescope that it subtends at the eye a sensible angle, and having measured that angle, a simple calculation shows him the size of the object to be greater perhaps than that of the huge ball which he calls his earth; and in every case something, at least, beyond what would give a plain section ten, or twenty, or a thousand times the magnitude of that meadow in Suffolk, in which, as the ploughboy supposed, the moon would nicely lie down. Now, let us go through a similar operation with that wonderful thing, the human soul. Take one of these, say the soul of the poorest, lowest pariah of India, and form it, in imagination, into, or suppose it represented by, a sphere, or what will do equally well, a circular area. Place this at the extremity of a line, which, as Newton ingeniously uses it in a certain Lemma (I forget the number), is to represent time. Extend this line, and move off your sphere further and further, ad infinitum, and what is become of your sphere? What has become of your poor pariah's soul? Why, there it is, just as before, with faculties as perfect as ever, as living, as sentient, as capable of knowing, and enjoying its great Creator as ever. It is still what it was, and that even after thousands of years. In short, the disc appears undiminished though viewed from an almost infinite distance. Oh, what an angle of the mind ought that poor soul to subtend! What an interest ought its salvation to excite, and to keep alive! But the astronomer has another method of determining, if not the magnitude, yet at least the importance of the heavenly spheres. A man may come to him and say, 'I grant that your moon and your planet are as large as you assert, but why brag so much about them? They are, perhaps, only unsubstantial froth, mere puffs of air, vapoury nothings, like comets.' 'No, my friend,' the astronomer will reply, 'not so fast. I know their mass and their weight, as well as their size.' The ignoramus may stare, but the philosopher stands to his word, and with good reason. Long observation has taught him, that planets, in the neighbourhood of one given heavenly body, have been turned out of their course; how, and by what, he is at first quite at a loss to tell; but he has guessed, and reasoned, has found cause for suspecting the planet. He watches, observes, and compares; and, after a long sifting of evidence, he brings it in guilty of the disturbance. If it be so, it must have a power to disturb, a power to attract; and if so it is not a mere shell, much less a mere vapour. It has mass and it has weight, and he calculates, and he determines, from the disturbances, what that weight is. Just so with the pariah's soul. Oh, what a disturbance has it created! What a celestial body has it drawn down from its celestial sphere!—not a star, not the whole visible heavens, not the heaven of heavens itself, but Him who fills heaven and earth, by whom all things were created! Him did that pariah's soul attract from heaven even to earth to save it! Oh, that we would thus learn, and learning, lay to heart, the weight and the value of that one soul!"

It was thus whilst he journeyed amidst the shamars, the devil worshippers, and pariahs of south India, the Cambridge fellow recalled his science to sustain his zeal, made his knowledge tributary to faith, and all things to minister to his work. What wonder that he who so thought and wrote should have been drawn out of his college orbit to make known to the benighted heathen Him whom that heathen's soul attracted from heaven even to earth to save it!

THE KAFFIR MISSION.*

THE country of the Kaffirs and the Kaffir tribes have been too well known in the history of British colonization. The outlying garrisons of our Cape colony have more than once retired before their sudden incursions, or been crushed by their overwhelming numbers. The fields of the colonists have been laid waste by their devastations, their flourishing homes turned into ruins, and themselves driven to flight, or slaughtered in the merciless raids of these savages. Even a British parliament has not refused to deliberate on the conduct of a "Kaffir war," and to commission the most gallant of her sons and her most experienced generals to tread out its fires. Once and again, after being trodden out, these fires have burst forth afresh, and the Kaffir resumed the assailant as if he had never felt the weight of the British arm. At the periods of his successive defeats he has only been driven into his wilderness strongholds, and circumscribed in his bounds. He has evacuated portions of his old territory, and retired to a greater distance from the border-line; but his power has remained unbroken, and his spirit unsubdued. He has awaited his opportunity, when the colonial troops being withdrawn or their force weakened, to renew with less hazard his predatory incursions. Kaffraria is too large a country for conquest; its mountainous and wilderness fastnesses too inaccessible to render its conquest easy. Our ultimate security for peace on our colonial borders lies in the conquest of its savage tribes to the King of Peace, and to the introduction amongst them of the industrial habits of settled and civilized life. The missionary is the true soldier for that warfare; the gospel his weapon.

From the first hour of Mr. Shaw's emigration to South Africa his thoughts were turned towards the Kaffir tribes. But, like a skilful general, he made sure of a base of operations by his previous labours amongst the colonists. He wisely counted upon drawing his supplies for the conversion of the Kaffirs from a revived and more earnest Christianity amongst his colonial brethren. The field was vast, and not without its dangers, that lay before him. Kaffraria had as yet been entered upon by few Christian soldiers. If we take the range of the East African coast from Algoa Bay to Delagoa Bay as the home of the tribes distinguished by the general name of Kaffirs and Bechuanas, we have a country of more than a thousand miles in extent, and penetrating in many parts along that line into an interior depth of two or three hundred miles. Lofty chains of mountains, broken at numerous points in their continuity, separate it in its western boundary from the tribes occupying the further interior. The loftiest range, called by the Kaffirs Kwahlamba, forms the impracticable and almost impassable boundary which has for ages separated the Bechuana nations of the more inland districts from the coast Kaffirs. On the summits and slopes of these western mountains are shed the waters that in numerous rivers flow through Kaffraria, constituting the riches of the country as a pasture-land, and converting it in many parts into a garden. The entire country is free from the influence of frosts and extreme cold in the winter, and, in many sheltered nooks and corners, tropical productions, as sugar, coffee, rice, cotton, the pineapple, banana, &c., may be grown with tolerable certainty of abundant crops. "Those who are acquainted with it," says Mr. Shaw, "will not think I exaggerate when I say it is 'a land flowing with milk and honey.' Nay, I am sure that the more extended description of the earthly Canaan will be found literally applicable in describing the capabilities of Kaffraria. It is, indeed, a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of the valley and hills; a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil, olive, and honey; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass." Why should it not bring glory to Him to whom belongeth the kingdom? The land possessing these capabilities and a climate so general, has not refused its strength to its children. Physically, the Kaffirs are a commanding race. They are tall and finely proportioned, and walk erect with a firm step, their stature exceeding that of an Englishman. It is in a survey of their moral and spiritual condition that their degradation appears. In his description of them Mr. Shaw neither counteracts the character drawn of them by a witness before a committee of the House of Commons, who described them as "natural born thieves," nor does he adopt the flattering representations of the writers who have described them as harmless sheep attacked and driven from the folds by the ravenous British wolf. His opinion is given in the well-weighed, cautious remark, "that no observant, thoughtful man, who has travelled or lived amongst people placed in the same circumstances as the Kaffirs of South Africa, will ever think of raising the question whether Christianity with her Bible, and her ministry, and ordinances, has improved and raised the condition of those nations among whom her influence has been felt for any lengthened period. The moral contrast between unmitigated heathenism and even an incipient Christianity, will be found to present most conclusive evidence of the civilizing and humanizing tendency of our holy religion. All this, however, seems to have been strangely overlooked or forgotten by many when they have spoken or written on the subject of the wars on our Kaffir borders. Several popular and distinguished writers, under the influence of a strong bias, in some cases produced by local party or personal causes, have so grouped and represented certain alleged facts in their publications, as to have produced in the public mind the most erroneous ideas respecting the moral state and character of the native tribes, leading to an impression that in these sad and painful conflicts the Kaffirs have always been right, and the colonists as invariably wrong. It has been generally understood and firmly believed by large classes of the most Christian, humane, and philanthropic people of the country, that the Kaffirs were merely fighting in defence of their liberty and territory, while the colonists urged on aggressive war for the purposes of oppression and the annexation of the Kaffir country. Never was there a popular error with so little reason to excuse it." In his minuter details of their moral state, and after an experience of forty years, he does not hesitate to apply to them the dark picture of the apostle, "With their tongues they have used deceit: the poison of asps is under their lips: whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood: destruction and misery are in their way; and the way of peace have they not known."

Was it safe to attempt a mission amongst these tribes? Was it duty, till circumstances arose that should yield some guarantee for the missionary's life? At the very period (September 1823) when the preparatory steps had been taken for founding the Kaffir mission, an alarming rumour arose of fresh Kaffir inroads. Frontier farms had been attacked, their cattle carried off, and with such rapidity, to the fastnesses in the mountains, that the troops in pursuit in vain sought to recover the property, whilst two or more herdsmen had been murdered on the farms. The report was sufficient to stir the colonial friends of our missionary to remonstrate against his enterprise. The recent inroads were urged as unquestionable proof of the still untamed, ferocious character of the Kaffirs, and that nothing could be expected from a mission undertaken amongst them but that himself, his wife, children, and attendants, should fall sacrifices to their cupidity and ferocity. Staggered by these suggestions and remonstrances, his mind for some days was tossed with conflicting anxieties, and oppressed with a load of care. But there was a more simply believing, and therefore more settled spirit than his own by his side. Amidst the perplexities of his own mind, he found rest in the unshaken faith and unhesitating decision of his wife. When he repeated to her what their friends had urged, and asked what she thought they ought to do, entering into the whole case with calmness and clearness, she replied, "You have long sought and prayed for this opening; divine Providence has now evidently set the door open before us; expenses have been incurred in the purchase of outfit; you stand pledged to the chiefs; and the conduct and character of the Kaffirs only show how much they need the gospel. We shall be under divine protection." She closed with these emphatic words, "Let us go in the name of the Lord." Our excellent missionary staggered no more. His resolution was taken. With a full heart and streaming eyes he assured his noble wife he was ready to proceed on his mission. "We shall start," was his reply, "so soon as it is practicable for the waggons to pass the Great Fish River." He now felt he could address his remonstrating friends in the words of Paul to the disciples who dreaded danger from his mission, "What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God." A week or two thereafter found the author of "My Mission," and his family, on their way from Graham's Town to cross the border into Kaffraria. His reflections, on reviewing, more than thirty years after, his journey on that occasion, show the prodigious and rapid advance of that portion of Africa towards a higher civilization. "It will seem strange," he says, "to those who now reside on the frontier, and in Kaffraria, that a journey, which is at present regarded as an everyday occurrence, and which excites no more apprehension among colonists than a trip from London to Paris usually does in England, should have been considered as so serious an undertaking. But at that period (1823), for Europeans to go with their wives and children among the Dhlambi tribes, or coast country Kaffirs, was considered to be an almost certain course to destruction. The amazing difference which time and the changes produced by missionary labours, commercial intercourse, and political events now present in this respect, is only a part of the manifold evidence which is patent to all men, proving the steady progress and improvement which has taken place in that country."

It was to initiate the progress that has since been realized, that Mr. Shaw passed beyond the colonial bounds into the wilderness, and placed himself at the mercy of chiefs whose promises had been often given, but seldom kept to their European neighbours. His trust was in His promise, whose angel encamps around them that fear him, and he was not disappointed. On arriving at his destination, after a journey of one hundred and sixty miles, he was received by the Chief Pato and his brother, and people, as though the missionary party had been making a triumphal entry into the district. The excitement, noise, and clamour were unbounded; unrestrained indulgence was given to curiosity. Waggons, wives, children, baggage, utensils of every kind were examined with prying eyes, and occasioned unmeasured wonder and marvellous loquacity. When the ordeal of a first introduction and inspection was passed, the waggons were drawn up under the shade of one of the beautiful yellow-wood trees that grow along the side of the river; and there, unyoking the oxen, the missionary tent was pitched, and praise offered to Him who had brought them in safety to their field of labour.

The following incident conveys a lively conception of the unforeseen kind of difficulties a missionary has to encounter in his first introduction of himself and his mission amongst barbarous tribes. Surrounded shortly after his arrival with a company to whom he had endeavoured to explain the "good news" he had brought from a far country, he was anxious to close the conversation with an act of worship. But the difficulty was to explain to the Kaffirs what was meant by worship, as they are not even worshippers of idols, and are unaccustomed to any kind of religious adoration. Through his interpreter, he explained they were all to kneel on the grass after his manner, as he was about to speak to God, the great and holy One, before whom they should prostrate themselves. Following the missionary's example, they all knelt down in a circle; but one droll fellow among them, on looking around and noticing the new and strange attitude which they had assumed, could not restrain his risible faculties—he began to laugh immoderately. The fit spread itself instantaneously around the circle, till the continuance of worship became impracticable. This difficulty often occurred in various places, when itinerating amongst the people. Yet after the mission was established, and the gospel had made some progress, Mr. Shaw tells us he had not unfrequently seen a plebeian Kaffir reprove a chief for disorderly conduct during public worship. A small village quickly arose around the spot he had chosen for his mission station. To the village he gave the name of Wesleyville, in honour of the great founder of Methodism. In the course of two years a regular congregation was collected; the brother chiefs, Pato, Kobi, and Kama, with their retinues, were amongst the attendants on divine service on Sunday, and even at that early period the heathen began to pay some outward reverence to the Lord's-day. Within the first fourteen months schools were formed for the children of the contiguous natives, and not fewer than sixty were enrolled for the Sunday school. The condition in which the Kaffir children presented themselves at school makes our missionary envy the higher respectability of the neglected home children of our "Ragged Schools." He had let his line down to a lower depth than the benevolent promoters of these British schools had reached. His Kaffir boys and girls did not possess even "rags" to cover them; a very few had small pieces of calf-skins and skins of other animals thrown over their shoulders, but the vast majority were entirely naked. To these schools he gave the appropriate designation of "Nude Schools." In the cities of Great Britain, with their accumulating and deepening moral debris, one would sometimes almost suppose there is scope for another Guthrie descending to strata lower than have yet been surveyed, and opening schools for the shivering urchins that have not even rags for their clothing.

If in the Ragged Schools of England and the Nude Schools of Kaffraria, the extremes of savage and civilized society are seen to touch each other, the essential identity of man in all stages of civilization is strikingly brought out in the following conversation. Who has not heard the objections of the rude Kaffir to the gospel a thousand times reiterated in our own higher circle of life? Have any of the subtle modern schools of infidelity more pregnant difficulties, or any careless Gallie better reasons for dismissing the whole subject. The conversation occurred as a company of Kaffirs that had clustered around the missionary party, whilst boiling the kettle for their evening meal, were asked to put any questions they thought proper respecting the gospel. One, speaking for the rest, addressing himself to the missionary, said, "You say that God requires men to pray all their lives, even to death; now, is not this too hard? If God would be satisfied with two or three days' praying, that might be done; but to pray all our lives is too hard." To this the missionary replied, "That those who prayed sincerely found it was not a hard work, but a pleasure, as running to a child, to whom even walking at first might have been a difficulty." The Kaffir rejoined, "That he was now growing old; that he had lived long in the world without God, and that, therefore, it was of no use for him to change now." "The more reason there is," replied the missionary, "the older you are, because you must soon appear before the judgment-seat of God; and you should consider it a mercy that now, at the latter end of your life, God has sent his word to you." "But do not you say," retorted the Kaffir, "that God is Almighty, and can do all things; why does he not change me at once himself, without sending teachers to tell me what I must be?" The missionary, informing him that God uses means to effect what he designs, sending his teachers that men might hear and believe, repent and be converted, and saved, the Kaffir, turning the edge of the application from himself, started off, in reply, with the question, "But why does not God change the devil first? He is very wicked; besides I know that he troubles me, and pushes me on to bad things. Why does not God first convert him?" Such are the objections of man in Kaffraria, in England, everywhere, till grace has made old things pass away, and all things become new.

We cannot further follow Mr. Shaw in the details of his Kaffir mission. Before seven years passed, a native church had sprung up at Wesleyville with forty communicants, and a native population of three hundred souls had voluntarily placed themselves under the daily instruction of the missionary. And though the sad events of the Kaffir war of 1834 scattered this Christian fold, to the credit of its members, and their tribe, who had experienced the benefits of the mission, they refused to join their countrymen in their rising. They had unconsciously become loyal in becoming Christians, through their intercourse with Christian men.

It was the Christian ambition of the author of the story of "My Mission," to establish a chain of Wesleyan mission stations, that from the border of the colony should extend along the coast country of Kaffraria to Natal and Delagoa Bay. Although he did not accomplish all that was in his heart, no reader will rise from the perusal of the story of his mission without thanks to God for the work done by his servant, and without a true admiration of the practical wisdom, calm enduring, patient toil, and holy diligence with which it was done. The following, amongst the closing paragraphs of his volume, indicates the greatness of his work by the magnitude of its results, and contains an argument for missions to which no British statesman ought to turn a deaf ear: "Thousands of native Africans, who themselves or their immediate progenitors, at the time our mission commenced among them, were clothed in the skins of animals, and were living in the lowest state of mental, moral, and social degradation, have been washed, decently clothed, and in other respects elevated in the social scale. In numerous cases the men have abandoned the practice of polygamy, while women have learned to regard the sanctities of the marriage state. Those who have embraced the Christian religion, under the instruction of our missionaries, have, almost without an exception, proved true and loyal to the British Government in times of war and rebellion. They have likewise ceased to be robbers, having been carefully taught the apostolic doctrine, 'Let him that stole steal no more, but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth.' They are now, indeed, generally employed in various industrial pursuits, and are enabled collectively to expend large sums of money annually in purchasing numerous articles of British manufacture, that add greatly to their personal and domestic comfort, but which in their heathenish state they neither could obtain nor desire to enjoy."

OUR DORCAS MEETINGS.

EMPLOYMENT OF TIME—CHRISTIAN USEFULNESS.

WHEN I next met with my young friends, I told them that I had been really wishing for the evening to arrive, from a feeling of anxiety on my mind, lest, on the previous occasion, I had dwelt too exclusively on mere personal improvement, and concentrated their thoughts and desires too much on self alone. I could but hope that they had recollected my having spoken of a double aim to be kept in view, though our limited time only permitted us to consider one division of the subject.

"You will remember now what is the other object which an earnest Christian will ever have in view in the disposal of her time?"

"Usefulness to the cause of Christ."

"Yes; and perhaps we ought to have given this the first place in our consideration. But at your age, mental improvement is of such importance, that it may rightly occupy a larger portion of your time than I hope will be always required. Still, I believe no one, however young, who has the true love of Jesus in her heart, will be happy or satisfied without feeling that something is done directly in his service, as the evidence and effects of that love."

I then observed how constantly, throughout all Scripture, the people of God are spoken of as his servants. The character and history of some of the most eminent saints under the old dispensation is thus summed up, "Moses, the man of God," "the servant of the Lord, died;" "Joshua, the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died;" "David, after he had served his generation according to the will of the Lord, fell on sleep." The parables of our Lord are repeatedly under the figure of a master and his servants. The apostles exhort their converts to this "reasonable service," contrasting its liberty and blessedness with the sad work and wages of the servants of Satan. The angel seen by John in vision claims for himself no higher office,—"I am thy fellow-servant."

Now, the idea of service, the office of a servant, in itself implies life not spent for personal gratification, or at our own disposal, but employed in doing the work and fulfilling the will of another. A daughter, in her father's house, may have time to spend very much as she pleases; but a faithful servant must in general be thinking, not of self, but of how she may best do the wishes and promote the interest of her master.

"I must again," I said, "take it for granted, dear young friends (would that it were true in every case!), that you are really desirous to be the followers of Jesus—that you love Him who first loved you. Then you will feel the force of his own words, 'If ye love me, keep my commandments.' And these commandments, as recorded in his holy book, include not only our earnest endeavours after personal holiness and obedience as his children, but our duty as his servants, by every means within our power, to help forward his kingdom on earth. But why use the cold argument of duty? Is it not a glorious, a wonderful privilege, to be thus employed by our God; to be fellow-labourers with all his saints, nay, with reverence we may say it, to be fellow-workers with himself, in the blessed task of making known the glad tidings of which the angels sang, 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will toward men?' In a world of sorrow, how sweet the hope of carrying a cup of consolation to some wounded hearts! But far more delightful, in a world of sin, to hope that God may make use of us to carry the light of truth to some darkened soul, to lead some poor wanderer to the Good Shepherd's fold. I have never forgot the words of a Christian friend, whom I visited one day, when her husband was thought to be in a dying state. I tried to give her comfort by speaking of the blessedness to which he was hastening, compared with the trials and sufferings of our life below. 'Yes,' she replied, 'but only on earth can he tell sinners of Jesus.' Her words gave me a strong impression of what ought to be one chief cause for a Christian desiring prolonged life, for himself or others.

"But, independent of duty and privilege, there is no happiness like that found in the service of Christ. A little experience only is needed to convince you of this. Mere kindness of heart, or desire of human approbation and affection, will make us taste the enjoyment of pleasing and assisting those around us. How much higher the happiness of feeling that we have been trying, however humbly, to fulfil the will and follow in the footsteps of our Lord, by seeking out the lost and comforting the mourners, and thus receiving his own blessed assurance, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

We read together the remarkable parable in which these words occur, and considered some of the lessons it is intended to teach. I spoke at some length in regard to the all-perfect example of our Saviour, who "went about doing good," and as to how far we might hope, through his grace and help, to be enabled in some degree to imitate him in his unwearied diligence, patience, humility, self-renunciation, compassion, tenderness, and gentleness to the sinful and suffering, &c. I asked illustrations of these features in our Lord's character from his history, and was generally well answered.

We considered the apostle Paul as the finest human example of likeness to Christ in self-renouncing labours of love, and read some passages in the Acts and Epistles illustrative of this.

It would have taken too long to have said much of other instances of holy men and women, who have lived for the glory of God and the good of others, in our own or in former times. But I pointed out what a cause of thankfulness it is that we have had such examples set before us, and that so much has been recorded of their personal experience as well as labours. I recommended the reading of such biographies as those of M'Cheyne, Martyn, the Judsons, John Campbell, Hewitson, Mrs. Fry, &c., as being well calculated, by the blessing of God, to encourage and animate us in our Christian course, while giving, at the same time, a salutary impression of our own deficiencies and unprofitableness.

I next alluded to the excuses often made by the indolent, and the discouragements really felt by the humble and inexperienced, when urged to the duty of direct effort in the work of the Lord,—want of time, of money, of ability, of opportunities, and so on. I added a few practical hints by way of direction and encouragement:—

1. Do not despise "the day of small things" in this matter, for Christ does not. His own gracious reference to the widow's mite, and the cup of cold water, are sufficient to prove this. It is to the heart he looks when judging of our conduct, and the motive rather than the action determines his approval. Besides, we often judge amiss as to the real value of things. With little or no money, you may give what money cannot buy. Words of sympathy, of kindness, of counsel, of prayer, who can tell the worth of these to a sad and burdened spirit! and these a tender-hearted, earnest Christian may always be able to bestow. Without the natural abilities and gifts which enable some, by their written or spoken eloquence, to instruct thousands of their fellow-men, you may be able to do much in a humble sphere, to teach the ignorant the way of salvation, and help forward the inquiring or the perplexed. And one of those whom you are made instrumental in bringing to Jesus, may have the abilities which are not granted to you, and through your means may become the gifted preacher, the honoured missionary. Such instances have repeatedly been experienced and recorded by those who "are wise and will observe these things."

Every situation in life has its own advantages and special opportunities for usefulness. We only need true love for Jesus and for our brethren to teach us how to improve these. The rich lady who sends blankets and wine to your poor suffering neighbour, is doing her duty, and what you could not do. But you can give up a night's rest, or part of it, to take your place as nurse by the weary pillow, which she could not with propriety, or probably with anything of the same ability. You have not money to give, as you could desire, to the missionary cause; but you may be able to undertake the task of collecting from those who have. You have not time to become a regular district visitor; yet you can quietly and prayerfully offer tracts to those you meet on the road, or to your companions. We must watch and pray against anything like a spirit of self-complacency and "thinking of ourselves more highly than we ought to think;" yet we must not suppose, that because we cannot do great things, we may not be enabled to do much in a limited sphere.

2. Examine what kind of service the Master has most fitted you for, or called you to, by the gifts and leadings of his providence. And when you think you have discovered what the talents are which he has intrusted to your care, seek grace quietly to "trade" with these, without losing time and strength in vain wishes or attempts to accomplish what is not in your path of duty, and therefore not intended for you to do. One has forcibly said on this point, "Do not go prowling about for work, but whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Perhaps you have a talent for teaching and attracting the young; then try to join the band of Sabbath-school labourers. Perhaps you have no teaching gifts, but feel your hearts drawn out to the sick and afflicted; then seek out these as your sphere of exertion. Perhaps your talents are more in your hands than your head; then let your leisure hours be employed like Dercas, in making garments for the poor, or such work as we are now engaged with for the god of missions. Only say in earnestness and humility, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and assuredly you shall not be left to "stand all the day idle."

3. Seek to grow in the spirit of prayer and supplication. Nothing can be done well without prayer, and by prayer alone we may do much, although, which is hardly possible, all other kind of effort should be out of our power. We are too ready to limit the range of our ordinary petitions by personal wants and personal interests. I would strongly recommend you to consider and write down a list of missions in various quarters of the world, as well as home and local objects of Christian effort, and arrange them so that each should be one day at least in the week made the subject of particular prayer. You would soon find the pleasure and benefit of such an arrangement, and a little memorandum in writing on the blank page of your Bible would secure you from forgetfulness. Such plans are, of course, profitless without the true spirit of prayer in the heart, but they may, by the Holy Spirit's blessing, become great helps to its exercise.

A knock was here heard at the door, and Fanny told me that it would be her mother, who wished if possible to look in upon us this evening. Mrs. Hamilton accordingly entered. She kindly greeted us all, and expressed her pleasure in being able to visit us. "I quite envy you," she said to me, "the pleasure of conducting these meetings. How gladly would I have undertaken them had health and family duties permitted."

I hoped that she would now give us a little friendly counsel and encouragement.

"I hear regularly of your proceedings," she said, "from Fanny, and I have been thinking a good deal about the subject which I understand has been occupying you this evening. I thought the best thing I could do for you was to find out, with the help of my husband, what openings for Christian usefulness there are just now among ourselves, such as it would be desirable and suitable for our young friends to undertake. But my inquiries have only extended to our own congregation or immediate neighbourhood, and must include but a small portion of the work which in this large town remains to be accomplished. I know that all of you have little money, and most of you little time at your disposal, and I have tried to keep this in view. Here is my list,—

"1. District visiting. We have two small districts in want of visitors. This work must be done regularly to be done well, and would require at least an hour each week, in the morning or afternoon.

"2. Tract distribution. Some of you who could not undertake any regular district might be able to give monthly tracts into the houses while you pass on your way to or from your work, or among your companions, or in other ways. We shall be glad to supply you with some for this purpose, and if done in a spirit of faith and prayer, you may hope for a real blessing on the good seed thus scattered abroad.

"3. Sabbath-school teaching. Our school is increasing, and we need more teachers. There is not a more suitable and delightful way of beginning to work for Jesus. You may remember how it proved so in the case of Sarah Martin. But then, you must recollect that it involves not the mere hour on the Sabbath, but preparation beforehand, and visitation of absent scholars during the week. No teacher can be efficient without having time for both of these duties.

"4. I know of at least four aged persons, two of them nearly blind, who are left much in solitude. To visit these from time to time, but especially on Sabbath evenings to spend an hour in reading with any of them, and telling of the sermons of the day, would be true Christian charity. There are other cases, also, of lingering sickness in the young, who would be greatly cheered by a kind Christian visitor.

"5. Two dressmakers with large establishments have expressed themselves most willing to have useful and religious books read aloud at certain hours to their young women while at work. It is possible that one of you might have leisure sometimes for this, and I would introduce you, and supply you with suitable reading.

"6. The matron of the Union Workhouse is a pious woman, and would gladly welcome any judicious visitor whom I recommend. A little Scripture reading and prayer, and words of friendly interest and sympathy, would much cheer the hearts of the aged inmates, and the children might be taught many things in an easy, cheerful way. Could one or two of you spare an hour once a-week in an afternoon for this?

"7. Such of you as have duties which keep you mostly in the house, so that you can undertake nothing regular out of doors, I could easily supply with a little needlework, either for such missionary objects as occupy us here, or for the very poor among ourselves. It is wonderful what can be made with a little ingenuity out of odd and scanty materials in this line, and though you might only occasionally be able to take up the work, still it would be pleasant to think you had something in progress.

"There are other and very important walks of Christian usefulness, which would not be suitable at your age. You can think over what I have mentioned, or any other plans that may occur to yourselves, and I shall be delighted to see any of you who may call for me, and to give you what counsel or assistance I can. By the grace and help of the Lord, I hope and pray that you, dear young friends, may be spared to do much in his service in your day and generation. And what a heart-cheering prospect is this to look forward to, compared with "the pleasures of sin for a season," or the vanity and vexation of spirit which must surely accompany or close all the pursuits and enjoyments which have reference to this world alone! I have no desire to see you sisters of charity, in the general sense of the word, separated from the ordinary ties and duties of domestic life. But each of you, in her own home and circle, may find many ways of proving your love to your Saviour, by commending him to those who know him not, and by acts of love and kindness to those whom he is "not ashamed to call his brethren." The spirit of prayer, self-denial, perseverance, wisdom, gentleness, and all else of which you feel your need, you must seek daily from himself."

She then took up the Bible, and read aloud from Luke xvii. 7-10 :—

"But which of you, having a servant ploughing or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat? And will not rather say unto him, Make ready wherewith I may sup, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink? Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not. So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do."

"This parable," she said, "has long seemed to myself a very remarkable one in connection with the subject we have been now considering. How plainly it teaches that ours must be a service for life,—

"No time for rest, till glows the western sky,
While the long shadows o'er our pathway lie,
And a glad sound comes with the setting sun,
'Servants, well done!'"

When by the help of our Lord we have happily accomplished any special work for him, we are not to think of resting, but gladly look out for the next call of duty. And recollect that whatever task he in his providence plainly sets before us, must be the right one for us at that time, whether we would have chosen it for ourselves or not. Oh, for grace to be faithful unto the end, feeling more and more deeply, as we proceed, that we are truly 'unprofitable servants,' yet loving our work as well as our Master, and proving to others that we do so by the readiness and cheerfulness of our obedience,—

"How happily the working days
In this glad service fly!
How rapidly the closing hour,
The time of rest draws nigh!
When all the faithful gather home,
A glorious company,
And over, where the Master is,
Shall his blest servants be."

REV. T. G. RAGLAND.

HIS MISSIONARY LIFE.

THE steps by which Mr. Ragland was led to his final decision to dedicate himself to the foreign missionary service, form one of the most deeply interesting portions of his memoir. We know not that within the range of missionary history there is a finer development of the spirit of the meek, inquiring, earnest servant, anxious to know and do his Lord's will, than is presented in the godly simplicity and prayerful expectation with which, while still weighing his call, he waits with the question, "What, Lord, wilt thou have me to do?"

It was the letter of a missionary, at the time in Southern India, that awoke the first earnest thought in Ragland's mind towards the mission field. A visit of Mr. Venn, clerical secretary of the Church Missionary Society, to Cambridge deepened the impression. It was the object of Mr. Venn's visit to bring the subject of missions to the heathen more prominently under the notice of the junior members of the university. Ragland on the occasion threw open his rooms to the undergraduate missionary collectors, who were addressed on the subject—How best they might devote their talents to the glory of God, by home work or by mission work abroad. At the anniversary meeting of the association that followed Ragland was again present, and with his friend Allnutt, then curate of a village near Cambridge, held the plates for the missionary offerings at the close of the meeting. As the clerical secretary of the Church Society eyed the stream of young men who passed out of the hall that day, he might have indulged the hope that amongst them some might offer themselves to the work, but he could scarcely have allowed himself the thought, that the two who were receiving the pecuniary contributions would, ere many days passed, have presented a better dedication than of gold and silver—even of their own selves. Yet within a few months both became missionaries to South India. The deciding element with Ragland, as he pondered and prayed over the subject, was the want of men for the foreign service. He had hitherto put the question between the home and the foreign ministry, "Why should I go?" but now that he realized that the field was the world, and that so large a part was unoccupied, he changed the form of the question, and asked, "Why should I not go and bear my Master's name before the heathen?" And unable to answer the question but by the offering of himself, he did not refuse the sacrifice. The deep humility and great sobriety of mind with which the question at issue was weighed and discussed, are beautifully shown in his correspondence of the period. Never did a man act less from an unreasoning impulse. His was not the flickering flame of a quickly-kindled zeal. It was, as his biographer observes, the calm, strong fire of love to Christ and to the souls for which he died, that made him ready to exert his influence wherever it could be turned to the Master's use. Opening his mind at this crisis to his attached friend, Mr. Deck, he writes :—

"What do you think, my brother? I am inquiring from myself and from the Lord whether or not it be his will that I should leave my dear land of friends and blessings to be a missionary to the heathen. May he guide me! Let me, my dear brother, tell you how the question has arisen in my own mind. It first arose last September, but I am ashamed to say that after but little prayer and little consideration it was dismissed for a reason I have the deepest cause to be humbled for—a very great declension from God. This, with very little variation and improvement, has continued until a few weeks ago, when—I trust I am not mistaken—the Lord again, as he has often done before, restored my soul, and began again to lead me in the paths of righteousness and holiness. A fortnight since the subject of missions was brought forward in this neighbourhood. At the Hastingfield missionary meeting my heart was warmed towards the work; and that good man, Mr. Henry Venn, said at different times during his stay in Cambridge very much that impressed me. The want of men is most distressing; and why, I asked myself, should I, who had nothing to withhold me, refuse to offer myself? . . . Now, my dear brother, pray for me—pray for me! I feel the danger of being misled. The notion now in my head may be but a romantic one. It is possible, too, that some discouragement at my little success at home may be hurrying my thoughts abroad; and even more, that I may be pleasing myself with the prospect of being much spoken of in Cambridge and elsewhere, among pious people, and praised as devoted. Oh, poor, vile heart that I have! I am aware, too, how sadly I have neglected ministerial duty at home—how inconstantly and wickedly I have behaved—what a little love to the blessed Saviour, and what a little (if any) yearning after immortal souls I have had. And who am I that I should aspire to a more arduous and self-denying position in the Lord's vineyard—I who have hitherto been so unfaithful! Oh, pray, my brother, that I may be infallibly guided, and have abundant grace given unto me to be faithful even unto death, wherever I may be placed. Should I go forth to the heathen, there will not be wanting others to supply my place at home, and in a far better way; and more than this, I cannot but confidently expect, that should I by the especial grace of God be strengthened to leave my friends, and college, and country, and comforts, with a really single eye to the glory of God, simply intent upon pleasing him and spreading abroad the knowledge of the Saviour, and entirely uninfluenced by a desire of being well spoken of, &c., in such a case I cannot but hope that my example may be blessed to the stirring up zeal in the hearts of the many young, pious men in Cambridge, with whom, from time to time, I have had intercourse. Oh, may wisdom be given me from above—may I follow no light of my own—may I have a right judgment in this matter, and in all things given me by the Holy Spirit! Pray for me! Do you and your dear wife testify your affection for an unworthy friend by laying my case and my thoughts before the throne of mercy of our common Father, through the intercession of our common Saviour."

The guidance thus earnestly and with singleness of heart sought was not withheld. His path of duty became daily more clear to himself and to the Christian friends on whose judgment he relied. The south of India was decided upon as his field of labour; and without a hesitating thought, with no other trial than that of parting with the college, the flock, and the friends he loved, he embarked for Madras. He did not wait till he arrived in India in order to commence his missionary work. In the overland route he sowed seeds that may yet appear in the great harvest, and sowed under great disadvantages. We have rarely met with an attempt at doing good under greater difficulties than is illustrated in the following characteristic incident of his journey. Anxious to give an Arabic New Testament to one of the suite of the Prince of Muscat, a fellow-traveller, he procured a copy at Malta. But how to give it he knew not. There was no interpreter on board. The only one who could speak Arabic was a young man, so wild that he did not dare to trust him. He was not, however, to be baffled in his purpose. Meeting with a hand-book of Egypt, in which were a few words and phrases, he picked up enough to explain his meaning in broken Arabic. Still the favourable opportunity was wanting. At length, on a Saturday, when sitting on deck sick and not equal for dinner, he found himself near to the man for whom he had purchased the Testament, and with words and signs made him comprehend his meaning. The Arab sat attired in a yellow turban, with a profusion of silk threads dangling about his face, a mild, quiet man, watching the luggage ascending from the hold, in company with two Nubian servants or slaves of the prince. Accosting him, Mr. Ragland said, "I speak with you," to which, with some astonishment, he answered, "Yeez." Beckoning him away to the poop, to a retired seat, and motioning him to sit down, the following conversation, which Mr. Ragland details, took place, his broken Egyptian Arabic, picked up from the hand-book, being his only help. "I asked, 'You a Christian?' He said something meaning 'Not—Arab, Arab.' I rejoined, 'This does not please me.' He smiled. I continued, 'On account of this I come, I speak with you.' Then, taking from under my Mackintosh cape the Arabic New Testament, and, putting it into his hand, I said, 'I desire you to read this,' repeating the word 'read' once or twice, and pointing to the book until I perceived he had gained my meaning. He looked at the title page, and began to read slowly and with moving lips. I then added, pointing upwards, 'I desire you to pray to God to teach you.' Whether he understood or not I am not quite certain. I found, however, the third verse of Rev. i., and gave it to him to read. He seemed altogether surprised with my Egyptian Arabic, and said something about 'speak Arab!' I could only shake his hand and leave him to ponder his book. I returned in a few minutes. I found he had taken it to his cabin. I could do no more than commend him to the God of all grace in prayer, imparting a blessing upon his own word." In spite of great natural diffidence and unwillingness to intrude himself on strangers, he spoke, also, during the journey, the word of the gospel to several young cadets, "poor young fellows, thoughtless and wild, and delighting to hear of war having broken out, one of them, though he knew it not, having already lost his father." And, to recall his word, he gave to each a book on arriving at Madras, accompanying them with notes which, "from the haste I was in, and the excitement of hearing that hostilities had commenced, I wrote with more earnestness and warmth than, under other circumstances, my cold and fearful heart would have allowed me to do."

For five years Mr. Ragland was called to occupy at Madras an office which brought him into intimate intercourse with the missionaries at the several stations of the Church Missionary Society, and through which he gained extensive knowledge of practical missionary work. The health of the corresponding secretary failing at the time of his arrival at Madras, he succeeded to his duties, and to the charge of the mission chapel. For the secretary's office he combined, in a rare degree, the qualifications of a man of business with the high spiritual tone of a Christian. Still his own taste and feelings lay towards Tamil work and missionary work. He longed for more direct contact with the heathen, for more immediate spiritual service than his office of secretary afforded. Each day, as he renewed his work at the desk of the mission house, his eye affected his heart. From the terrace into which his principal rooms opened, and almost at one view, his eye alighted on the minarets of a mosque and on a temple of Shiva, with its shed for the idol car, and tank, and Brahmin's house around, whilst the din, except during sleeping hours, never ceased of tom-toms and other discordant instruments, occasionally diversified by petards, to the honour of one who is a devil, and not a god. Even few hours passed in his office without the entrance of natives whose foreheads, whose arms and breasts, often whose whole bodies bore the symbols of the idols they worshipped, and awoke, in their honouring of their false gods, his jealousy for the true God, and more intense desire that all idols should be utterly abolished. Referring to these daily scenes with his characteristic humility, he remarks:—

"Some way or other my principal grief was, and so it has continued to be, that I grieved so very little. The idol marks, the signs of their being bond-slaves of Satan, were less ineffectual than any other sights and sounds in stirring up some little sorrow and zeal; and this impression has not become quite lost through familiarity. But David's 'rivers of water,'—what a rebuke they seem to give! And yet I comfort myself with the hope that, as in the course of time I become prepared, though very slowly, by the knowledge of the language, to preach Christ and his gospel, I shall have given me, however gradually, the better preparation of holy zeal. There is one effect of heathen sights upon me which I had never anticipated, and this is a more lively feeling of pity for the multitudes of baptized heathens at home. The idol marks stare one so constantly in the face. My poor moonashee, for instance, a kind old man, who lost his daughter lately—and what could I say to comfort him?—he wears one, and sits by me with it daily for two or three hours. The consequence is that the thought is continually recurring, 'There goes a professed servant of Satan.' And then, perhaps, directly the sin-excusing, world-and-ease-loving spirit within objects, 'He is not worse than many whom I know in England, or in New Town alone.' But I have learned at length to retort, 'So much the more need, then, is there for sorrow, and for painstaking, and, above all, for prayer to the Lord of the harvest.' Thus, if I do not mistake, the visible signs of the alienation of a few from God, by serving to remind me frequently of the natural alienation of all, have excited a deeper feeling for my poor, Christless fellow-sinners generally."

The craving of Ragland for more directly spiritual work was at length to find its satisfaction in a mission scheme which grew out of his secretaryship, and which proved the great work of his life. If it was felt by him, as he laboured at the desk, that he had not found his proper and congenial employment, he yet regarded his position as admirable training ground for future service. It was for the time his school of experience. His extensive correspondence brought under his review all parts of the Indian mission field. More especially he had learned to the minutest detail the operations of the mission in Tinnevely. A tour of nine months among the stations of the south completed his knowledge, and opened to his observing eye the defects of the existing organization, and led to a plan of missions for Northern Tinnevely, in which he himself took the lead, and to the execution of which he devoted the remainder of his days. The feature of his plan was "Itineracy"—systematic, organized itineracy. His tour in Tinnevely and Travancore had convinced him that there existed a want in North Tinnevely which the mission as there constituted had not in itself the means of supplying. In the system pursued the missionary occupied a fixed centre. There he had his church, his bungalow, and his schools. From that he worked. As the leaven of Christianity spread, and converts were made in the neighbouring villages, native catechists or readers were placed over them, the missionary retaining the general superintendence of the whole. When the district had outgrown the management of a single missionary, it was divided. A new centre was formed, from which a second missionary worked onward upon the same principle. Visits, stated or occasional, were made to the outlying heathen villages. Sometimes a tour was made through an unevangelized district. But itinerating, properly so called, formed no part of the plan. To impart to it a self-extending power amongst the northern heathen, he proposed to supplement it by an exclusively aggressive agency that should move from village to village, whose dwelling should be in tents pitched for the week or the month amongst the villagers, and whose circuit of itineracy should at regular short intervals secure the revisiting of the spots where their tents had once rested. For the details of the plan we must refer to the memoir, where it is characterized as one of no ordinary kind. "It bore," says the biographer of Ragland, "the stamp of originality. It was the product of a great mind. Its details were worked out with remarkable precision. Its provisions evinced the most calculating foresight. What it was in theory, with slight alterations it remained in practice." Its highest commendation is to be found in the observation of one who was for five years associated with him in its daily working details. "Though in many of its main features," says Mr. Finn, "and in still more of its minor details, it was something new, yet most of its peculiarities had been anticipated by him, and one thing after another seemed to fit in naturally with his previously arranged scheme."

Two Cambridge men became his associates, along with some native brethren, in working out this plan. By common consent, he became leader of the enterprise. None could deny him the chief place. It seemed natural he should guide. His singleness of eye made his whole body full of light. His one great motive, the honour of his Lord, was so palpable and transparent, that none with a right spirit could refuse to recognise it and bend to it. It was this that broke down any prejudices against his work—its method, or its object. Who could assert claims against one who always took the lowest place, and was first in every arduous service? Or who could be jealous of him who had a bright and keen eye for every virtue, and for everything worthy of praise in the labours of others, though pursued on a different system from his own. He had learned the lesson, "He that is chief among you let him be your minister." If he ruled his band of itinerating missionaries, it was by humility and service. He it was who came to wake them in the morning, who provided for their wants, who tended them in sickness, who rejoiced in their gifts, and, conscious of his defects, delighted to contrast his own slowness of speech with the readiness of his companions, his own frequent embarrassment in the encounter with native subtlety with their apt and quick replies.

The results of his mission were not unappreciable even during his life. Before he committed his work into other hands, he could confidently say that hundreds of the heathens to whom they had preached for three, four, and nearly five years, knew enough of the gospel to save them, were that knowledge only applied to their hearts by the Holy Spirit. An old Tamil associate testified to the fact, that so great had been the progress in intelligence in the district embraced in the itineracy, that whereas at his first coming into it five years ago, he found it necessary to employ many illustrations in order to arrest attention and make the truth at all comprehended, he now found that a simple, unadorned statement of Christian facts and doctrines gained the same attention, and was evidently understood. Some fruit was gathered, more was confidently expected, though it was not to be reaped by the hand of the sower. In the midst of his duties, and with scarcely a moment's warning, death came upon him. He had long suffered from weakness of his lungs, yet laboured on. There appeared to be no immediate danger. On the morning of his death he had written his weekly budget for Palmarotta, and had retired to his bath-room, where the rupture of a blood vessel produced the immediate signs of dissolution. His first words on the attack were, "I am in the hands of God;" and uttering earnestly a short prayer, he fell on his cot with a sweet smile on his countenance, and the name of Jesus on his lips. "I should think," says the brother who attended him, "that in two minutes from the time he called me his spirit was with the Saviour."

A little band—one Englishman and a few natives—who owed him much and loved him dearly, with aching hearts and weeping eyes, committed his body to the ground. It was a dark narrow grave, beneath the tamarind's shade; but there streamed upward a bright pathway to the throne of the righteous Judge, and the crown of glory that fadeth not away. His happy spirit was already with the Lord, and his redeemed body was in safe keeping, awaiting the voice of the archangel and the trump of God.

Scarcely had Ragland rested from his labours when his works followed him in a remarkable revival in Northern Tinnevely, the report of which is now awakening in the British Churches many thanksgivings and prayers. He died on the eve of victory, and was spared its dangers, as he strikingly remarks of Havelock, when he heard of that Christian hero's death: "General Havelock, how happy his lot! to have served his country by the will of God, and then to have fallen asleep, escaping thus one of the greatest trials a Christian man can perhaps be exposed to—popularity. Compare the honour of dining at Windsor, &c., with that of 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

FAIR-WEATHER FAITH.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUTLER.

"How did you feel, auntie, while the horses were running down the hill?" "I trusted to Providence till the breechin gave way; then I shut my eyes and gave up for lost." The good woman in question was not the only Christian whose faith held only by a strap.

We are all more or less weak on this very point. It is the easiest thing in the world for us all to exercise fair-weather faith. In times of civil quiet, of mercantile prosperity, of health and happiness, it is easy to trust God. When the wind blows favourably into my swelling canvass, and my well-rigged bark flies like the sea-gull over the azure waters, why should I distrust the great Disposer of winds and waves? When my business thrives, why should I tremble for my daily bread! When the health of my household is perfect; when we can all gather around our table, a happy, healthy, hungry group, and do justice to the steaming cakes, redolent of the buckwheat-field and the bee-hive, who of us thinks of the great Physician? We are all believers then (if ever), and our confidence in God, as a most kind, loving, and affectionate Father, is complete. It costs us nothing to trust him. Neither is a prosperous Christian, who walks in the sunshine of God's favour and feels the warmth of a clear assurance beaming in through every window of the soul,—neither is such an one often afflicted with distrust. His danger lies in the opposite quarter. He is in peril of presumption and self-complacency, but not of distrust. We can all trust God in fair weather.

But if the tempest begin to marshal its cloud-squadrons into the skies; if the sun and stars appear not; if the sea lash into foam like an enraged lion; if great, green, greedy caverns open in the sea to swallow up our trembling bark,—can we trust God then? Will the cheap confidence of the calm hold through the hurricane? There is the question; there is the true test of faith.

How often had the disciples gone out with the Master on Galilee's bosom, when the boat swam like a swan before the well-pulled oar, and they felt no whispering of distrust. What faith had they then! But on that memorable night when the white caps came rolling and rioting from under the black cliffs of Gadara, and leaped into the shivering skiff, then the poor panic-stricken creatures began to shake the sleeping Saviour with the whimpering cry, "Carest thou not, Master, that we perish? His rebuke is suited to just such times as these: "Oh! ye fearful ones, why have ye so little faith?"

For what is that trust good for that only abides with us in the bright hours of life? It is just as good as a lantern which should only shine when the sun is up, and then go out in the darkness. It is about as good as an anchor which only holds when the idle ship is swinging on the glassy swells of a quiet harbour. It is about as serviceable as the temperance of those men who are very abstinent when no wine "giveth its colour" before their eye; or the patience of those who walk very lightsome when only feather-weights are laid on their shoulders.

The trust we need is a trust in integrity though every bank fail—a trust in God though desolation darken our fireside, and death dig a grave right beneath our couch or our cradle. As Christians we must "trust God though he slay us." The faith we need is a lantern that will gleam the brighter as the night of trouble grows the darker,—a light unto our timid feet, a lamp unto our broken, up-hill pathway. The trust that honours God is a trust through thick and thin, through noon and midnight, through poverty and reproach, through prosperity and convulsions too, through hard words and hard blows, through threats of base men and the violence of evil spirits tormented before their time. What the panic-struck merchant needs to smooth his brow, and relieve his aguish nerves, and steady him through the crisis, is faith in God. And you, my poor desponding brother, bruised and broken, hanging your head like the bulrush under spiritual discouragement, you can be restored by only one medicine. You want the simple tonic of trust. Nothing else will cure that dyspepsia of the heart, and quicken your appetite for God's word, and send a new glow over the wan cheek of your consumptive courage. You are well-nigh useless now in your closet, in your home circle, in your church. Your faith has gone out. Cry mightily unto your Saviour, "Lord! increase my faith." May God hear you, and give you a trust that will lean on Him though the very earth were removed, and the mountains were cast into the midst of the sea. May you have the all-conquering confidence of him who wrote from a prison cell to his far-away spiritual son, "The Lord stood with me and strengthened me; and the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom. To him be the glory for ever and ever!"

He always wins who trusts in God,
To him no trial's lost,
God's will is sweetest to him when
It triumphs at his cost.

Lord! not my will, but thine be done!
My soul—from fear set free,
Shall cast her anchor 'neath thy throne,
And trust alone in thee.

THE WORLD'S CONFESSIONS.

THE world's great men may sometimes tell religion's great truths. Take, for instance, Louis XIV. and Goethe. Each possessed great talent, which was used in each case to build up an artificial great man on the world's pattern. Each inherited much—the first, a royalty of state; the second, a royalty of temper and manner that raised his talents above the talents of other men. Each lived long and lived successfully, and yet each confessed fully how wretched their glory was. The confessions of Louis XIV. were convulsive and wordless—they were the inarticulate shudderings and writhings with which he turned from death to superstition, until superstition led him blindfolded to death. Those of Goethe—equally splendid, though in another field, and equally artificial—are incidentally referred to by Eckermann, one of his idolaters, whose reminiscences we have now before us in the German language:—

"When I look back," said Goethe, speaking in his seventy-fifth year, "on my early and middle life, and see how few remain of those who were young when I was young, I am reminded of a summer residence in a watering-place. When we arrive, we form acquaintances with those who come before us, but who will soon be leaving. The loss is painful, but then comes the second generation, with which we live for a while on terms the most intimate. But then this passes away, and leaves us alone with the third, which arrives soon before our departure, and with which we have but little to do.

"I have often been praised as an especial favourite of fortune; and I will not myself complain. But at the bottom there has been nothing but trouble and labour; and I can well say that in my whole five and seventy years, I have not had four weeks of real pleasure. It was the eternal rolling of a stone, that had always to be lifted up again for a new start."

So spoke the great voluptuary poet-idol of Germany, and such is the world's estimate of glory and pleasure from the world's oracle.

What is it but the echo of the words of the Master. "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again." Blessed be his name that he added, "But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life" (John iv. 13, 14).

THE BAPTISM OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV. J. D. BURNS, HAMPSTEAD, LONDON.

"THEN cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him." In this simple note of the evangelist is the long-suspended narrative of His life resumed. Our last glimpse of him was as a boy going out with his parents through the Temple porch toward the far blue hills of Galilee, and then for eighteen years all trace of him is lost. All that we know is that in the peacefulness and obscurity of Nazareth the Son of God was all the while meekly bearing the yoke of submission to parental law, through youth and graver manhood, amid hardship and poverty, in all beautiful and winning ways 'fulfilling the righteousness' of the commandment with promise, the golden rule of the home, as it had never been fulfilled under earthly roof before. Winding on from day to day in its hidden channel, the current of that life in its even noiseless flow was brightened by heavenly gleams, though seen only by household eyes. Henceforward it is to come into open view, to pursue a rough and troubled course, to be chafed, ruffled, and perplexed, oftener darkened by stormy glooms than gladdened by sunshine, yet with no trace or tinge of earthly element sullyng its clearness, keeping its native purity and freshness to the last.

From the towns and villages of his mountain-province, many in these days were making the pilgrimage to Jordan. No place was so remote as not to have been reached by the impulse of the great Revival—the call to penitence and preparation which from the desert of Judea had thrilled through the land. For six stirring months the Forerunner had proclaimed the coming of the Lord, and "the people were in expectation," when from the home of Nazareth, Jesus, now thirty years of age, went forth, we may suppose, alone. In the long interval we cannot doubt that he had often gone up to Jerusalem at Passover times in the company of kinsfolk or acquaintance. But it was in obedience to another impulse that he entered on this long and toilsome journey. He heard a voice which others might not hear. The inward call of the Spirit was witnessing that the hour has come for his manifestation unto Israel. An invisible hand was drawing aside the veil that had hitherto hid the mortal lowliness of the Son of God, and that was to hide him from human eyes on this side of the cross no more. It was meet that he should go forth to this great Epiphany alone. It is probable that in the interval Joseph had died: we hear of him no more; and the quick motherly perception of Mary would divine that in this sudden and solitary outgoing of her son from the little world of home into the great world beyond, there was the fulfilling of the presentiment of years, that again He felt there was need for him to be "about his Father's business."

The circumstances of the baptism of Christ, marking as it does the transition-point of his life, are recorded by all the four evangelists, but by none so minutely as the first. Weary and travel-worn He has reached the ford of Bethabara, and made his way unnoticed through the crowd to the spot where the hermit-prophet stands. It was an eventful moment when the Son of Mary stood face to face with the son of Elizabeth, as long before the two holy women had met in Hebron, and the aged matron greeted in the retiring maiden of Galilee the mother of her Lord. From Matthew's account it might be inferred, that as soon as Jesus came into the Baptist's presence John recognized in him the One mightier than himself, of whose advent he had testified. He shrunk from the thought of conferring the distinctive rite of his ministry on Him. He "forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" It seems, at the first glance, difficult to reconcile this with the statement in the last Gospel—that the Baptist declared he did not know Jesus to be the Messiah till he had seen the promised sign, the Holy Ghost descending on him, which did not take place till after the baptism. We are, doubtless, to understand that John did not certainly know the fact of his Messiahship from the first. There was nothing in his outward look or bearing to mark him out as the Christ. John, of course, was acquainted with the miraculous incidents of the birth of Jesus, but it is uncertain whether they had ever met,* whether the Baptist knew that this man of Galilee was the Son of Mary, Jesus of Nazareth, and supposing that he did, how far any previous knowledge of his life might have prepared him for the coming revelation. On this point all conjecture is vain. It is enough to know that from day to day John was expecting the Christ to appear, and at the moment his eye first rested on the Man who stood in suppliant guise before him, some vague presentiment filled his soul with hope,—a silent influence of the Spirit drew out his heart to him in eager anticipation,—is not this He at last? We may well believe that between these two elected men, brought so strangely together, God's servant and his Son, there was a subtle sympathy of soul and heart—that though the son of Zacharias did not know the Virgin's Son after the flesh, his spirit was secretly and profoundly moved by the presence of the invisible Divinity that dwelt within him. This also must have struck the Baptist, that with all the lowliness of demeanour and suit there was no confession of sin—it was not as a penitent He came.

* We may dismiss all such ideas of their infantile or childish companionship as are suggested by the common pictures of the Holy Family as simply mythical. They may have met, at a later period, in the company of their parents at Jerusalem during the festivals.

With such an impression or hope, we cannot wonder at John's hesitating to administer to him the rite which was to others the baptism of repentance. The less is blessed of the greater: and with the humility which was engrained in the Baptist's character, he said, "I have need to be baptized of thee." Often, in baptizing others, he had felt that as a sinful man he needed to abase himself in deepest contrition before his God, that he too had the inward taint of guiltiness which needed to be purged away. Gladly would the great preacher have taken his place in the crowd of weeping penitents, lowliest of all.

The reply of Jesus, so quiet and simple, yet full of the self-conscious majesty which was in every word he spoke, must have at once confirmed the Baptist's impressions. These are the first words His lips have uttered in our hearing since the words to Mary in the Temple long ago, like them, too, giving us, as through a rent in the veil, a sudden glimpse into the spiritual world within,—a deeper insight into the sacred mystery of his human life.

"SUFFER IT TO BE SO NOW; FOR THUS IT BECOMETH US TO FULFIL ALL RIGHTEOUSNESS." It is the language of One who accepts the avowal of inferiority as natural and valid,—One who might have stood upon his right rather to baptize than be baptized. But he waives it "for the present;" as yet, it is fitting that He who is the greater should appear to be the less. There are reasons for it of the gravest necessity, arising from the nature of the work he has come to do. This rite of baptism is an ordinance of God, and every ordinance that the divine law has laid upon men the perfect Man must submit to and fulfil. Though in his essential glory standing above all law, He has, in the assumption of humanity for man's redemption, been "made under the law," that he might make it honourable by a heartiness and faultlessness of obedience such as had never been rendered on earth to that law before. Sinless of nature, He has come to place himself on the common level of sinful men, to be in all points made like unto them; to bow his neck under every yoke which is laid on theirs; to stand by them as a kinsman and brother of their blood in service and in suffering, not different in aught save by the willingness with which he serves and the patience with which he suffers. All that it was right in them to do it is becoming in Him to do, even in the case of ordinances and rites which, in mystic symbolism, drew their solemn meaning from the sinfulness of man's fallen nature, and its need of spiritual cleansing. Thus He had been made a son of Israel by the rite of circumcision, though pure in spirit and flesh. Thus, as a first-born child, He had been presented in the Temple to God, and redeemed with an offering, though himself the Redeemer. Thus He had kept from year to year the Pass-over feast, though no sprinkling of blood was needed for him who was the immaculate Paschal Lamb. And now, though for him, in His white and spotless innocence, there is no need of sacramental ablution, no sinful taint inhering in his mortal nature which must be washed away, he honours this latest ordinance of God by claiming at the hand of the Forerunner that rite which is the sign of absolving grace to sinful and contrite men. For thus it became Him who, "though he knew no sin, was made sin for us," to fulfil, in the likeness of our sinful flesh, all righteousness of law, that he might be the Restorer to men of the righteousness they had lost, that "we might become the righteousness of God in him."

The baptismal rite, as administered to him, was in form the same, but it assumed for him a significance of its own. It was no token of "repentance for the remission of sins," but it became the sign of His consecration to that office of Mediatorship in which he was to stand forth as the Preacher of forgiveness, the Absolver of men from guilt, their Purifier from the inborn taint of corruption, their Redeemer from the bondage and power of sin.

Thus, while we wonder at the lowliness which shines out in his submitting to be baptized by John, we note, as we look into these memorable words, the utterance of clear and self-evidencing Divinity, an avowal which would have been impious presumption from other lips than his. In the very act of stooping to the Baptist's authority, He must speak as one undefiled and separate from sinners. It is not to receive the seal of contrition that He comes, but to "fulfil all righteousness." It is natural in Him, conscious in the depth of his spirit of unblemished purity, to speak of righteousness where others could only breathe a prayer for forgiveness. Others were baptized of John in Jordan, "confessing their sins." He was baptized, asserting his sinlessness, his clearness of conscience from all offence, as having, through these thirty years of life, kept himself unspotted from the world,—not a thought, or desire, or affection of his guileless soul that was not true to the law of his God. And for this very reason, that he is the absolutely perfect and righteous One, has he come to be laved with these mystic waters, that, as the Fulfiller of the law, he might become the Redeemer of those that were under the law, and bring in an everlasting righteousness in which men could stand accepted before God.

As marking his solemn inauguration to his priestly and kingly work on earth, there was a special propriety in the season of life at which he was baptized. It was at the age of thirty that the ministers of the Temple, the members of the sacred Levitical caste, were invested with the priestly ephod, and took their part in its services. At this age he receives the divine anointing and investiture as a Minister of the true Sanctuary of God,—the Tabernacle into which are to be gathered, to the end of time, the company of elect and faithful men, wherein he is to be the Chief Apostle and High Priest, ministering at the altar for ever, after the power of an endless life. Thus we behold all these sacred rites spiritualized in Him, all types and symbols of the ancient Church receiving their full, harmonious completion in Him, the law beholding the ideal of its sanctity realized in one human life on earth before it passed away.

In the words, "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," the Baptist must have felt that Jesus associated him with Himself, that he linked the ministry of repentance, at this last and highest stage of its development, with his own. John was the angel of preparation sent before the Angel of the covenant, and, now that the Lord stands before his faithful herald, the servant receives from the Master's lips the testimony which set a divine seal to his mission ere it closed.

"It becometh us,"—you, in your place as God's minister,—Me, in mine; you, a servant in His house,—Me, the Son, over the house,—to observe its holy order and law. It is becoming that you should consummate and crown your work by the sacred rite which is to consecrate Me to mine. Our lives have been mystically bound together,—our names have been pronounced together by prophets long ago,—our missions are alike divine. Thine is ending as mine begins, and by this baptismal rite thine reaches its ripe result, and comes to its perfect close in Mine. Thou in the lower station, I in the higher, in the Temple of God must fulfil all righteousness.

John testified that the end of his mission was that the Christ should be made manifest to Israel. As characteristic was it of the Baptist's humility that he at once deferred to the will of Jesus, as that he at first had shrunk in the feeling of inferiority. It was not for him to argue, but to obey. We cannot feel our unworthiness too profoundly; but that obtrusive self-depreciation which hinders us from taking God at his simple word, in promise, invitation, or command, is not humility, but presumption. Without a word from the Baptist they descended into the river, and the rite was performed. The pure waters have lavied his sinless body, and the Saviour straightway coming up from the stream stands on the bank in prayer. Deeply significant to us is this, that "while He was praying"—his face towards heaven in intense devotion, as He dedicated himself by fervid vows to the service of God and man, here yielding up the sacrifice of his life to the Father—"the heavens were opened." To the Baptist's eye alone, it is evident, was given that glimpse of the ineffable glory, as through a rift in the blue firmament the golden brightness streamed, and in it the vision of the Holy Spirit gliding earthwards like a dove, and resting on his head. At the instant was heard a voice out of the excellent glory, "THIS IS MY BELOVED SON IN WHOM I AM WELL-PLEASED."

The promised sign is seen at last. For this hour the chosen Harbinger had prayed in the deserts, watched and longed with passionate desire, and now that his eyes have seen the Christ, his ears heard the living voice of the Redeemer, his joy is fulfilled. It is now for him to bear record. "This is He of whom I spake"—to point Him out as he walked unnoticed among men. "Behold the Lamb of God!"

It has been supposed that the symbol under which the descent of the Spirit is portrayed, refers not to the actual form of a dove which he had assumed, but to the manner in which the bright celestial sign seemed to descend, with a soft fluttering motion like a dove,—some glorious apparition like the fiery tongues of Pentecost, lambent or hovering over the Saviour's head. No doubt there is a danger of degrading that which is spiritual by coarse materializing interpretations. But there is a risk of over-refinement on the other hand, leading us to explain away the plain and literal affirmations of Scripture. The testimony of Luke is explicit: "The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape, like a dove, upon him." There seems to be a peculiar congruity in such an emblem being employed. No other could have so impressively shadowed the Saviour's gentleness and the benign spirit of his ministry than this,—the symbol of purity, and harmlessness, and guileless innocence. The Dove of Heaven hovering with calm and spotless wing over his head might well harmonize with the mission of Him who was meek and lowly. It was the visible augury of the words: "He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street: a bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench."*

It is in another point which has been, perhaps, too much overlooked that the special force and appropriateness of the emblem are to be found. The Spirit, when it descended, "remained on Him;" this signifying, that on Him there was to be a tranquil and continuous abiding of the Spirit in all the fulness of heavenly gifts. Thus was He signalized as more illustrious and blessed than all the prophets who had gone before him. On them the Spirit came in abrupt and fitful accessions of inspiration: in trances of mystic vision, or moods of ecstatic utterance,—a sudden excitement of the intellect or imagination followed by a subsidence of the mind to its ordinary human level. But on Him, the divine Man, the Spirit was perpetually to rest. To Him the Spirit was given "without measure." In Him, in sevenfold plenitude of divine illumination, and gracious influence to abide; in every word to speak, in every act to move,—to go forth from Him in silent, equable, never-ceasing operation of power, wisdom, love, and sacred zeal. At this epoch of his earthly life, his spirit rose to its perfect height in all powers and endowments needful for His life of Mediatorship, and at this high level it remained. In Him alone, of all men, has there been an indwelling of the Spirit in such fulness, that of his own will He could impart the gift, dividing to every man severally as he would,—"He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." Henceforward for Him, to the spiritual eye of his disciples the heavens are always to be opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man. "Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity: therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows."

* Spiritus Jesu, spiritus columbina.—Bacon.

Ineffable and blessed co-operation of all the persons of the glorious Trinity in this crisis of stupendous interest to the destinies of men,—the Word made flesh, with His glory veiled beneath the mean investiture, in prayer devoting himself to the work of redemption,—the Father accepting the vow by solemn annunciation,—the Spirit descending and resting on Him in visible seal and attestation of the covenant. Thus was the voice of one crying in the wilderness reverberated by a Voice from the excellent glory. The Christ is come; the gates of the Kingdom of heaven are opened on earth to all believers. On the shore of Israel's sacred stream He stands, wearing our humanity, the lowliest servant God ever had, the only one on whom that eye could rest with an entire and unmingled complacency. The Father is "well-pleased" with him for all that He has done through these thirty years of unblemished obedience. "Well pleased" for His free and single hearted consecration of himself to the work yet before him.

Standing in this gleam of empyreal light, heralded by the greatest of the prophets, greeted by voice and sign from heaven, men might have deemed His was to be a career of splendour and renown, a life of brilliant and unchequered triumph. But He knew well how it was to be,—how life was to put on for him its hardest, sternest visage of endurance. He knew he was to wear on earth the crown of His spiritual kingdom in a knotted wreath of thorns. The voice from heaven, He knew, was meant to cheer him on the threshold of his great enterprise. He girded himself for an arduous service, and with a forecasting glance surveyed the dark and troubled years before him. From the shore of Jordan His first step must be into the desert, to meet the fiercest assaults of the spirit of evil, and thereafter to pass through many a sore night-watch of wrestling with the powers of darkness, wherein He seems to be left alone. This was to be the symbol of His life; thus, through suffering, must it come to its perfect consummation.

Yet once again, when a brief season of heavenly fellowship and rest is given to Him in the holy mount, and the tabernacle of his body becomes transparent through the outshining of the glory from within, is the voice that spoke at Jordan to be heard on earth. Then from Tabor's transient glory it is a descent into the world's wilderness once more, and darker shadows fall upon His path, and as one forgotten, He must go onwards with his yoke of mystic tribulation to Gethsemane and that other baptism of blood. There He must see the heavens closed above him, and no descending sign; the Father's face turned away, and no voice but His own, the wailing cry, "LAMA SÁBATHANI! MY GOD, MY GOD, WHY HAST THOU FORSAKEN ME?" Yet then, in the crisis of His redeeming anguish, unheard in earth and heaven, there is the same response from the heart of the Godhead; the Father looking on the finished Atonement, saith, "THOU ART MY BELOVED SON, IN WHOM I AM WELL PLEASED."

THE WAKING HEREAFTER.

IN the city of Frankfort, of all German cities the most intensely active, is a hotel for the dead. Outside, the population is bustling to and fro with an intensity in singular contrast with the usual German calmness. Here, at this centre of trade, meet the keenest of traders; and here they pass and repass, exchanging a few words, then hurrying on until night comes to give time to recast the speculations of the past day, and to plan the speculations of the next.

In the midst of this intense vitality is the hotel for the dead. Sumptuous beds are there spread. The softest and thickest carpets deaden all noise from the step. A splendid reception does the corpse of the rich man meet as it enters. The host, with his most officious attendants, hurries down to receive the mute clay. Unconscious as it is, it is laid on one of these rich beds, the head propped on a pillow, the body carelessly covered, as if it had just laid down to rest, with an embroidered quilt. By a courteous fiction, this dead man of business, whose once active brain lies so cold and frigid, is supposed to be still alive. All the luxuries of his house are collected about him in this hotel, where he is temporarily sojourning. And in order to enable him to call his attendants when he awakes, his fingers are placed on the keys of an instrument by his bed-side, the slightest pressure of which will sound the alarm.

Yet that alarm has never been given. For twenty years have the rich dead of Frankfort gone to this hotel after their death, yet in these twenty years none of these rich dead have spoken. Busy men were they, with wonderful love of life, and passionate desire for its continuance, which was evidently nothing more than by their treating death as a thing which was only for a short time to stop the rapid current of their activity. "I lie down for a moment," says the dying man, "but only for a moment, and to save time, my hand is kept on the bell, so that the carriage may at once be called, and I can drive straight back to the bank or the counting-house."

But the bell is never rung, and the next carriage that the once busy merchant gets into is the hearse.

Underneath this fiction, however, there is a great truth. A trumpet will sound to proclaim the awakening of that dead body, but it will be a trumpet celestial. This world, even in its most intense shape, thus but proclaims the existence of the next. The merchant will arise, and as he was before death, so will he be after. The same quick, anxious plotting will exist, but in the next world it will be a sad and wretched chase after a phantom, which can never be reached. The treasure will be left in this world, though the pursuit of it will be continued in the next.

Not so with those who lay up their treasures above. To them comes the same awakening, but to a life so different. Thither let our hearts be turned now, so that there those hearts may have rest hereafter.—Episcopal Recorder.

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

"MY JEWELS."

MAL. III. 17.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON, KILBURN.

"MY JEWELS."—The Lord's jewels! Dear children, can you tell us what they are? Did the Lord Jesus wear jewels when He was on earth? No, indeed.—He had not the money to purchase them, and we are not told of His having such things given Him, though we may be sure that He had many gifts from Martha, Mary, and others. Does He then wear jewels now that He is in heaven? They would be of no use; for He is so glorious in Himself that they would look quite dim upon Him, as glow-worms do if you hold them up before the full moon.

But, nevertheless, He has jewels;—there are such things as the Lord's jewels. He speaks of them here.

Again, then, I ask, can you tell us what they are? Let us study the verse before the text. There we read, "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another: and the Lord hearkened, and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon His name." "And they—they shall be mine," saith the Lord, "in that day when I make up my jewels."

Here it is, then. The Lord's jewels are those who "fear Him and think upon His name."

Now, to fear the Lord and think upon His name, is just to be good and holy. Every good and holy person, therefore, is one of the Lord's jewels. No matter what their age; be they fifty, or thirty, or fifteen, or five—if they are truly godly, they are the Lord's jewels.

First, let us ask WHOSE jewels good and holy children are. Are they not their father's and mother's jewels? Perhaps you have heard the story of the Roman matron who came to be presented at court in a common dress, but with two rosy-cheeked, flaxen-haired, blue-eyed boys—one in each hand. When the emperor said to her, rather reproachfully, "Where, madam, are your jewels?" she replied, looking right and left, "May it please your majesty, these are my jewels." That mother loved her children better than any finery; and if she was so proud of them simply because of their handsome faces, how much more must Christian parents rejoice in good and holy children? How exceedingly must they rejoice when they can say of them as a gentleman lately said to me of his daughter, just taken from him, "Sir, she loved righteousness and hated iniquity." What a memorial! Surely such children as these are their parents' jewels. They cherish them as a princess does her rings and necklaces. Happy fathers and mothers! who does not envy them? They may be poor and pitied, but in their children they have a thousand comforts which no gold can buy. Such children will smooth their dying pillows, and bedew their graves with tears, and be their living monuments.

Are they not their minister's jewels?

St. Paul speaks of the Thessalonian Christians as his "joy and crown." He means that their having believed on Christ through his preaching, was the greatest honour he had. It was indescribable happiness to him. He thought also of the moment when he should appear before the throne of God, surrounded by all those whom he had plucked as brands from the burning, saying, "Here am I, and the children whom thou hast given me;" and he knew that he should feel grander then than if he had possessed all the joys and all the crowns of this world.

Now, what St. Paul felt about his Thessalonian converts, every minister and teacher feels about the children whom he has brought to Jesus. They are his jewels. He watches over them, and cherishes and loves them as such. He would not exchange them for royal diadems. "No," he says; "what joy, what crown equal to these—these children who have attended to my instructions, who have put their hands in mine, and allowed me to lead them to the Saviour, and are now growing up to be the future standard-bearers in his army, when I can carry His standard no more?"

But, principally, good and holy children are the Saviour's jewels.

As I said, it is the Lord who is speaking in the text, and He calls them His: "They shall be mine," saith the Lord." You see He claims them for His own. It was He who gave them to parents and ministers, or rather put them under their charge, to be trained for Him. He said to them as Pharaoh's daughter said to Jochebed, "Take this child, and nurse it for me, and I will pay thee thy wages." But when "that day" comes, they shall all be known as the Lord's. They are His jewels; He cannot spare one of them. They are infinitely dear to Him; He would not sell the least of you for anything that Satan could offer. He would send twelve legions of angels to rescue you, if it were necessary. All really good and holy children are Christ's jewels.

But now, secondly, let us ask, WHY does He compare them to jewels?

He might have compared them to flowers—to roses, or lilies; or birds—to doves, or chickens; but He calls them His jewels, and He does so because, like jewels, they are rare, precious, beautiful, imperishable.

Like jewels, good and holy children are rare.

If you wanted a jewel, particularly if you wanted a fine jewel, what trouble you would have to find it! You might, indeed, get it easily enough at a shop, for jewelers buy them up, and keep them for sale; but I mean if you had to look for it yourself, what hard work it would be! You would have to live in a hot and sickly country—you would have to wander up and down rocky mountains and valleys, or dig with a pickaxe in a dark and dismal mine, and even then you might be years before you would discover one worth having—jewels are so rare.

So it is—alas! that it should be so—with His jewels; they are few and far between. Here and there they are mentioned in the Bible—a Samuel, a Josiah, a Timothy. Here and there we meet with them in books—a little “Jane, the cottager,” a little “African Willie,” a little “Bertie.” Here and there we can point them out alive—a boy or girl whose heart is tender; yes, “who fears the Lord and thinks upon His name.” Careless children, thoughtless children, selfish children, children who do as others do—they are as plentiful as minnows in a brook.—We could catch you a netful in five minutes. But where, in our schools, Sunday or week-day—where, in our family circles, are children who can be said to be “born again,” and are growing in grace and in the knowledge of Christ? Do you not agree with me that, like jewels, they are rare?

Again, the Lord compares good and holy children to jewels, because like jewels they are precious.

Jewels—emeralds, and rubies are little things in themselves,—the largest is not larger than an egg; but they are priced at enormous sums of money. The Koh-i-noor diamond, which you may have seen in the Tower, would buy the finest park in the country, the best house in Belgrave Square, furniture, plate, carriages, horses, pictures; and when all these were paid for, there would be thousands of pounds left to live upon.

The Queen's jewels are kept in a double iron cage, with soldiers to guard them. A big ship was once sent over to South America to bring back a single jewel. But what is the value of a stone, however transparent, however richly coloured, when weighed against a good and holy child? Who can tell the intrinsic value of such a child? Men may judge differently, but God gave His own dear Son for it. He prizes it above “the topaz of Ethiopia.” Good and holy children are made white by Christ's blood. They are part of the reward of the “travail of His soul.” “Of such is the kingdom of heaven.” “Their angels do always behold the face of my Father;” and soon they themselves will be with “their angels,” singing, “Glory, glory, glory” to Him! No wonder, then, that they are precious.

Further, The Lord compares good and holy children to jewels, because like jewels they are beautiful.

I have seen jewels which sparkled as our eyes do, they seemed to be alive; or they glitter as stars do on a frosty night, they were so brilliant. And then their splendid hues: orange, blue, crimson, green; put together, they make a perfect blaze.—You could fancy that they were fragments of the rainbow. And are not good and holy children lovely in God's sight? Must they not be beautiful to Him, when He sees that they bear the image of the Saviour, when they are becoming pure as He was, meek and lowly as He was, obedient as He was. Depend upon it, dear children, those who resemble Jesus are as fair in the Lord's sight as the most splendid amethyst is in yours. He rejoices over them with singing. And when He “makes up His jewels,” He will set them (as it were) on His own imperial brow!

Once more. The Lord compares good and holy children to jewels, because they are imperishable.

Jewels may last for ever. There is no reason why the jewels which the Israelites borrowed of their Egyptian oppressors on that dreadful night of the exodus, should not be in existence now. In the British Museum there are jewels which were worn by the Greeks before Christ was born; and others which had been many years buried in Babylon, when St. Matthew was preparing his gospel. A duchess was dressing for an evening party—she had all her jewels spread out on her table; but sad to say, her sleeve caught fire, and she ran about the room shrieking for help. The flames spread to the curtains, and then the whole house was a roaring furnace! It was burned to the ground. When the labourers came to clear away the rubbish, they found nothing of the poor duchess save a handful of black cinders, but there lay her jewels unhurt, except that the gold and silver casings had melted.

So, too, it is with good and holy children. They are imperishable. Their bodies,—their casings, will wear out and return to the dust, but their souls will live on till their bodies are raised again, and then they will be reunited to live together for eternity. “He that believeth on me (says Jesus) shall never die,” that is, they shall pass from their beds of pain to his bosom, and abide blissfully there till the trumpet shall sound! They have already entered upon everlasting life—a life in which they will by-and-by be older than Methuselah was,—a life in which they will by-and-by be millions of years of age. Good and holy children, though they have had but a dozen birthdays so far, are henceforth to live as long as God lives!

In conclusion, What will God do with His jewels?

He will “make them up”—“In that day when I make up my jewels.” Now, “that day” is the day of judgment,—the day when everybody will be seen to be what they actually are. Now, it is possible to deceive both others and ourselves, and now frequently Christ's jewels are hidden from sight, as the loveliest violets and primroses often are hidden in hedges and ditches; but in “that day” there will be no more of this. The-wicked will be unmasked, "and the righteous shall shine forth as the sun." Jesus will declare who are His and who are not. He will reckon His own, as a shepherd reckons his sheep at the end of a weary drive. Having endured agony, and shame, and death for them, and having taken such pains to purify them and fit them for His presence, He will not let Satan hold any of them back from Him.—"Where (He will say) is that missing jewel? Let it be delivered up to me?" He knows them now himself, but in "that day" He will show them to the universe. He will publicly acknowledge them as "the blessed of His Father." "And God shall wipe all tears from their eyes." The jewel shall be undimmed by a single tear.

Beloved children, how about yourselves in "that day"? What is your prospect? Assuredly that day is hastening on to us, and we are hastening on to it. It will arrive, and we shall have to pass through its fiery trial. Then the question will be, "Am I Christ's jewel or not?" Oh, what rapture if you are! Oh, what woe if you are not!

But the same question can be addressed to our consciences now, when we have the opportunity of altering our state. If conscience answers, "You are not amongst the Lord's jewels now," you can cry to Him to help you to become one. His Almighty Spirit can change a flint into flesh. And if so, can you be willing to remain as you are, and die as you are, so that He must say to you, in that day when He is making up His jewels, "Depart from me, I never knew you?"

If you can humbly trust that you are amongst His jewels, then you need not be troubled whatever be your earthly lot. The Lord's jewel! What title can equal that? The Lord's jewel! then depend upon it, His eye is on you, His ear is open to you, and His arm overshadows you. The Lord's jewel! then what can the fiercest foes do to damage you? The Lord's jewel! then in that day when He makes up His jewels, you will certainly behold His glory, and share His glory, ay, and add to His GLORY!

THE STAR IN THE EAST.

A SERMON BY JOHN EDMOND, D.D., LONDON.

"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judaea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him."—MATT. II. 1, 2.

Is the great "book of nature," as the visible creation has been sometimes called, there are three volumes lying open for our study. There is the volume of ocean, the volume of earth, and the volume of the sky. In the last with which we have to do at present (because, so to say, my text was quoted out of it into the page of the New Testament), there are three distinct and wonderful pages. There are the sunny, the cloudy, and the starry heavens. They are all very grand and beautiful, but perhaps the last is the most admirable to look at of them all. The colour of this page is a lovely azure, and the letters printed on it are glittering and golden. God made it and printed it with his own hands. A great many people at different times, and with different feelings and objects, have read from this book of the nocturnal heavens. You may have heard of two little boys who had looked into it, and were one day talking with each other about what they saw there. Their names might be John and James. We shall call them so. James was the first speaker. He said to his companion, "What do you think the stars are?" John's reply was that he did not know, unless they were the heads of brazen nails driven into the great ceiling of the world. "I do not think so," said James in answer, quickly, "I think they rather are gimlet holes in the blue heavens, letting the glory from above shine through." That was a fine conception, though a boy's, and not correct as to fact. The stars, however, do shine in God's light, and show his glory. David says so in the nineteenth Psalm; and there, and in other psalms, he lets us see that he was in the habit of reading in God's great book over his head. I think when he was a shepherd lad, keeping his father's flock on the plains of Bethlehem, he studied it with wonder and delight. He saw God's greatness shining there, and he drew from it a lesson of humility and adoration. He says, "When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained, What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him?" Astronomers in our own day study the skies, to find out wonderful things in them. What they have told us as the result of their search into this golden book is very strange and grand. There were astronomers also long ago, but they had not such good helps to read the book clearly, and they did not find out so much. And there were others, who were called astrologers, men of star-science, that studied the stars for very foolish purposes. They were either silly or knavish. They pretended to find out from the stars what kind of life, fortunate or unfortunate, each person was to lead. Some think the wise men of the East were astrologers, but there is no evidence of this, and I believe they were better taught. They were astronomers, very probably; and what is curious, they did for once find out what had happened at a distance, from looking at the stars. For once, we might say, there was a true astrology; a star came out one night before the eyes of those wise men, which brought them a message from God. This is what I am going to talk about with you at present. I shall arrange what I have got to say under four heads. I shall ask these questions about this star:—

- I. What was it?
- II. Who saw it?
- III. What said it?
- IV. Whither led it?

Or let us suppose that you ask me these questions, and I shall try to answer them. You ask, then, about this star,—

I. What was it?

Astronomers tell us of different sorts of stars. There are planets, for example. These are wandering stars. This does not mean that they have lost their way, or are without a guide, but simply that they move about in the sky, and are seen, at different times, in different places of it. They have a path, and God leads them in it; and they are so near to us, that we can see how they move about. One of them is well known by most people to be at one time an evening star shining in the west, and at another a morning star seen in the eastern heavens. Now these planets are sister worlds of our own globe. You might call them the family of the sun. Then there are fixed stars. These, probably, move also in the way God makes for them, but they are so far away from us, that they appear to our eye to be always in the same place. These do not belong to the sun's family. They are supposed to be suns themselves. If you wish, just by looking at them, to know them from the few planets you can see at any time among them, this simple rule would help you. Planets shine steadily—fixed stars twinkle. It must have been to one of these that the child is made to say, in the pretty little hymn you know,—

"Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
How I wonder what you are;
Up above the world so high,
Like a diamond in the sky."

Then there are comets,—that is, stars with hair. They are called so because, besides having a round body, like other stars, they send out from it a brush or stream of light. When this goes before them, they are bearded stars. When it follows them, it is called their tail. They are only seen now and then in the sky. You may call them servants in the sun's great household. They run on far errands. There is still another class. We call them shooting, or falling stars, because they run or shoot across the sky, or come down, as if they were indeed stars falling. These are not worlds at all, but some kind of matter lighted up in the high air, and soon burning out. Now, the star the wise men saw could not be one of any of these classes. "How do you know that?" you say; "you did not see it?" No, certainly. "Nor does Matthew say what it was?" He does not; but he tells us what it did, and that helps us to find out what, at least, it was not. After the wise men saw it, you remember, it disappeared; then after they came to Jerusalem it met them again, and came and stood over the house where the young child was. None of the stars, properly so called, could do that. Neither could what the wise men saw be a shooting meteor; for it was steady. What, then, was it? I will tell you a curious fancy some have had. You know on the night Jesus was born, an angel appeared over the plains of Bethlehem, to tell the shepherds; and a multitude of the heavenly host sang praises to God about his nativity. Now, some say the wise men far in the East saw the shining of this troop of angels as if it was a star. That is a pretty fancy, but it is no more. Well, then, what was the star? After all, I can only say it was a star-like light sent from God. But if any of you should say, "I think it would be the lamp of an angel," I shall not say that you are wrong. I think it very likely that an angel kindled it, and put it out, and lighted it again. But this alone we know certainly, it was star-like, and it came from God. You ask, again,—

II. Who saw it?

They are called wise men from the east. They were in the east when they saw the star. They did not see the star in the eastern part of the sky. It was probably in the west, away toward the land of Judea. I am not going to talk with you about what was the country where these magi stayed. Some learned men say, Arabia—others Persia. I think the latter are right. We shall not stay to discuss the matter. But notice several things about them. They were wise men. They were learned men. They knew science. And they were not poor men. They were not kings, indeed, as they have sometimes been represented, but they were rich. We see this from the gifts they brought. God sent angels to humble shepherds,—but he also sent a star to great people. Jesus is needed by the rich as well as the poor. The Queen's children need him as really as you do. He is willing to save the rich as well as the poor, and the poor as well as the rich. Then these wise men were Gentiles. They did not belong to the Jewish nation. For Christ, whose star they saw, was to come a Saviour for the whole world. I do not know if any little child may be hearing me who is not a Gentile, but a Jewish child. Christ, I would say to that child, loves you all the same. All are one in him. The wise men, you will observe, got a sign suitable to their profession. God likes to fit things into one another. Suppose these men had been shepherds, he might have said to them, "When your staves begin to bud, and have leaves like a tree, Christ is born." What a supposition, you say. But a thing like this once happened. You remember how Aaron's rod blossomed. These men, however, being men of learning, astronomers accustomed to read the stars, God gave them a star-sign. Observe, finally, they were good men. They knew the true God. But how could that be? I will tell what I have seen, and it will help you to understand. I have seen trees growing on the face of steep rocks. I know a little church, near the base of Scottish hills of romantic beauty. I see it now in my mind's eye. It is fallen into decay, and is in great part a ruin, but the spire still stands. Well, when I passed it lately, I saw a little tree growing out of the spire, rooted in one of its crevices. How could the tree get there? Man did not plant it as gardens are planted. No, but God bade some bird or wind carry the seed. So the Jews had truths like seeds sown in a field, of roots of trees planted in a garden. But among the Gentiles also there were sowers of truth, like the breezes and the birds. The captivity of Judah was a means to this sowing. A great many Jews did not go back when the captivity was restored. Some of them grew heathens; but some of them taught the heathens how to love the true God. Daniel taught the wise men of Babylon a higher wisdom than they had known before. The third question about the star was,—

III. What said it?

Now, you may be ready to exclaim, You don't mean to say that the star spoke. No, certainly; not with a voice which went in at the ear. But there are other ways of speaking than that. When you get a letter enclosed in an envelope with a black border, does not the sable rim of the paper tell you a sad story. When you read a book it speaks to your soul. A well-known missionary tells a story which illustrates this. He was working one day at a distance from his house, and he wanted a hatchet to do something. His wife was at home; and taking up a bit of wood, he wrote two or three words on it. He then gave it to one of the natives. He knew nothing of writing, but he carried the chip of timber to the missionary's wife. She read the words, and then gave the messenger the hatchet that was wanted. The man started in perfect astonishment, and then he took hold of the bit of wood, and put it to his ear to listen if it was a speaking thing. Fifty or sixty years ago the people of this country were afraid of invasion. So they piled up wood on the hill-tops along the coast, that when the foe came, the beacon-fires might be lighted and send the news far inland. Now, the star spoke in this way. God had said to these men beforehand, When you see a new star, in a particular place, you will know that Jesus is born. You know a country, on the banner of which are stars, symbols of states. This star said, that Jesus who was born, would be a high and glorious king. This was what the star said. The King of the Jews is born. Then, though born in a stable, Jesus was a king. Yes, so he is. He is the king of heaven. The king of the Jews he was not, in the sense of being crowned in Jerusalem,—the only crown he got there was one of thorns. But he is king of the people of God; he rules in the hearts of men. He does this in all ages. His throne is in the sky. You will see it one day when it is set for judgment in the heavens. I hope you may see it also, when he sits on it in glory in the new Jerusalem, and when the crystal river of life flows out of it. Ask, finally, about this star,—

IV. Whither led it?

Here the answer is. It led them to Jesus. The star was not Jesus. It was a sign of him, and a guide to him. It did not, indeed, go with them all the way; for God does not waste wonders, and the wise men could get the way to Jerusalem without a heavenly guide. But when they needed one, then the star shone out again. In this the star is like all the messengers of God. They come to lead us to himself. The Bible is a star to lead to Jesus. Ministers are stars to lead to Jesus. John the Baptist, like the morning-star before the day, came to foreshow Jesus, and wake men to receive him. Every preacher of the gospel has a similar work. Ministers are angels of the Church. Sabbath-school teachers are stars. This service is a star to guide to Jesus. Shall it succeed with any of you? Some of you have gone to him already, and given him your hearts. That is right. The wise men offered gifts. He asks from you first your hearts, then your lives. Will you love him? Will you sing of him? Will you serve him?

Having thus told you about the star in the east which informed the wise men that Jesus was born; having told you what it was, who they were that saw it, what it said to them, and how it led them to Jesus;—I shall close with two advices, which put together, make a sort of couplet.

1. Believe the star, and you will get a star.

2. Be like the star, and you will be a star.

1. Believe the star, and get a star.

Believe it, that is, trust in the King of whose birth it told. Follow it to the place where Jesus is. Do as the wise men did, go to the King and worship. If you do so, you will have share in this promise given to them that overcome, "I will give him the morning-star." Jesus himself, who is the bright and Morning-star, will be yours, and you will reign with Him, like the leader of stars, for ever and ever.

2. Be like the star, and be a star.

That is, strive to guide others to Jesus. Light your little lamps of persuasion, and example, and prayer, and seek to save others. If you live for such a purpose as this, you will not live in vain. And when Jesus comes to take His people all home to Himself, you will have part in the fulfilment of that promise, "They that be wise shall shine with the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever."

A LITTLE THING.

A CHILD'S SONG.

I AM but a little thing;
Can my feeble cry,
Piercing through creation's din,
Reach the vaulted sky?

I am but a little thing,
As a mote might be,
Floating in a cloud of dust,
To eternity.

I am but a little thing,
As a grain of sand,
Lost amid the countless grains
Of old ocean's strand.

Hush, my heart! Little things
Thou canst not define;
God alone can tell if works,
Great or small, be thine.

He who rolls the worlds above,
Sees the sparrow fall,
Clothes the lilies of the field,
Loves and cares for all.

He has given thy work to thee,
Though we cannot tell
How great it be—it matters not,
Only do it well.

TRUE FRIENDS.

"HARRY, who did you part from at the gate just now?"

"Tom Kennedy, papa."

"And who is Tom Kennedy?"

"O papa, do you not know him? he is one of my great friends."

"A great friend! that is a strong expression. How long has he been this to you?"

"Let me see,—ever since he came here, that is more than two months ago. We were friends at once."

"Indeed! There must have been something very delightful about him to whom you feel friendship on so short an acquaintance. Tell me what it was; what there is in Tom which makes him so attractive to you."

"Oh, he is such a fine, funny fellow!"

"A fine, funny fellow,—I do not quite know what you mean by that."

"Papa, why are you so serious? Let me go for my books now."

"Not yet, Harry; I wish to give you another kind of lesson in the first place. I am serious, because it is a serious matter to choose a friend, and I fear you have not thought enough about it when you chose Tom Kennedy. Remember, I am speaking of him as a great friend, to use your own words, not an ordinary companion. A fine, funny fellow may do well enough for the last, to be sure."

Harry sat down, looking rather uncomfortable. "Well, papa, do you not wish me to have friends?"

"There is nothing which I should so much desire for you, my dear son, as a faithful, true friend. God has no greater blessing to bestow upon earth. But I wish you to have a better idea of what the thing really is about which I have often heard you speak so lightly. For Tom is not the first great friend you have had. What has become of Frank Wilson, whom you were so intimate with last year?"

"Papa, you know Frank was found out to be a bad boy, and you and mamma were both very glad when he left school."

"And James Ross?"

Harry coloured. "Oh, if you knew how I was taken in by him!"

"But were not they both your 'great friends' in their day?"

Harry was silent.

"Well, many have been deceived and disappointed before you, in those whom they loved and trusted. But such experience must surely have taught you wisdom. Your new friend, at all events, you will have studied and tested before you admitted him into your heart. For true friendship we ought to consider as a sacred relationship, a tie not to be lightly either formed or broken. Other relations are often imposed upon us by birth, and circumstances over which we have no control; this must be of our own choice. What should be the first thing we look for in the person we wish to make our friend?"

Harry had been piously instructed. He answered, after slight hesitation, "I suppose, papa, he ought to be a Christian."

"Yes, if we are real Christians ourselves, we shall surely find little pleasure in the society of those who cannot feel along with us on the subject nearest and dearest to our heart. We should tremble at the idea of loving any such warmly on earth, and then, whenever death approached, feeling that we must separate for ever. Our life here is so short, so uncertain, that no ties of affection seem worth forming which will not last beyond the grave. Besides, to speak of this world alone, I believe that nothing short of religious principle can give real strength and value to character, so as to make a man to be depended upon as a true friend. Well, how does Tom stand this test? Is he a good boy?"

"Papa, we never spoke about religion."

"That is strange, if you are both in earnest about it. Yet deeds are often better than words. You must have some idea how Tom spends his Sabbaths, how he values the Bible, how he thinks and speaks of the true people of God."

"O papa," said the boy hastily, "I am afraid neither Tom nor I feel as we ought to do about these things."

His father laid his hand gravely upon his head. "That is a sad and solemn admission, my son. Think over it when you are alone,—think over it on your knees before God. Then we must no longer consider this subject of friendship from the Christian point of view. We must talk of it only in connection with this short life, and leave the eternity to come out of the question. Well, let it be so. Here is a test which a mere worldly man can apply. If I think of making any one my friend, I should first inquire how he has discharged other duties and relationships. If he has been an undutiful son, an unkind brother, an unfaithful servant, or a harsh master, I have no good reason to expect that he will prove a true and tender friend. I must know him in his own home before I take him to my heart. What do you know of Tom's home conduct? I believe his father died last year, but he has a mother in delicate health and a young sister. Is he dutiful, and gentle, and anxious as far as possible to make up to them their sad loss, at least to be their comforter under it?"

"I have hardly seen him at home."

But you must know something of how he acts towards his mother?"

"Indeed, papa, when I think of it, I am afraid he thinks more of his own wishes and his own will than of hers."

"Ah, Harry! a boy who is not the best comfort of his widowed mother will never be much of a comfort to his friend. I shall only give you one other test at present, and it shall be a scriptural one. A friend, one worthy of the name, 'loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity.' The love worth possessing is that on which we can always depend, which will cheer us in the days of sorrow, sickness, misfortune, when the world looks cold upon us, and our hearts are sad and weary. Now, could you trust Tom for this? Would the 'fine, funny fellow,' who is so pleasant a companion in your school games or evening rambles, have come to weep with you last year, when we were all in sorrow, or sat by you, day after day, when you were confined by your sprained ankle to the sofa, as Cousin Ellen did? You did not know him then, but would you expect such comfort from him now?"

Harry coloured again and looked very thoughtful.

"No, Tom is not the boy, I think, who would do that."

"Then call him a pleasant acquaintance, if you like, but not a great friend. Keep that sacred title for those whose love has been tested and proved, on whom you can trustfully lean in the days of adversity, and with whom you hope to share for ever the blessed services and communion of heaven."

J. L. B.

OUR "GOLD DUST."

"First, I am going to write to my mother," said Thomas, with his eye on the clock, parcelling out Wednesday afternoon; "next, two hours' play; next, come in and study my algebra lesson; after supper, go and hear that man lecture on Africa." Did he? for boys as well as men make capital plans, which they do not always execute.

No sooner said than Tom took his writing materials, and sat down to write. There was a great hurrah in the street, but he never got up to look out. He went once for the Dictionary to learn how a word was spelled. "Do you care when you are only writing home?" asked one of Tom's cousins who was waiting for him. "I always care," answered Tom. The letter was finished, well done for a boy of his age, in about three-quarters of an hour, and he was ready to be off. And so the afternoon was filled out as promptly as that letter was filled up. That is a specimen of Tom.

"Uncle," said Tom one day, "it seems to me your things don't look as well as they might." They were in the garden, and "the things" the boy had his eye on were the currant bushes.

"I don't suppose they do," replied his uncle; "I'm no great hand at a garden. But what can you improve?"

"I can try on the currants," said Tom. "They want to be trimmed out, and the old wood cut off, and the right suckers trained. Don't you ever dig around them, and put ashes on the roots?"

His uncle never had done one of these things; did not know they ought to be done. He thought, he said, currants took care of themselves.

"But they can be cared for," said Tom, "and do all the better."

"Suppose you try, boy," said his uncle.

Tom's uncle gave him a home for two years to attend the High School and prepare for college, and that gave him time to try the bushes. In the autumn he dug round their roots, pulled up the grass, separated the large old bushes, and put out new ones. It took time, but he tugged hard at it. In the spring he loosened the soil, laid on coal ashes, watched the young shoots, kept some, and cut down others. His uncle did not believe much would come of it; but he had reason to change his mind. Much did come of it. All at once, it seemed to him, for time goes fast to an old man, his bushes were loaded with fruit, fine large currants, such as his garden had not seen for many a day, if ever before. People, when they walked in the garden, exclaimed, "What splendid currants you have!"

"That boy knows how to take care of his gold dust," said his uncle often to himself, and sometimes aloud.

Tom went to college, and every account they heard of him, he was going ahead, laying a solid foundation for the future.

"Certainly," said his uncle, "certainly. That boy, I tell you, knows how to take care of the gold dust."

"Gold dust!" where did Tom get gold dust? He was a poor boy. He never was a miner. Where did he get gold dust? Ah, he had the seconds and the minutes, and these are the "gold dust" of time—specks and particles of time, which boys, and girls, and grown-up people are so apt to waste and throw away. Tom knew their value. His deceased father, a poor minister, had taught him that every speck and particle of time was worth more than gold; and his son took care of them, as if they were. He never spent them foolishly, but only in good bargains; "for value received" was stamped on all he passed away.

It is a mistake to suppose the miners and the mints have all the "gold dust." You, children, have some,—some of infinitely greater value than the richest mines can yield. God does not give it to you in gold bars, a day, a month, a year long; nobody can be trusted with so much time all at once; but God wisely deals it out in seconds and minutes, so that you can make the most of it. If you are robbed of one, or lose it, the loss is comparatively small. It cannot, to be sure, ever be made up; the whole world cannot ever make up for a minute lost; but if it teach you to be thoughtful and careful of the rest, you will by-and-by be rich with the golden years of a useful and happy life.

Take care of your "gold dust," children.

KITTY.

"Oh, dear!" said Kitty Brown, "I wish I could go to school like Lucy! I am so tired staying at home all day with nobody but the cat to play with; and then I hate to say the letters to mamma. I know it would be nice to go to school and read in a class!"

So Kitty pouted and looked quite miserable.

By-and-by when she was tired of pouting she came along to her play-house, and saw the doll's tea-table standing in the middle of the play-house parlour.

"Why, Geraldine!" said she, taking up the black doll she played was the servant; "how careless of you to leave the tea-table standing all night! I shall have to send you away without a 'character.' I shall, truly."

Then she began to talk in another tone, pretending to be Geraldine, and to say what a headache she had, and how she broke her arm, and was threatened with whooping-cough and typhoid fever, so she could not work.

By this time Kitty had forgotten she was not the happiest little girl in the world, and she was so engaged with her numerous family of dolls, that for an hour she never remembered it once. Then she was tired of playing, and so she began to fret again, and wish she could go to school.

It is always easy to find some trouble to think about if one tries, and day after day, and week after week, and month after month, Kitty kept herself discontented about the matter of going to school, when she was not too busy at play to think of it.

At last a long, long year had gone by, and the blue violets and trailing arbutus had come again by the brook, and by this time Kitty had grown older and stronger, so her mother sent her to school with her cousin Lucy.

Now, I suppose you will think she must be very happy, but she carried the same little uneasy heart along, and so she still had a trouble.

It was so dull to have to read in a primer all the time, and sit on the low seats. Oh, dear! If she could only sit by the window where Lucy did, and read in the Third Reader! And how she wished she didn't have to wear high-necked aprons, and to have her hair braided!

So she sighed and looked abused every time she thought of any of these things that she imagined kept her from being one of "the great girls."

One day her father said to a gentleman who was visiting him, "This is my baby," as he introduced Kitty. She did not show a very pleasant face as he came up to shake hands; and as soon as the gentleman stopped speaking with her, she ran into her bedroom and locked the door, then flew around there as though she had the jumping toothache.

"Oh, what made father say so! I don't want that hateful man to know I am the youngest. I wish he thought I had ten brothers and sisters smaller than I am! I wish he never had come here!" Then the silly creature began to cry, and when the dinner-bell rang she had such red eyes she was not fit to come to the table.

Poor Kitty! She is always willing to hold her aunt's silk and thread her grandmother's needle; she will run errands without looking cross at all, even though she is doing something she doesn't like to leave, and she is just the best nurse for her mother, when she has a headache, you ever saw.

Then she asks God every day to forgive everything she does that is wrong, and to help her to be like the patient, holy Christ.

But I fear she scarcely knows what these words mean; that she has never thought that God cares for what she deems such little things, and that fretting about what we cannot help is finding fault with him. So she has not learned to try to stop thinking about anything that does not please her, and thinking of any trouble only makes it the harder to bear, you know.

The violets have come and gone so many times, that Kitty is old enough to sit in the back seat at school, to wear short aprons, and to have her hair braided, besides reading in the first class at last. Do you suppose she is contented now? Oh, no! of course not! She thinks she should be, though, if she could wear a large cameo pin, and live in style as her aunt Kate does.

O Kitty! Kitty! You never will be happy till you can say this lesson which God has put for you and for us all, "For I have learned whatsoever things I have, therewith to be content."—Independent.

A SHORT RULE FOR FRETTERS.

A LITTLE girl has been visiting me who was a fretter. She fretted when it rained, and fretted when it shone. She fretted when little girls came to see her, and fretted when they did not. It is dreadful to be a fretter. A fretter is troublesome to herself and troublesome to her friends. We, to be sure, have our trials; but fretting does not help us to bear or get rid of them.

I have lately come across a short rule for fretters, which they shall have. Here it is, Never fret about what you can't help, because it won't do any good. Never fret about what you can help; because, if you can help it, do so. Say this when you get up in the morning, say it at noon, and say it at night; and not only say, but do; and that will be, do not fret at all—a fine doing.

"But we have our trials," the children say. Yes, you have, and your little trials are as hard to bear as our big ones. But fretting don't help them, nor wishing we were somewhere else, or somebody else, or dwelling upon them until they look a great deal bigger than they really are. Did you ever see that fable about the toad and the plantain-leaf?

A toad used to live under a stone beside the brook. He was a pretty fat toad, and got along in the world as well as toads generally do. One day he went out to find something to eat, and hopping out among the green leaves by the creek's side, he heard a rustle among the leaves. He said to himself, "There's a beetle! I like beetles. I'll be quiet and catch him." So he crept along till he got to it, and stuck out his tongue to get him; but it happened to be a bumble-bee! He dropped it like a hot coal, and had to cry out in the way toads cry, and hop back to his hole under the stone. He suffered with the pain, and his tongue swelled up, and he was obliged to lie by for two or three days. Hopping back to his home, he plucked a leaf of the plantain, and took it home for his medicine, and put it in his mouth to cure the sting of the bee. He stayed at home for two or three days, and began to get hungry, and poor, and lean. As he hopped along, he came under the leaf of a plantain, and being very tired and hungry, he stopped under the leaf, and looking up, said, "Oh, what a nice time you plantains have! I should like to change places. Toads have a hard life."

The plantain said, "Friend toad, I should like to change too. I don't see what toads can complain of. I think they must have a fine time of it."

"Let me tell you," said the toad. "In the first place, we have to work for our living, and find all we get to eat; and sometimes, when we think we are going to get a beetle, we get a bumble-bee. Then, again, in winter time we get frozen up, and when we come out the boys come along and stone us, and the crows pick us up; isn't that trouble? while you plantains have just to sit by the river, and don't have to work. I should like to change places with you."

"Stop; let me tell you my side," cried the plantain. "We cannot hop about as you can, but have to stay where we are put. If we want a drink of water, we can't go to the creek and get it. We can't move an inch to go and see the world and visit our next neighbour. Then, the sun shines hot all day, and we have to bear it, and can't hop under a cool leaf as you do. Then, by-and-by, comes along a cow and nips off our head, or a little worm, and eats into our heart, and we have not power to shake him off. I should like to change places with you. You take mine and I will take yours; for I am so anxious to hop down to the creek and get a drink."

"Stay, stay," cried the toad, "I hear a cricket. Let me get it;" and off he went after the cricket, and never came back.

So it appears everybody does have trials; and the only right way of getting along is not to wish ourselves somebody else, and fret ourselves because we are not, but contentedly bear our lot, and be satisfied with what God has given us.—Child's Paper.

BIRDIE GOING TO BED.

WHEN the sun has left the skies,
Birdie knows 'tis time for sleep;
Gaily to his nest he flies,
No late hours will ever keep.

Never does the birdie say,
When it comes his time for rest,
"I don't want to leave my play,"
And go pouting to his nest.

Birdie sings his evening lay;
God he praises in his song:
He is happy all the day,
Never doing what is wrong.

Birdie hides his little head,
Softly pillowed on his breast;
Rests he without care or dread,
By our heavenly Father blest.

Little children, how do you,
When has come your hour for rest?
Do you fret, make great ado,
Whine and cry, when you're undrest?

Do you close your little eyes,
With no thanks for tender care
To your Father in the skies,
Thoughtless of your evening prayer?

If you do, hear birdie say,
"Let no murmuring sounds be heard."
Children ne'er forget to pray;
Learn this lesson from the bird.

THE RIGHT AND THE WRONG WAY OF DOING RIGHT.

"I'm thankful to see you minding your books so, Johnnie," said a poor, anxious mother to a bright-looking boy who shared the small table and dim lamp with her.

Johnnie used to like to be out in the evenings; now he stayed at home and studied, or tried to study. "Because we've got the right master now," said he; "he knows the right way of doing right; that's what some folks don't. The master before, he didn't."

"Right way of doing right," said his mother; "I didn't know there was a wrong way of doing right: right is right."

Johnnie looked into the flame of the lamp, puzzled. "Yes," he said at last, "I think there is, mother, a wrong way of doing right. I see it as plain as can be."

"Tell me," said his mother.

Johnnie looked as if he did not quite want to tell all that was in his mind, but presently he did. "Mr.

Jones, our last master," he went on to say, "thrashed me for being idle, and escaping my lessons, and playing truant; and he ought to have thrashed me, I deserved it, I know that; but he did it as if he didn't care; and so I didn't care. I always said to myself, 'Thrash away, old fellow.' He did it as if he was angry, and that made me angry. I used to get so mad with him. I felt his smarting on my back, but it was only skin-deep; I didn't feel any sore or sorry place here," said Johnie, putting his hand on his heart. "Then Mr. Jones went, and Mr. Day came. The boys saw in his eye they'd like him. Well, I was at my old tricks again, and after a while he had to thrash me. I wouldn't take another for anything. He felt so sorry, that what should I do but feel sorry too. I felt awfully. I said to myself, 'What a rascal you are to hurt Mr. Day's feelings so;' and, mother, I try to be a good boy in school now. I try hard, real hard. Don't you see, mother, Mr. Day does right the right way?"

His mother did indeed; and she said sorrowfully, "Yes, Johnie, I do,"—sorrowfully, for she began to be afraid lest she, too, had not always done right the right way. A great many may feel afraid so likewise.

One day two little girls got into a violent quarrel. Mary snatched Jane's doll, and Jane struck Mary in the face! Their mother parted them, and tried to settle it. She told Mary to ask Jane's forgiveness, and to kiss and make up, and be two loving little sisters. They did as their mother bid them, but they did it pouting. The spirit of penitence and forgiveness does not speak with pouting lips or walk with unwilling feet; and these were the feet with which Mary and Jane went towards each other. So there was no true making up, and the consequence was, as soon as their mother's back was turned, the old dispute revived, and they began to quarrel as bad as before. You see they did right the wrong way.

One day there was a loud outcry under our window. We looked out to see what the matter was. A little girl was sprawling on the pavement.

"You ran against me, and pushed me down, you, Sarah Barnes, you!" bellowed the child angrily; "I'll tell your mother, and you'll get a thrashing."

Sarah Barnes stopped and went back. She was evidently going somewhere in a hurry, and had not minded where she went. "I didn't mean to," said Sarah; "I am very sorry;" and she began to lift the little girl up.

"You shan't touch me!" cried the child.

"Lizzie, dear, I didn't mean to," said Sarah Barnes sweetly; "and it was naughty in me not minding. I'm real sorry. Do let me brush the dust off your dress."

Her voice was so kind, there was no resisting her; so the little girl consented to be helped up, and have the dirt shaken off.

"Shan't I lead you home, Lizzie?" said Sarah Barnes.

"No, thank you," replied the little girl, quite comforted, "I'm not hurt a bit."

Sarah then kissed her, and the little girl kissed Sarah back, and each went on their way cheerily as before. Sarah Barnes, you see, had the right way of doing right.

There are a good many parts to right doing. It is like a machine; the wheels sometimes grate on each other, and do not run smooth. They need oiling. What shall we oil them with? The oil of love. That makes the right way of doing right.

BABY'S FIRST PLAYTHING.

WHEN baby Lizzie woke from her morning nap, she found a beautiful plaything. It had often been in her cradle before, though she had never noticed it. What could it be? It was her little hand. She looked at it, turned it over and back again, closed the tiny fingers, and bent the little wrist as if she was quite used to doing so. Who taught her to do this? God, who made it, taught her how to contract each muscle and bend each little joint. Soon she found that she had two of these pretty playthings. First one, then the other, then both together attracted her attention. As she grew older, the little hands grew too. In a few weeks she found she could lay hold of other playthings, and by the aid of her little dimpled arm, could bring them near her.

Lizzie has had many new playthings, but she has never had anything half so beautiful as the hand that God made for her. Little children, look among your toys. Has man made anything that is in every way perfect as the hands with which God has furnished you? How skilfully they are made. Can you not move them at your will? Do you not control the joints and muscles and little bones of which they are made, so that they all work together, serving you faithfully, whether at work or play? These hands, so curiously made, are God's workmanship, and are given you for good, and not for evil doing. Let them be often engaged in healthful, vigorous play, that they may grow strong and active, ready for greater service as you grow older. If ever raised in anger, say to yourself, God gave me these little hands. Shall they disobey him, and break his golden rule? Oh, no; let them not disobey their Maker. Let them ever be engaged in doing good. However small, they may do something for those about you, something for God. To him you are accountable for all that they do. To have good hands you must have good hearts, made white and clean by the blood of Christ.

A RECKLESS BOY.

IN one of our large cities was an orphan boy named Johnie. His parents died, and he was left alone in the world. A poor woman took him, from whom he often received most cruel treatment.

While playing in front of this cheerless home one Sunday morning, the voice of a kind lady fell on his ear,—

"Would you like to go to the Sabbath school?"

His eye beamed with curious delight as he replied, "Yes; but I've no clothes to wear."

"Come just as you are," said the lady.

"Will you take me with you?" asked Johnie.

"Yes, yes," was the answer. "Come now."

Johnie went; but it was a strange place to him, for although he had lived to the age of twelve in a great city where church spires rise from almost every square, he had never been inside a church, never heard the story of Jesus and his love for children. Johnie stared around at the pictures and cards which hung on the walls; but he could not read them, and knew not what they meant. The singing pleased him; but he talked and laughed till all eyes were turned upon him,—and confused, he sank under the seat to hide himself. Every Sabbath found Johnie in his place; but, sad to say, no impression seemed made on his mind. He was very troublesome, disturbing all around him, and bold and reckless in his mischief, till he exhausted the tact and energy of his teacher. He was often reproved; but it seemed of no avail, and it was thought best for the school that Johnie should stay at home.

So the next Sabbath Johnie was locked up at home. This he thought very cruel, and as he saw the children assembling and heard their songs, he could not be restrained. Carefully raising his window, he jumped to the ground, and soon made his appearance at the Sabbath school, creeping in on his hands and knees during prayer-time. Coming towards the friend who had first guided his steps thither, he exclaimed,—

"I want to be in your class. I'll be very good."

As my class was small, I directed all my questions and remarks to him, and in this way Johnie was diverted till the close of the lesson, when I related the story of Moses. This pleased him, and he was anxious I should tell a long story every Sunday. I consented, in case he was quiet and good.

Here was the turning-point. From this time he came regularly; he learned to read, was orderly and well-behaved. A prize was offered to the pupil who would bring into the school the greatest number of scholars in a month. Need I tell you that Johnie took the prize? He brought in many boys that scholars and teachers could not reach. Yes, the boy once so mischievous and uncontrollable, was the one who accomplished the most good in winning bad boys and young men from their Sabbath-breaking, and inducing them to join the Sabbath school.

One old man, who had long been vainly entreated to come by teachers and superintendent, was interested by the descriptions given by this ignorant little child, and came trembling to see and to hear for himself. He has learned to read, and is now, as we hope, an humble follower of Jesus.

A BRAVE GIRL.

THERE are not so many brave girls in these days as there ought to be: We have been watching, and this is the conclusion to which we have come. Many of them are real cowards—they are afraid to keep on the side of truth. They may not be afraid of the dark, nor of dogs, and spiders, but they are afraid to do what they know is right.

There was Hattie Stone, a bright eyed, intelligent, sprightly, lovable creature, sitting by her mother who was trimming her winter bonnet with gay ribbons and beautiful feathers, when Nellie Larkin, one of her play-mates called.

"Is that your bonnet?" inquired Nellie.

"Yes," replied Hattie. "Isn't it pretty?"

"It is very pretty indeed, I think," answered Nellie.

"Mine is a poor looking thing beside that."

"Are you not going to have a new one?"

"No; mother says my old one must do this winter with a little repairing, and I think it will myself."

"You will be the only girl in the church with an old bonnet on," continued Hattie, "and that will make you feel badly."

"No, it will not make me feel badly at all," said Nellie. "I like your new bonnet very much, and at the same time I am contented with my old one."

"Well, I should be afraid that people would laugh at me when everybody else had new bonnets," responded Hattie. "I want to look as well as the rest."

"Mother says it is cowardly to be afraid of what people will say about us if we are doing what we know is right."

"Then there are a good many cowards in the world," said Hattie, "and I suppose I am one. But you mean to be brave and wear your old bonnet," and Hattie smiled as she said it, for she was evidently amused by Nellie's idea of bravery.

"I don't think it is necessary to be very brave to wear a last year's bonnet," replied Nellie. "I am sure that it is not a great cross to me, although I don't like to be laughed at any better than you do. My mother says she can't afford a better one, and that is enough to make me satisfied with what I have."

Now Nellie really did not know that she was a brave girl in deciding to wear the bonnet that she had worn for a year. But she was the bravest girl in the neighbourhood. Hattie, poor little mincing coward, was afraid somebody would laugh at her, if she did not have a bonnet as gay as a peacock's tail, and be in the height of fashion. She had no courage to say, "Let others think as they please, I shall do what my mother thinks is best." Poor weak thing! How much nobler is Nellie, who dares to follow her mother's counsels though she may not appear quite so fashionable! And yet how many thousands are there who always stop and ask, What will be thought of this or that? What will Mrs. A. or Jemima B. say about me if I do thus and so? not having courage to do right even, lest some one should laugh or sneer.

Ah, children! first be right—make sure of this—and then a sneer should be a small matter. God's eye is both on you and on those who laugh at you. To which does he say, "Well done, good and faithful servant?"

HANNAH'S MITTENS.

ALL day long the old grandmother sat in her high-backed chair by the sunny south window, where the honey-suckle and the sweet brier peeped in, and where pussy loved to watch the flies humming about her head as she lay in the warm light.

Fast flew the shining needles, and pussy eyed the bright red ball of yarn, waiting for it to drop, and the grandmother looked pleased as her work progressed, for she was knitting a pair of mittens for little Hannah.

Only yesterday night the poor child had cried with pain over her little red hands when she came from school, and to-day the good grandmother had looked in her bag of yarn and found this ball of scarlet, and soon she would knit some gay little mittens for those aching fingers.

The needles fairly flew as the old clock in the corner struck four, and the second mitten danced and hopped about in the grandmother's fingers, while the first lay quietly on her knee beside the little red ball. Very soon the snow, which lay lightly on the doorstep, was scattered hither and thither by hasty feet, and in another moment Hannah had sprung into the room, was soon watching the glittering needles of her grandmother as they wrought that mystery of all mittens, the creation of a thumb. Very eager was she to put them on, but it was not permitted until the last stitch was taken, and the ends of the bright yarn cut off. So she stood demurely waiting for the happy moment to arrive when she might hide her restless fingers in the soft scarlet; and while she waited the old lady said to her, "Hannah, I have been thinking about these mittens to-day, and I have concluded that they may do much good if you will let them."

"To be sure, grandmother," replied little Hannah, "I will let them keep my hands as warm as ever they can."

"Besides that, I want them to do more, and let us see if you cannot tell me every night of something these little mittens have done besides protecting your hands."

Hannah laughed at the plan, but she was really pleased, and resolved to teach the fiery little mittens every day something to tell the kind grandmother who had made them. The next morning, on her way to school, she overtook little Rosa, dragging her lame brother on a sled through the drifted snow. Hannah saw that the child was tired with her exertions, and so she let the red mitten grasp the short rope, and merrily it worked to draw the reluctant sled up the steep hill to the school-house. At recess the children all hastened to make a snow man, and Hannah went too, but at the door she saw that the steps were becoming very slippery with the trodden snow, and she thought of the broom behind the door. Then she caught sight of the wonderful man rising slowly out of the huge drifts, and the little hands longed to roll the light snow together for his head. But she remembered the mittens, and grasping the broom, she swept the stone steps and the path-way quite clean, and then had time enough left to assist in the completion of the rude image in the corner of the yard. At night she told the grandmother what her mittens had done, and the kind-hearted old lady smiled at the success of her plan, while she encouraged Hannah to let the brave little fairies accomplish all they could. And it was wonderful to hear all that those merry-looking little mittens did in the course of the long winter. They drew the lame boy to school and home again every day, they served as a pattern for several other of the school children, they carried many a basket and bundle for the aged grandmother, they led three children to the Sabbath school, they put many a penny into the box for the poor heathen, and still there was always something more for these willing workers to do. Not a day passed but Hannah found plenty to test the ability of her mittens, which never failed to do her bidding.

Before the spring again came peeping through the rents in winter's garment, one of the well-worn, much-used mittens was lost, and the solitary mate Hannah converted into a purse to hold her missionary pennies. But the hands had learned a lesson from the faithful mittens, and now the work that they found to do was done willingly. The good grandmother's lesson sank deep into the heart of little Hannah, and long after the shining needles were rusty in the leather-case, and the sunlight fell across her vacant chair, her Bible still full open at the words, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

THE RAIN UPON THE MOWN GRASS.

"He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass; as showthat water the earth."

How gently in night's silent hours
The dew distills upon the flowers;
How softly on the grass new mown
The crystal drops of rain are strown.
But gentler, softer falls thy word,
On childhood's tender heart, O Lord
Making the germs of grace appear
Like snowdrops in the opening year.
Its light revealed to infant eyes,
Is darkness to the worldly wise,
We know, we feel the Bible true,
For it has made our hearts anew.

THE TREASURY PULPIT.

A DIFFICULTY OVERCOME.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? and if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?"—JER. xli. 5.

ONE of the greatest battles on record was fought, and won, seven hundred years ago, by the merchants, tradesmen, and artisans of Brussels against the arms of France. Reduced by famine to the greatest straits, Brussels one evening opened her beleagured gates, not to admit the enemy, but that such as were able to carry arms might march out—to make their last throw in the bloody game of war. They were resolved to do or die. Their resolution was strung to the highest tension; and they had it from the lips of their wives and daughters that, whatever were the result of to-morrow's battle, they should be safe from the violence of a brutal soldiery. If their fathers and brothers conquered, they would be at the gates to receive them in their arms; if, on the other hand, they were defeated, still they had a refuge—the last refuge of the oppressed,—the grave. They would fire the city, and, throwing themselves into the flames, leave nought to the spoiler but blackened corpses, and smoking ruins. The forlorn hope, on leaving Brussels, carried provisions only for one meal. If God was pleased to bless their arms, they would get plenty more; if the day was lost, they would need no more. The night fell down when they came in sight of the banners and tents of France. Spent by their enemies in riot and carousings, it was spent by them in seeking rest for to-morrow's fight; and by their leaders, in making the most skilful arrangements.

The men of Brussels rose with the dawn. They took what was to some—and might be to all—their last earthly meal; then, knowing that they, a few rude burghers, had no chance against that magnificent host unless God helped the fight for home, and wife, and children, and liberty, they cried to Heaven for help. Arrayed in sacred vestments, with the symbols of salvation in their hands, the priests went up and down the ranks; every man confessed, and received the rites administered to the dying. The solemn service of their Church concluded, they rose from their knees; closed their ranks; levelled their pikes; and wheeling round so as to throw the glare of the sun in the eyes of the enemy, they came down an avalanche of steel. The charge was irresistible. They bore cuirass, and knightly lance before them; and these base-born traders scattered the chivalry of France, like smoke before the wind, and chaff before the whirlwind.

Such is a story of the olden time as told by Froissart in his Chronicles. It illustrates a remarkable saying of one who fought many battles, and seldom—if ever, lost any. Asked to what he attributed his remarkable success, he replied, "I owe it, under God, to this, that I made it a rule never to despise an enemy."

To what warfare is this rule so applicable as to the Christian's—to the battles of the faith—to those conflicts which the believer is called to wage with Satan, the world, and the flesh? His past experience, an examination of the circumstances in which he has failed, and of those in which he has conquered, cannot fail to prove that. Those works are commonly best done by us, which we count most difficult—the athlete leaps the highest who bends the lowest to the spring. And have not we found that when Satan looked most formidable, he proved to be least so? Stand in awe, and sin not—these are joined as cause and effect. The way to sin not, is just to stand in awe. Never to feel too secure, never to underrate the difficulty of a duty, never—be it the world, the devil, or the flesh—to despise the power of an enemy, is not that just what Scripture teaches in these words, "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch;" again, "Pray that ye enter not into temptation;" again, "Put on the whole armour of God;" again, "Having done all, Stand."

The adage, Extremes meet, applies as well to spiritual as to common things; and thus it is that despondency—the fear that we shall never succeed, by depressing a man's energies and paralyzing his power, leads to disaster, almost as certainly as presumptuous pride. For example, it was the witch of Endor more than the Philistines that conquered Saul. When she buried hope in his brave heart, she dug his grave; victory vanished with the mantled phantom; and when Saul, pale, haggard, his courage sunken as his eye, hopeless and heartless, went to fight, he had not a chance—the battle of Gilboa was lost before it was begun. Despair, in fact, is as bad a leader as presumption—this is Scylla, that Charybdis; and both extremes, the rock, horrid with breakers, and the glassy whirlpool, are alike fatal. Here, how true is the heathen proverb, "The middle is the safe passage!" The Spirit guiding us, we are to steer right between the two; and, with God's blessing, to help you in this course, let me explain and answer the question, "If ye have run with the footmen, and they have wearied you, how will ye contend with horses?"—in other words, if ye have not done the less, how can you do the greater?

The difficulty implied by this proverb appears—

I. In this, That man is less a match for Satan now than when Satan proved himself more than a match for man.

In Eden, our first parents and the tempter were not unequally matched. Belonging to a superior race of intelligent beings, he had more mental, but they, on the other hand, still innocent, were superior to him in moral power; and so, like a man who, though he brings less strength to the field of battle, brings better weapons than his enemy, Eve might be considered as a fair match for the devil. Vice cannot look virtue in the face, any more than an owl can the sun; and, imperfect as it is, innocence still seems to possess such power over guilt as the eye of a man has over a lion,—the savage beast quails before his fixed, and steady look. When naked, Eve was clad in the panoply of innocence; and it was her own fault that the simplicity of the dove did not prove more than a match for the cunning of the serpent. But it did not—and you know the result. It is seen in the flames of hell; it was heard in the groans of Calvary; it is felt in the corruption of our whole nature; it is written in the blotted pages of each man's history; it is engraven on every tomb-stone. Beneath its burden the whole creation groaneth and is in pain; and waiting for redemption, and, till He come who shall set free the prisoners and lead captivity captive, crieth, "O Lord, how long, holy and true? Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly! why tarry thy chariot wheels?"

Beaten in Eden, where else can man look for success? Overcome in our innocence, what hope remains for us in this warfare now? The bravest soldiers hang back from the breach where, as it belches forth fire and smoke, they have seen the flower of the army fall—mowed down like grass. The bravest seamen, as lately happened on the English coast, dread the storm which has wrecked, besides the gallant ship, the stout life-boat that had gone to save; men say, If, with her brave hands and buoyant power, whelmed among the waves, she could not live in such a sea, what chance for common craft? And what chance for us where our first parents perished? how can guilt stand where innocence fell? Beneath a heaven that has empty thrones, and on a world full of ruins, how may poor, fallen creatures hope to conquer an enemy who has won victories in the fields both of heaven and earth, and overcome the innocence both of angels and of men! To set us up against Satan, saying, Now fight the good fight, and resist the devil, is like raising a sick man from his bed, and, when the earth is spinning round to his dizzy eyes, bidding him fight an enemy that conquered him, when health bloomed on his cheek, and strength lay in the arm that hangs powerless by his side. What chance have infants against the lion that, with bristling mane, lashing tail, and flashing eyes, stands with his paw on the bleeding body of their mother? What hope has a city, with traitors swarming in her streets, to resist a foe that scaled, and breached, and carried its walls, when no traitor lodged within? We have been reduced to slavery; and did bondmen ever win where freemen lost? Hope, there is none for us out of Christ—no hope but David's, when, as the stripling presented himself to do battle with the giant, Goliath, as if he felt insulted to be beard by a beardless boy, exclaimed, "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" Come on; rush to thy doom, and "I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field." And David answered, "Thou comest to me with a sword, and a spear, and a shield; but I come unto thee in the name of the Lord God of hosts." And but that we go to battle in the name of Jesus, backed by the Lord God of hosts, we had had no answer to the question, "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, how wilt thou contend with horses?"

II. If we were overcome by sin ere it had grown into strength, we are now less able to resist it.

The morning of life, like that of day—with every flower glistening in dews, the fresh air loaded with perfumes, the hills bathed in golden light, the skies ringing with the song of larks, is beautiful. Fallen though we are, there remains a purity, modesty, ingenuousness, and tenderness of conscience about childhood, that looks as if the glory of Eden yet lingered over it—as you see the light of day on hill-tops in the evening, when the sun is down. We are dead in trespasses and sins: and I don't say but there is death; but it is like death before the body is cold, or the colour of life is blanched upon its cheek, or decay has begun its work. Look at childhood! It does not behave itself unseemly; does not rejoice in iniquity; does not glory in its shame; nor stand with unblushing front before a shocked and wondering world to avow its vileness, and proclaim itself seducer, liar, murderer. It has blushes on its cheek; and in its bosom, a conscience that protests against thoughts, and words, and actions that men live to boast of. Sin, afterwards rolled as a sweet morsel under the tongue, is followed in early life by fears and uneasy feelings, stings of conscience and bitings of remorse; so that the child is no more like what the man becomes, than a sweet rose-bud, bursting its sheath, breathing odours, and opening into beauty, is like that vile, soiled, and rotten thing which I have seen hanging on the leafless branch—a nest of worms, and smelling rank of decay. It has wrung our heart to look on some lost and loathsome creature—the pest of society, and the shame of her sex—and think of the days when she was an angel-like infant in a mother's happy arms; when, ignorant of evil, she lisped long-forgotten prayers at a mother's knee; when her voice rose in the psalm at family worship and in the house of God, like the song of a seraph in the skies. Alas! "How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed!"

Yet, justifying this sad description, "The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies"—how soon sin clouds life's brightest dawn! Well, if when sin was comparatively weak, and conscience was comparatively strong, we were so easily, and so often overcome by temptation, what hope for us, when this order is reversed—when conscience is weak, and sin is strong? If we were no match for the cub, how shall we conquer the grown lion? If we could not pull out the sapling, how are we to root up the tree? If we could not turn the stream near its mountain cradle, how shall we turn the river that, red, roaring, swollen, pours its flood on to the sea? If we could not arrest the stone on the brow of the hill, how shall we stop it when, gathering speed at every turn, and force at every bound, it rushes into the valley with resistless might? Yet such power sin gains by time and habits. "If we have run with the footmen and they have wearied us, how shall we contend with horses?" Spirit of God! but for thy gracious aid the attempt were hopeless.

Not without reason, the strongest reason, does the wise man address himself to the young, saying, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth." The difficulty of resisting our bad passions and corrupt nature, grows with man's growth, and strengthens with his strength. Some things become weak, and wear away by use; not the power of sin—like the muscles of a blacksmith's brawny arm, the more it is used the stronger it grows. Thus all sinners, as well as "seducers, wax worse and worse;" the dead become twice dead; and if no bones can live, still less those that are very dry. The further we go down the slope of evil, it is the more difficult to return. Every new act of sin casts up another impediment in our way; so that what was once but a molehill, grows into a mountain. Nor could we ever hope that, having been overcome of sin when it was weak, we should overcome it when it is strong, but that faith, undaunted by difficulties, can say, "What art thou, O great mountain! before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

Yes—they that are accustomed to do evil may learn to do well. The Ethiopian has changed his skin, and the leopard his spots. Down into that crimson fountain, and it is done! With the blood of Christ to wash away the darkest guilt, and the Spirit of God to sanctify the vilest, and strengthen the weakest nature, I despair of none. Too late! It is never too late. Even hoary age, tottering to the grave beneath seventy years, and a great load of guilt, may retrace its steps, and begin life anew. I have seen the morning rise cold and gloomy, and the sky grow thicker, and the rain fall faster, as the hours wore on; yet, ere it set in night, the sun, bursting through heavy clouds, has broke out to illumine the landscape, and shed a flood of glory on the dying day.

III. Show how these difficulties are to be overcome.

The Spirit and the flesh, grace and nature, heavenly and earthly influences may be so fairly balanced, that like a ship with wind and water acting on her with equal power, but in opposite directions, the believer makes no progress in the divine life. He loses headway. He does not become worse, but he grows no better; and it is all he can do to hold his own. Sometimes he loses ground—falling into old sins. Temptation comes like a roaring squall, and finding him not watching, drives him backward; and further from heaven than once he was, he has to pray, "Heal my backsliding, renew me graciously, love me freely—For thy name's sake, O Lord, pardon mine iniquity, for it is great."

Our state is often a very unsatisfactory one. The affections that should point steadily to heaven, go wheeling about like a weather vane, that shifts with shifting winds. Sinful thoughts and bad desires spring up, thick as weeds in showery weather—faster than we can cut them down; and every attempt to keep the heart pure, holy, heavenly, ends in miserable failure—extorting the question, "Who is sufficient for these things?" It is often most disheartening. We go into our gardens, and see the flowers growing by sunny day, and silent night; week by week, the fields around grow golden for the harvest; and year by year, childhood in our homes rises into youth, and youth into bearded manhood;—but our poor souls seem standing still. There is no appreciable progress; and we begin to ask, Are we never to grow fit for heaven—is our hope of it but a dream, a beautiful delusion? Daily called to contend with temptation, the battle often goes against us—"The sons of Zeruiah are too strong for us." That startling cry, "The Philistines are on thee, Samson!" rouses us; we make some little fight; but too often fighting only to be conquered, we are ready to give up the struggle,—to say, It is useless; and like Saul in Gilboa's battle, to throw away sword and shield. We would; but that, cheered by a voice from above, and sustained by hope in God's grace and mercy, we can turn on our souls to say, "Why art thou cast down, my soul; why is my spirit disquieted within me?"—rise; resume thy arms; renew the fight; never surrender—"Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him who is the health of my countenance, and my God."

To encourage you to this, let me show two cases—those of Peter and Abraham—where they who had been overcome by the lesser, overcame the greater trial; and, to use the language of my text, though wearied by the footmen, nobly contended with horses. No doubt we are not Peter or Abraham; still their God is our God for ever and ever—the same yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow. What he did once, he can do again. His ear is not heavy that it cannot hear; nor his hand shortened that it cannot save.

1. Look at the case of Peter.

The arena where he is matched with footmen, is a judgment hall. A woman—no proud Jezebel, plotting Naboth's murder—no Athaliah, ambitious of a throne, and wading to the ancles in the blood of her children—no Herodias, gazing with grim satisfaction on John's gory head—has dragged Peter to her presence, and fixing on him her evil eye, asserts, Thou also art one of them! It is but a humble maid—come perhaps to cast some billets on the fire—who without intending to hurt him, or with any object other than to satisfy her curiosity, catching a sight of Peter's face as the rising flame throws its ruddy glare on the crowd around, says, Thou also art one of them! Coward! He denies it—denies his Master—asseverates with oaths, I know not the man. What a fall was there!

The scene changes, and the arena is again a place of judgment; as if providence kindly intended that Peter should win back his laurels on the field where they were lost. He stands at the bar of stern, blood-thirsty judges—and at his back a band of martyrs. Far more severely tried, he is now equal to the occasion. His courage mounts with the danger. No denying of his Master now! no repudiating now of his discipleship! He stands like a lion at bay. Accused, he turns the accuser; charges his judges with murdering the Lord of glory; and boldly tells them that Jesus he has preached, and, let them do their worst, Jesus he will preach—obeying God rather than man. He had run with the footmen, and they had wearied him, see how nobly he contends with horses!

2. Look at the case of Abraham.

We would touch the patriarch's fault lightly, but that he nobly redeemed it; and that, like the dark background of a picture, it brings out the faith which shone so brilliant in his greatest trials. Woman's beauty has often been her snare—supplying food to vanity, and exposing her honour to the seducer's wiles. But Sarah's beauty was her husband's snare. About to sojourn in the land of Egypt, he looked on her face with alarm—not with pleasure now. These bright eyes shall be my death; throwing their witchery on the king, he will covet my treasure; to get this fruit, as when axes are levelled against the stately palm, they will hew down the tree. Alarmed at such thoughts, and frightened by a shadow, his fear of Pharaoh got the better of his faith in God. It prompted, and his tongue taught this lie, at least, mean shuffle and equivocation to Sarah, Say thou art my sister; and it may be well with me for thy sake. He ran with the footmen, and they wearied him.

Look again—the scene has shifted. Once more he is on his trial in the arena. It is a mountain summit. He has to contend not with footmen, but with horses now. God has said, "Take thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest; and offer him for a burnt-offering on a mountain that I will tell thee of!" Offer Isaac! make a burnt-offering of my boy—my son—my only son; bind him to the horrid altar—and a father's hands to bind him! Never, in man's or mother's breast, was faith put to so great a trial. Contend with horses! he has to contend with passions stronger far than horses,—with love strong as death, love that many waters cannot quench. A thousand devils whispered in his ear, Do it not! and nature, turned traitor to her God, rose in all her might to forbid the bloody deed—protesting that God could never, never demand such a horrid sacrifice. He turns away his head. Each cutting into his own heart, he twists the cords round Isaac's limbs, and draws them tight; and now he takes the knife. Would God let him, he would bury it to the haft in his own bosom. And look there—with arm arrested from plunging it into Isaac's, he stands, on that mountain summit, on the highest pinnacle of faith that human feet ever stood on. God helping him, see how a man who has been wearied by the footmen, may contend with horses!

There were giants in those days—there were. But it was God that made them strong; and what Peter and Abraham did, they did through the power of his might. He strengthened them with all might by his Spirit in the inner man; and though these actors have left the stage for lesser men to fill, the might, the power, the promises remain—God remains behind. Listen, "My grace is sufficient for thee"—"O worm Jacob, thou shalt thresh the mountains"—"One man shall chase a thousand"—"He that is feeble, not he that is strong, he that is feeble among them shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as God"—"The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound."

With such promises, and the assurance of his gracious presence, may we not go down undaunted into the swellings of Jordan? Great swellings these! Ah, sins assume a magnitude, our guilt a blackness, and our salvation—out of Christ—a hopelessness that they wear nowhere else! The swellings of Jordan! Not the pangs of dying, nor the mortal struggle, terrible as it seems—these are the memories of the guilty past that rise on the trembling soul, and the prospect of a judgment near at hand, just, irrevocable, eternal. I have seen these cast a solemn shadow on the faces of the holiest; and what shall we do in these swellings of Jordan? Do? What can we do, but cling to Jesus; lay our sins on Jesus: cast our fears on Jesus; die with our head pillowed on his bosom, and our last conscious gaze fixed upon his cross—breathing out our life in such words as these,— "Jesus, lover of my soul,

Let me to thy bosom fly,
When the nearer waters roll,
When the tempest still is nigh.

Hide me, O my Saviour! hide,
Till the storm of life is past,
Safe into the haven guide,
Oh! receive my soul at last."

THE CITY OF DROUGHT.

IN accordance with that law of dreams by which the sense of incongruity and the emotion of wonder seem banished from them, I once passed through the following scenes without any perception of the contradictions involved in them.

I saw, in my dream, a city in the midst of a wilderness. It spread through a narrow valley into an open plain, and its streets climbed the steep sides of the hills. When I entered the city, I saw many magnificent buildings around me: palaces glittering with gilded domes, and white minarets rearing their delicate stems in the brilliant sunshine: stately halls, adorned with sculpture and painting, where you might lose yourself in vistas of marble columns: bazaars festooned with Oriental draperies, and heaped with precious wares: luxurious libraries, spacious amphitheatres. There were also magnificent temples in all orders of architecture, to all kinds of deities, some gorgeous with paintings and fragrant with incense; some mere rock-hewn caves, shapeless without, but within roofed with gold and frosted silver, and pendent crystals of a thousand shapes and hues, sacred to the earth-gnomes; some stately in the severe beauty of marble and alabaster, containing no meaner ornament than the sculptured form of man.

One thing, however, one essential thing, the city of my dream entirely lacked,—there was no water in it; throughout its streets and open squares you never heard the cool sound of living streams. There were, indeed, marble drinking-fountains, and large reservoirs, of the most beautiful forms and materials, in the streets. There were goblets and bowls of every costly substance in the houses, and these often sparkled with the richest wines. But not one drop of water could all the wealth of that city purchase, or all its ingenious industry introduce.

There was, nevertheless, an ancient water-course running through the principal thoroughfare, and in its bed were incrustations and rounded pebbles, which the geologists of the city said plainly indicated that water had flowed there once. Some even tried to explain this fact by speaking of a convulsion, which had cut off the river; but this theory was generally regarded as apocryphal. The greater number of the citizens held either that their luscious and intoxicating beverages were water, or that there was no such substance. Some imaginative men had invented a clear sparkling beverage, which resembled water in all respects but one: it burned instead of cooling. And not a few philosophers insisted that as the component elements of water were well known, and these elements existed in their atmosphere and in other substances, due proportions of these component gases taken separately, must obviously answer all the purposes of water. This theory found great favour with the corporation of the city. They declared it was incontrovertible, and imposed a heavy fine on any who refused to believe their faces washed, or their thirst quenched, by inhaling these scientifically measured ingredients.

There was, however, one fearful plague to which this city was subject, which set all their subtlest arguments and most stringent laws at defiance; its one characteristic being a consuming thirst, which nothing but water could satisfy.

Indeed, so well did the citizens know the hopelessness of this disease, that their general remedy for it was to intoxicate, or lull its victims into a death-sleep, to end their agonies. This purpose, however, they could not always accomplish: all opiates being set at naught by a raging delirium. Indeed, it was hinted by some that in that death-sleep, or that delirium, all the inhabitants of that hapless city must at last perish.

On the evening on which I entered the city of my dream, there had been a great festival in the house of one of the nobles, in honour of the birth-day of his only child, a maiden of a grace and beauty it was a joy to see.

Night came on. The guests left. The fading lamps gleamed through the empty halls on the relics of the feast. The father and mother were left alone with their child, when suddenly a hectic glow began to burn in the maiden's cheeks. The mother saw it first, and with a horror-stricken look, significantly touched her husband's hand.

They looked wistfully at one another, and at the child, but dared not speak their fears. At length the maiden said languidly,—

"I thirst, mother, I thirst."

They offered her the choicest wines from the festal tables; but she turned with loathing from them all.

Then the mother laid her on a couch, and tried to lull her to sleep, by holding her hand and singing softly to her, as when she was a little child. The weary eyes closed for a few instants, but then again they opened with a deep, wistful, sleepless gaze; the hectic spot deepened on the cheek, the bright, soft eyes grew wild, and all through the night she kept feebly murmuring,—

"I thirst. Give me water, or I die."

They sent for physician after physician; they tried remedy after remedy; but all with the distracting conviction how it must end.

Suddenly, however, and silently, an irresistible spell seemed to fall on every one in the house. A deep slumber overcame them all. And while they slept, two bright beings came and bore the maiden away with them into a city very unlike her own. Crystal walls, and golden streets, and gates of pearl were there, but what were these to the dying girl? Water was there; living water! In the midst of the street flowed a river of pure water, bright as crystal, cool as sea-breezes. But no imagery could express its value to her. It was water, common homely water, and she was dying of thirst. She stooped to drink. But to her horror, the waters glided from her lips, and she could not even touch them.

Then a happy band of the dwellers in that city gathered around her, and with tender sympathy wiped the burning tears from her eyes, and took her dry and feverish hands in theirs. The touch seemed healing, but she could only gasp,—

"Water, water! You are too good to mock my thirst. Water, only water, or I die."

"You shall have abundance," was the gentle reply, "but it cannot be here. You cannot drink of these streams yet. A fountain flows in the desert for you,—do you not know of it. It is close to your own home."

"I never even heard of it," was her reply.

"But it is there," answered many joyous voices. "It is there. We all know it. We all drank of it once, and we are all from the City of Drought, and we know it well."

"But how shall I find it?" she asked.

"In the desert close outside the gates of the City of Drought it springs," they answered. "Pass through the gates, and on the right hand you will see a wild and desolate ravine strewn with rocks. Enter it fearlessly. That chaos of rocks is the relic of the great battle which our king had with the gnomes and earth spirits when he opened the fountain. They still roam around the place in the form of wild beasts, howling furiously whenever they see any approach the spring. But they cannot do any real harm to those who pass onward. Around the fountain is a charmed circle which not one of them can ever enter, however they may rage and howl around."

"But when must I seek it?" asked the maiden.

"You must go there alone whenever you can leave your city unobserved. Every one must tread that path for himself alone and unobserved."

"Are there then others still in my city who have trodden it?" she asked.

"We trod it," was the joyous reply of countless voices, "and for the rest you will find that out for yourself by-and-by. But first you must fulfil these directions of ours. In that green circle by the spring alone, you will learn whatever else you need to know."

With these words she was taken back to her couch. When she told the vision the next morning, her friends looked significantly and mournfully at one another; they thought it a delirious raving, another stage of the fever. Therefore she lay quite still all day, until again night came; the lights were extinguished, and all were sunk in slumber. Then she rose hastily, and flew down the street to the gate she had been directed to.

As I have said before, the city was situated in the midst of a wilderness. A sandy desert encroached on its walls, so that the moment you left the gates you were in a solitude. Through this solitude the maiden wandered. It was quite silent and dry; but on one side lay a wild chaos of rocks, huge black boulders, and water-worn pebbles, the traces of some past deluge, which but mocked the present drought. Boldly, according to the directions given her in the City of Waters, she plunged among them, climbing the craggy rocks, and laboriously toiling through the water-worn, but dry shingle. Wild beasts howled around, and their howls grew nearer and more fearful in the night, until they seemed to hem her in on all sides; but the fever was in her veins, and the recollection of the coolness of the waters, clear as crystal,—and she pressed forward, trembling and faint, but undeterred.

At last there was a moment's pause in the howls of the wild beasts, as if they were silently preparing to spring upon her. Then suddenly, in the silence came the delicious sound of waters on the ear, not loud, but low, as of a little bubbling spring close at hand. At that instant the moon looked out from a veil of dark clouds, and her rays smiled on the gladdest sight the maiden had ever seen: a little solitary spring, not leaping into the light in sparkling cascades, but quietly bubbling up, so quietly that, until quite close to it, no one could have heard its voice, or dreamed that it was near.

The maiden knelt down beside it with unutterable joy, and drank, and bathed her burning brow, and arose another being. The wan look had passed from her face, the unnatural gleam from her eyes, the hectic spot from her cheeks, and instead her eyes shone with calm light, and her face glowed with the even colour of health, and through her whole countenance shone a peace and calm so lovely that I could scarcely tell if it was only the light of inward content, or an absolute visible radiance, like an aureole.

She was cured. The fever had left her. But as she stooped down again to drink a cry of joy burst from her lips. She had discovered that the living spring was also a mirror; and in its tiny basin shone the reflection of the City of Waters. There in the clear and quiet waters lay a vision of wondrous beauty, as in a miniature. Bright forms moved in and out among the radiant palaces, such as she had seen in her vision. But among the happy throngs she now first caught sight of One around whom all gathered in loving reverence. To her inexpressible joy he turned from them all to her; his lips moved, and while all the rest, beautiful as they were, seemed distant and dumb, when those lips moved, a voice came to her as if close, yet in heaven; so near it seemed a whisper in her ear, and yet with a strange depth as if it were from the depths of the sky above.

She knew it was the voice of the Prince who had opened the fountain; and when that voice sounded the howlings of the wild beasts around her ceased entirely.

Then, for the first time, I saw that within the little circle of living green which surrounded the spring not one of those savage beasts could enter.

The maiden would have lingered there, listening and gazing for ever; but the voice said, "Go home and tell of this fountain in your City of Drought; I have opened it for all."

Then she returned with footsteps, eager as those with which she came. And when the morning dawned, her friends found her sitting quietly on the couch, without a trace of fever on her face.

She told the story of the fountain, and many listened with eager thankfulness. The mother went there at once, and came back rejoicing, and so also did many in her home. And by degrees they found that the happy secret was known to many in the city, and that lonely path was trodden by many feet.

But now I came to the most inconsistent part of my dream, to which I alluded in the beginning, and which proves it to be one of those wild blendings of incongruous images, which show dreams to be so nearly allied to delirium. Although many one in that city was parched with thirst, although the fountain in the wilderness was free to every one of them, opened at great cost by the Prince, and freely offered to every thirsting dweller in the City of Drought, although none could ever drink of the streams of the City of Waters, except those who had first drunk of the Fountain in the Wilderness, not one tenth of the inhabitants ever cared to visit that living spring. But with that insane absence of the sense of contradiction, and the emotion of surprise characteristic of dreams, I did not wonder at this.

BIBLICAL TREASURY.

PAUL AND JAMES RECONCILED.

[Divines have accomplished this work of reconciliation times without number—none of them more happily than our esteemed contributor, Mr. Arnot, in his most recent work—"Roots and Fruits of the Christian Life"—to which we are indebted for the following:—]

THE covenant of mercy, although framed before the fall, was revealed after it. The Bible is not so old as sin. Error came first, and truth followed it. A daring rebel rose in a portion of the sovereign's dominions, and a force was sent to discover and destroy him; the position, magnitude, and character of the insurrection, determine the dispositions of the royal army which has been commissioned to put it down. Thus, error that sprung up on earth has determined the form of the truth that invades it from heaven.

The mould and the thing moulded on it, are in one sense similar to each other, and in another opposite. The mould communicates its own form to the liquid metal which is poured in, and yet the moulded figure, when complete, is precisely the reverse of that which formed it. Every hollow in the receiving matrix leaves a protuberance on the vessel which is cast. It is thus that revealed truth takes its shape from pre-existing error, although the truth so framed is, feature by feature, the opposite of the error from which it received its form. Into every hollow of the pre-existing falsehood ran the searching outpoured truth; and, corresponding to every deep lie of Satan, stands ultimately out an opposing solid truth from God. The deeper and wider the yawning pit of lies, the stronger and higher towers the truth antagonistic.

It is thus both in the main principle and in the subordinate details.

In its leading principle the salvation revealed followed the form of the loss previously sustained. The pliant remedy went round the disease, and came out its like, and yet its opposite. The serpent bruised the woman's seed; the woman's seed therefore bruised the serpent. The tempter closed with the first Adam, and the embrace was death to man; the second Adam closed with the tempter, and the embrace was death to man's great foe. As by man came death, so also by man came the resurrection from the dead. Condemnation was first, and stood alone triumphant: salvation came afterwards, and fastened on the foe, and closed all round, and overcame. Emerging from the strife victorious, salvation appeared in the form which it got in those fires. The truth which the Bible contains was, in its essence, prior to all error and sin, for error is originally a deviation from eternal truth; but the Bible which brings the truth to us, has been shaped upon falsehood its foe.

The same rule holds good when you descend to the specific features of revelation. Even the sayings of Jesus often took their shape from the cavils of devils or wicked men. It is an instructive exercise to read the evangelical history from this point of view. Large portions of the record consist of conversations: the sayings of proud Pharisees, or scoffing Sadducees, or weak disciples, or tyrant rulers, alternate with the sayings of Jesus, as hill and valley alternate in a landscape. When self-righteousness, or malice, or blasphemy, spurt up from an evil heart of unbelief, he gently covers it with saving truth. Thus the wild fires in the heart of the earth threw up the hills and mountain ranges; then the rain and sun came down from heaven, and clothed their jagged sides with verdure. All unfit were these internal fires to make a green and growing world; and yet their wild upheavings were permitted, and employed to give that variety to the earth's surface, on which both its beauty and fertility so largely depend. Those outbursts of sin which the evangelic histories record, could not by themselves have done any good to men; but they became the occasion of drawing from Jesus a corresponding opposing covering truth, which lies upon them yet, yielding in abundance the bread of life to our own generation.

The operation and effect of this principle may be seen in the teaching of the two apostles, James and Paul, regarding faith. Had the errors of those days been of another cast, the truth on that subject would have descended to us in a different form. Each strong projecting truth about faith, that stands out in the apostolic epistles, received its shape by going into the dark recesses of error,—the depths of Satan as they then existed in the world: the true doctrine, when cooled and solidified for preservation through all time, was found to have taken its form from the manifold deceits that prevailed among men, when that doctrine flowed warm and new from the Spirit of God through the apostles' lips.

More particularly the two main features of faith, as represented in the Scriptures—the two feet on which it stands secure—have been moulded in two deep pits which Satan had prepared for the destruction of men. The two errors regarding faith were contrary to each other, and yet both alike were contrary to truth. The one despised living faith as unnecessary; the other exalted dead faith as sufficient. This heretic laboured on what he called obedience, and held that thereby he might be justified; that heretic professed faith, and thought he might thereby be relieved from the pain and trouble of a strict obedience. The Legalist and the Antinomian stand on opposite extremes, equally distant from the truth that saves. Both put asunder the two whom God has joined, and the severance is death to the severed: as well might you expect the right and left sides of a human being to live and act after they are separated by a sword. The works of the Legalist are dead for want of faith; the faith of the Antinomian dead for want of works. These two deep pits, so situated, give form and position to the two main pillars of the truth.

The errors being opposite are mutually intolerant of each other: the two pits are dug on opposite sides of the right path, and the same traveller cannot fall into both at the same time. The adversary goeth about seeking whom he may devour, and how he may devour them. Persons of one character and tendency lean to the right; persons of another character and tendency lean to the left: for either a snare is set.

As the errors are opposite, the same enunciation of truth is not fitted to subvert both. The truths that will meet and match these lies are in an important sense the opposite of each other. The errors, though opposite, are both errors, and the truths, though in a subordinate sense opposite, are both truths.

Two separate witnesses have been chosen and called to give evidence against these two errors, and enunciate the corresponding counteracting truths. Paul deals with one of the adversaries, and James with the other. The two boldest leaders are sent against the two main divisions of the foe: Paul meets the Legalist, who trusts in his own righteousness, and tells him, By faith a man is justified, and not by the works of the law; James meets the Antinomian, who thinks obedience unnecessary, and tells him, By works a man is justified, and not by faith only. Thus saving truth is flanked on either side by two strong towers, as sentinels on the two chief approaches to her citadel; and the divine wisdom and goodness are manifest in this, that while the defensive truths are posted there to repel assailing errors, those errors were the means of drawing out the truth in those lines, and casting it into those forms of strength.

Paul insisting on faith only, and James on works also, stand not face to face fighting against each other, but back to back, fighting opposite foes; they are both on the same side, although for the time they look and strike in opposite directions. Paul's argument is not truth at rest, exhibiting her countenance in full; but truth in conflict with the heresy of legalism. In like manner, the argument of James in our text gives not a portrait in full; but a glimpse of truth in the act of doing battle with the Antinomian heresy. In that combat you see one side, and in this another, of the same truth. A confession is like a picture in which the face of faith appears full, but still; with all its features in view, but none of them in motion: the Bible, on the contrary, is the real battle-field where living warriors fight. Various and ever-shifting are the attitudes of the combatants: in the mazes and evolutions of the fight some of them seem at times to be arrayed against their comrades; but they are only pursuing to extremities certain divisions of the foe, and fully executing each his own portion of the great Captain's plan. Neither the argument of Paul concerning faith, nor the argument of James concerning works, could be inserted in a confession. The confession, being only a picture, must hang stiff and motionless on the wall; but in the Bible the soldiers, fighting against heterogeneous, ever-shifting hosts, and under the eye of their living Head, exhibit a freedom of movement which is not possible in any representation. When the strife is over and the victory won, Paul and James will stand side by side before the Captain of their salvation, and receive in common the same award: Well done, good and faithful soldiers, enter ye into the joy of your Lord.

The errors with which these two apostles were respectively called to deal were very diverse, and consequently the same treatment was not suitable for both. The contest in Paul's argument lay between faith and something else as its rival in the justification of the sinful; the contest in the argument of James lay between two different kinds of faith. The first battle is fought by Paul: he contends against all comers, that a sinner can be justified only through faith in the righteousness of Christ. Then appears James, and carries the question a stage further, insisting that only one particular species of faith can justify, to the exclusion of spurious kinds which usurp the same name.

Paul divides the whole world into two: those who seek to be justified before God through faith in Christ; and those who trust in other appliances. He then tells off as on the right side those who cling to faith, and sets aside all the rest as errorists. Observe, now, it is the division whom Paul has pronounced right, and that division only, with whom James deals. He addresses, not those who denied Paul's doctrine of faith, but those who accepted and professed it. Paul's test decided the soundness of the profession: James throws in among the sound another solvent which precipitates a quantity of dark and fetid grounds. His question is: Assuming that you all acknowledge faith, is your faith living or dead? The orthodox, like Gideon's army, after having been greatly diminished in numbers by one test, must be still further reduced by another. Of those who confessed the doctrine that a man is justified by faith alone, some were regenerated, and some still remained carnal. The creatures acted not after their name, but after their kind. Some who professed the true faith served the Lord that bought them in newness of life ; others who professed the true faith, thinking that their profession would shield them from punishment, gave themselves over to the pleasures of sin. For the conviction of these self-deceivers, the apostle James proves by his dividing word, that faith without obedience is dead, and that dead faith does not save.

TRIFLES.

WHAT are trifles—who may guess
All a trifle's meaning ?
Scattered ears on life's broad field
For a wise one's gleanings.
Nought but hath its work on earth,
Fraught with pain or pleasure,
Links in nature's mystic chain,
Though of tiniest measure.

But a trifle seems a word
All unkindly spoken,
Yet the life-harp waileth low
For a gold string broken.
But a trifle seems the smile
On a kind face beaming,
Yet a faint heart groweth strong,
'Neath its gentle gleaming.

Just a look may waken thoughts
Full of proud resentment—
Just a look may fill the soul
With a glad contentment ;
Little prayers of children fair,
By their mother kneeling,
Touch a worn and weary heart,
With a childlike feeling.

But a flower's perfume may bear
Back through years of sorrow,
The sunny morn of life,
With a bright to-morrow—
And a tress of silken-hair
On a young brow parted,
Wake a fount of bitterest tears,
For the broken-hearted.

'Twas a single rain-drop fell
On a green bud thirsting,
Strengthened by the fairy draught,
Lo, a flower is bursting ;
And an acorn lightly flung
In a pathway dreary,
Spread an oak's broad shadows out,
To refresh the weary.

Trickling from the mountain-height,
Through the beech roots stealing,
See, a thread of silver light,
Sunbeams are revealing.

Drop by drop it gathers fast,
Never resting, never,
Till it swells and flashes forth
In a glorious river.

Trifles ! each one hath a part
In our pain or pleasure,
Making up the daily sum
Of our life's brief measure ;
All unnoted as they pass
Scarcely worth our heeding,
Yet a trifle it may be,
God's own work is speeding.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

BETHEL, SHILON, AND THE WELL AT SYCHAR.

THE daylight which had served us for our last view of Jerusalem began to decline soon after we turned northward from that point, and descended the hills which hid from us the holy city and the hill country of Judea.

It is seldom possible to start on a long expedition in the East early in the day. Our departure had been delayed by a stormy debate in the courtyard of Simeon's hotel, between the dragoman and the muleteers. The Arab muleteers had endeavoured to persuade us to take two or three inferior horses, and on a journey which was to last a month this was a point which could not be yielded, and the English consul for Caiapha and the French consul kindly came to our aid.

We felt sure the contest would end as we wished, and meantime could do nothing but watch the progress of the debate and regret the loss of time. Voices were raised to angry shrieks and lowered to fierce menacing murmurs ; the faces of the disputants expressed the most violent passions. The dark eyes glared and flashed, and the lips of some foamed with rage, and hands were raised in deprecatory or threatening gesticulation. The muleteers began to detach the trunks, and seemed on the point of leading away their animals and abandoning the bargain. Our dragoman helplessly stormed and pleaded ; the English consul stood calm amidst the tempest, occasionally throwing in a few strong quiet words which at first increased the clamour, but finally calmed it. The whole was to us like a most vivid drama or pantomime, the gestures and expression of the disputants rendering the knowledge of the language scarcely necessary to the comprehension of their meaning.

At length the horses we declined were led away, the horses we wanted were brought in their stead, and our whole caravan clattered out of the court-yard and over the rough stony streets. But the loss of time in this debate had left us only one hour's daylight for the four hours' journey to Bethel, where our tents were to be pitched for the night.

After we turned from our last lingering gaze at Jeru-saalem the sun sank behind the western hills, and almost before we had begun to think of the decline of day the brief twilight was over, and it was dark.

The guide, who rode before us, was deaf to all our entreaties to relax his pace. We scrambled on after him in the dark over the rough roads. The darkness deepened; no moon rose, and the stars which glittered so brilliantly above us, and the fireflies which darted to and fro on each side or across our path, only made the blackness of the night more apparent. To attempt to guide the horses was in vain; nothing was visible but the ghostly apparition of a white horse before me, of which I must on no account lose sight. Up and down the stony paths we scrambled, but might have been quite tranquil if we could have trusted our safe agile little Syrian horses as they deserved. They never made a false step; but we were not sorry to find our tents pitched at Bireh (Beeroth), when we reached it, instead of having to ride an hour further to Bethel, our original destination.

We had to rise very early on the following morning. A long day's journey was before us to Nablous (Shechem), and the lost hour of the preceding day had to be made up.

The way between Beeroth and Bethel lay over craggy hills, reminding us again of Dartmoor, only brown and grassless, and of limestone instead of granite. On the height of Bethel are the ruins of a Greek church and several old foundations of houses with large stones. Beyond these was a rocky hill strewn with many rough stones, of which Jacob might have made a pillow, or afterwards Jeroboam altar-stones for his rival temple.

And this is Bethel, "the house of God," where in vision the angel's ladder rested, linking Jacob's pillow to the throne of God. What made it "dreadful" and sublime? Certainly not any intrinsic beauty or sublimity in the scenery. When Jacob lighted on it it was "a certain place." No more characteristic word is found to describe it. He rested there, not because it was a place of streams or groves, or shady rocks, or in any way a tempting shelter, but just for the same reason we had tarried at Beeroth, "because the sun was set." It was a place in itself no more attractive or sublime than Jacob's own very ordinary character. It was no snowy Alpine summit, forming naturally a flight of spotless altar-steps from earth to heaven—a pedestal on which one could well imagine the angelic ladder might have rested. It was an ordinary brown hill-side strewn with rough stones, over which passed the high road. Nor was it fenced off from common ground, like Moriah, by precipitous ravines. You could not define the moment when you arrived at it or left it. There was nothing to distinguish it from any of the undulations or hills around.

When Jacob laid down to sleep, it was to him a bare featureless hillside strewn with stones, which he could not have recognised when he returned from Haran among the many similar places around. When he awoke out of sleep he said, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." There was no terror, or majesty, or beauty inherent in the place, especially to reveal or symbolize the divine presence. But God was there. This was its consecration and its glory. Heaven had been opened to Jacob's vision there. The voice of the Lord had spoken to his spirit there in human words, and therefore the place was full of solemnity and majesty to him. It was the house of God. And then when he returned, a patriarch and a prosperous man from his long exile, he built an altar and called the place El Bethel, because there God appeared unto him,—an altar of the religion whose highest manifestation is not in nature, or sun or stars, or mountains, but in the Son of man.

The subsequent history of Bethel has little more religious interest for us than that of any heathen shrine—a scene of idolatrous worship, with the old Egyptian animal symbols recalled by Jeroboam from Egypt, of feasts and sacrifices mocking and parodying God's ordinances at Jerusalem, of prophetic denunciation, and at last of judgment, when the bones of false priests and prophets were exhumed from the tombs among these hills, and burnt and strewn to the winds on an altar formed of these scattered stones.

Temple, city, altar, shady grove, all the relics of that idolatrous ritual have perished without a trace, and the bare hill-sides lie again ordinary and stony, and solitary and dreary, as when sunset surprised Jacob upon it, and the heavenly vision transformed the place in his eyes from a sweep of barren moorland into a gate of heaven.

From Bethel we rode along a rough watercourse, through a richly wooded valley among figs, olives, and vines, to a dell where was an ancient well. From this we crossed a plain to the foot of a steep hill crowned by a village, called by our guides Sinjel. Its situation was more picturesque than usual. The height on which it stood was rocky and precipitous, with an abundant ice-cold spring in the centre of the poor rough cabins, rising under the shadow of an arch, rudely hewn in the rock. We dismounted some of the women at the well, and filled their pitchers from the deep spring, and poured water into the stone troughs for our horses, and then gave us to drink, women and children flocking round us, and curiously examining our Frank dresses and faces while we rested. This fine spring is probably the cause why this village is still inhabited, among the numbers of deserted towns and villages which are dotted over the hills and valleys of this old inheritance of Benjamin. We led our horses down the precipitous rocky path from Sinjel to the plain, and after a short gallop across the level, reached another village on the plain, which the dragoman called Turmus Aye. The scriptural names I do not know, and yet, probably, there is not a village we pass but dates back to early Hebrew times, if not beyond these to the days of the Hittite and the Perizzite, with their gigantic stones, and cities walled up to heaven. Everywhere when you come amongst human dwellings in this country, you find traces of more energetic and prosperous races, large regularly squared stones, tanks hewn in the rock for rain-water; broken cisterns once cemented and lined with stone, now holding no water; threshing-floors, levelled on the rocky hill-sides, where the wind would act as a natural "fan," sweeping the chaff from the grain; wells with stone seats on their edge; fine old terraces for vines and olives, broken in many places and bared by the winter torrents. Everywhere traces of industrious and skilful men, yet no ruins, only heaps of stones, squared and chiselled carefully, it may be, but scattered, except here and there the remains of a church built by the Crusaders, patched and twisted into a mosque. The wheels of time, and conquest, and misgovernment have ground too heavily over the land, to leave anything of value above the surface. It is only the Intaglio relics that are left perfect; the traces of labour graven in on the solid rock in tanks, and threshing-floors, and terraces cut out of the hill-sides.

Our next point of interest was Shiloh. Its name on the lips of the ignorant peasantry, unperplexed by any monastic tradition, identifies it. It is called Seilun. An ancient well marks the place where Shiloh was, and the hill-side is thickly strewn with stones, interspersed with tufts of parched vegetation. It is, indeed, a desolation, a desolation of many generations. Nowhere do Bible words come more vividly to the mind than here.

Here the ark found its first resting-place after the wanderings in the wilderness were over. Here the yearly feast was held to the Lord, when the daughters of Shiloh came out to dance in the dances. To this dreary, solitary spot, untenanted even by Arab peasants, with its dry well on the stony hill, the tribes of Israel came up of old to worship from the maritime plains and the west, through the eastern passes, from the first settlements in wooded Gilead and the Jordan valley, from the hills of Judea on the south.

Here, too, is the undoubted locality of that touching story which, almost earlier than any other, is listened to by little children in Christian lands. On this very spot the infant Samuel heard God speak. The scene of the dear old nursery picture we all know is actually here. Here Hannah came year after year to the sacrifice in bitterness of soul. Here one year, rising from the feast where none but Elkanah would miss her presence, she knelt outside the curtained Tabernacle, on this hill-side, beneath this clear azure sky. And on one of these stones, scattered around us, then a seat, Eli sat and watched the speechless, quivering lips, and marked that woman of a sorrowful spirit in the agony of her voiceless prayers, and unlike the High Priest in the holiest now for evermore, misunderstood the broken-hearted suppliant, and reproached her as if the cup which so overflowed for her had been a cup of intoxication instead of one of reproach and grief. And up this hill she came again with her little son, and dedicated him to God, no more speechless and sad, her gratitude overflowing in a song whose prophetic words blend with that other song, also from a woman's lips; that magnificat in which all Christendom shares, singing evermore, "To us a child is born, to us a Son is given."

And to this sanctuary, year after year, she came up again. The feet of her children tripping up this hill-side beside her, their prattling voices in her ears and blending them with hers in thanksgiving, as she brought that annual gift to her firstborn, and clothed him in the little coat her hands had been busy with before she came.

And here, not on the open hill, but in the tented temple, the child Samuel ministered to the Lord, and one night, in the dim lamplight, as he lay down to sleep near the ark, heard that mysterious voice, three times repeated, and at last understood, and answered by the childish voice in the words we know so well, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

Then came the doom of the house of Eli, and the old man, once more sitting on a seat by the wayside (as when before he had marked Hannah), received the terrible tidings of the ruin of his house, and of his people, and when he heard of the capture of the sacred ark, fell backward from his seat and died—on this hillside.

Thus the ark and the divine presence passed from Shiloh, and the name of Shiloh passes from the Bible. The dominion of Benjamin, Ephraim, and Manasseh is transferred to Judah. The sanctuary is transferred to Zion. Then, after the lapse of centuries, the name of Shiloh is heard again from the lips of the prophet of lamentation (Jer. vii. 12-14; xxvi. 8). It had passed into a by-word of desolation and ruin. "But go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh, where I set my name at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel. And now, because ye have done all these works, saith the Lord, and I spake unto you, rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called you, but ye answered not; therefore will I do unto this house, which is called by my name, wherein ye trust, and unto the place which I gave to you and to your fathers, as I have done to Shiloh."

The prophecy evidently made a deep impression, for "Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the Lord commanded him to speak unto all the people, that the priests, and the prophets, and all the people, took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die. Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the Lord, saying, This house shall be like Shiloh, and this city shall be desolate without an inhabitant? And all the people were gathered against Jeremiah in the house of the Lord."

Through the crimes of the later monarchy this desolate hill stood a warning to Jerusalem. To us who had stood so lately on the site of the levelled temple of Jerusalem, and had thus seen both desolations accomplished, the ruin which the Jews of Jeremiah's time knew so well, and the ruin which they thought so impossible, this dreary hill of Seilun had indeed a solemn interest, rare even in this land of promise and of doom.

We turned away from the scene of so many tender and terrible memories, where human hearts had throbbed with such varied passions of grief, and joy, and despair, and resumed our journey.

On the side of a hill near Shiloh we saw the cavities of many tombs. On another height near it we explored two considerable, but not very ancient ruins, of an Egyptian-looking church, supported by pyramidal buttresses, with a few olives near it, and three broken Corinthian columns prostrate inside,—and of a mosque, shaded by a beautiful evergreen oak.

Our visit to Shiloh had taken us out of the main route; for Shiloh (Judges xxi. 19) is on the north side of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah.

From Bethel we came; we had turned to the east out of the highway to see Shiloh, and now we resumed the caravan route at Lebonah (El Lubban), on our way to Shechem (Nablous).

Near El Lubban we made our mid-day halt, in a valley under the shade of olives, and refreshed ourselves with oranges and hard eggs—the contents of our saddle-bags. Here a disappointment befell us, which certainly gave us a strong practical illustration of the value of water in these lands. We had sent the German servant, Wilhelm, to a well a mile off for water, and after waiting for some time, had the satisfaction of seeing him galloping up to us with the water-skin trickling at every step, so that, when he reached us, it only contained a wine-glass full. In a small way we could understand what the Israelites felt at Marah. But there was no resource. We had too long a journey before us to risk fatiguing the horses with any further expeditions, and the precious drops were generously declined by all, and at last conscientiously divided among all, and mixed with wine,—at that moment by far the least valued beverage of the two. That, however, and oranges consoled us; and in an hour or two we remounted and went on our way, over one rocky hill after another, with occasionally a white village cresting some height in the distance, or a grove of olives dotting the hillsides, until on the summit of one of the hills we caught a glimpse, far off, of a tower which we were told was on a height above Nablous. Between us and it rose other lower hills, and a plain or broad valley, in which the brown earth was chequered by a mosaic of that greenest green of young corn. In this valley was “the parcel of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph.”

In descending from the brow of this hill we again lost sight of our landmark and of the plain. In the side of the hill the path wound by a well deep in the shade of a rocky arch. We were too thirsty to consider what the character of the water might be, and eagerly filled our water-bottles to drink. But the water was green and very objectionable. A little further on, at the commencement of the plain near Nablous, we met a shepherd boy with a flock of sheep and goats. We asked him for some of the milk of the flock, and he milked some of the goats for us and gave us a draught. I would recommend no one to try this remedy. The new milk certainly increased our thirst, and, in a very short time, made our throats and lips feel more parched and dry than ever.

But while we were waiting for our beverage we had leisure to consider the scene. We were probably just in the district where Joseph, the shepherd boy, went to see if it was well with the shepherds, his brethren, and well with their flocks. “Jacob sent him out of the vale of Hebron, and he came to Shechem, and a certain man found him wandering in the field.”

These fields, just such flocks as these, and Joseph a shepherd boy, with probably just such a dress as the lad who gave us the milk to drink,—a short tunic, with a wrap like a plaid, over his shoulders, and a crook,—a boy with a clear, brown skin, and a lithe agile figure. He recalled vividly to us the shepherd prince's son, except that Joseph was clothed in the coat of many colours, the coat which was afterwards dipped in the blood of a kid, and taken to bear its false tale of death to the father who gave it.

We turned away with some reluctance from our suggestive shepherd lad, with his quiet white sheep and black goats browsing around him, and rode along the hillside towards the entrance of the valley of Shechem. The valley became very rich, in some places green with young corn, which we believed to be maize, and in others golden with wheat-fields ripe already to the harvest.

Two bandit-like Bashi-Bazouks joined us here, and gave us a specimen of their ingenuity as horsemen, and their regard for the property of the people they profess to protect, by galloping their swift Arab horses through the corn-fields, wheeling round and round among the ripe grain, and ruthlessly trampling it down. We remonstrated in vain through our dragoman. They evidently stood as much in need as any of their predecessors in this oppressed land of the lessons of John the Baptist.

Towards evening we reached the entrance of the valley of Nablous, one of the few places in Palestine which has preserved the intrusive Greek name (Neapolis) instead of the earlier scriptural one, Shechem or Sychar. The narrower valley of Shechem branches off from the broad valley we had been skirting, to the left, between the mountains Ebal and Gerizim.

It is said that no place in Palestine is more absolutely identified as connected with an event in the history of our Lord than this spot. And this spot at the meeting of the valleys, links together the sacred history of more than three thousand years.

Here is Jacob's well, dug by the prudent patriarch, (whose father, Isaac, had had so many disputes about wells), in the parcel of ground he bought of Hamor, and, perhaps, at once given to Joseph, then the only son of Rachel. Here the children of Israel laid the body of Joseph, which they had brought embalmed from Egypt. Here one of the most dramatic scenes in Jewish history was enacted, when the whole multitudes of victorious Israel, with the strangers among them, the women and the children, stood in two great companies, covering these two hills, and probably the valley between and around them, whilst Joshua read the blessings and the curses of the law successively from Ebal and Gerizim, and, from time to time, the deep Amen of the nation echoed from height to height, and swept through the plain. And here Jesus, with all these recollections speaking to him from hill and valley, "being wearied with the journey, sate thus on the well." And to us all the other memories of the plain shine through the light of the last.

We turned off a little to the right to see this sacred spot, but a very great disappointment awaited us. Until last January, they told us, the well had been preserved—a relic of three thousand years, and of one hour worth them all! Until last January you could sit on the edge of the well, and look down into the depths too deep for Him to draw from. But this year the Arabs had broken and scattered the stones, and filled the well with rubbish. The Christians and Turks had been at war in Nablous, a Turk had been accidentally killed by a Christian; and they told us the filling up of this well was an act of revenge on the part of the Moslems, knowing how sacred it was to Christians. It made us feel very bitterly, as we stood among the scattered stones and heaps of rubbish where the well had been.

Near this melancholy ruin is the tomb called Joseph's. It is a holy place of the Moslems, plastered and domed like the tombs of Mohammedan saints. But there is one interesting feature about it in connection with Jacob's blessing to Joseph, comparing him to the "fruitful bough by a well whose branches run over the wall." A fine old vine springs out of the tomb throwing its green leaves and fruitful branches over the wall.

As we rode to and from this tomb some peasants, working in the fields, warned us away from the place with furious gestures, but whether they thought our own infidel feet would desecrate Joseph's Tomb, or our horses' feet injure their fields, we could not make out. Perhaps they were venting on our innocent heads some of the wrongs inflicted on them by our late companions, the Bashi-Bazouks.

We paused once more before entering the valley of Sychar, by the sacred ruined well. Except that sacred relic itself, all was unchanged. Down that narrow valley the woman came with her pitcher, whilst Jesus was resting on this well. The Saviour and the sinner met alone, and to her at first he was nothing more than a stranger and an alien from her race. Then followed that rapidly varying dialogue with its vivid imagery, taken, as so constantly in our Lord's conversations or sermons, from the things in sight at the time; the imagery so suddenly abandoned to flash the unexpected light on her conscience. Then the answer of the woman, betraying how, in hearts where no human eye would suspect a serious thought, deep religious perplexities may be dimly stirring, and how theological uncertainty and moral laxity accompany each other. Probably not a person in Sychar suspected that Samaritan woman of having a conscience, still less of weighing the merits of various religions, and expecting a Christ who would solve all difficulties. Was there, she seems to have thought, indeed, after all, a true faith to be found? The Jews believed one thing and her people another, and there might, perhaps, be much to be said on both sides; the balance of probabilities was pretty even, but might there, indeed, be One who would tell her absolutely which was right? There certainly was one before her, no empty disputant on her own level, speaking without authority, but "a prophet," who knew all her life, yet did not scorn to speak to her. To Him the secret perplexities of the doubting, sin-burdened heart came out.

Words, altogether new to her, came in reply. The controversy was carried to a higher level than her thoughts had reached. It was to be no more Jew or Samaritan; but God and adoring men and women. No more Gerizim, or Sion; but the Father and the human spirit.

One more secret lay in her heart. Through all that life of sin and doubt a dim desire and longing had lived on. The Christ was coming, the expectation of Jew and Samaritan alike. One who could answer all the heart's questions was coming. One who could read all the heart's secrets was before her. In words, at least, she made no inference, but all the secret aspirations of her soul were poured forth.

And she found the answer to which, perhaps, her heart had already almost sprung, "I that speak unto thee am He." Then, also down this valley, unless they had bought bread in that village on the hillside nearer, came back the disciples.

The woman had placed her pitcher by the well. It was not in her hands. She had not drawn any water for herself or for Jesus. But she had understood Him, as so few did. Water-pot, water, all were forgotten. There were men in Sychar who wanted the Christ as she had; there were hearts there who looked for him. She had good news to take. And up that valley, to the city out of sight behind the folding of those hills, sped her eager steps.*

The disciples loved their Master, they had followed him faithfully; they had gone to buy him food while he rested. But when we turn from the Samaritan women to them, it is like turning from earnest, intelligent eyes which read your every glance, to a dull prosaic countenance, beaming, indeed, with the best intentions, but understanding neither glance nor illustration, but

* The other interpretation that the Samaritan woman intended to turn the conversation because it was becoming too personal, is surely unworthy. Could the heart which had suddenly felt itself seen through and through possibly resort to such a wretched subterfuge? Let us take it rather as a proof of the thirst and void existing in the hearts of the worst; and be encouraged to spread these glad tidings exactly the literal words you say and no more. Jesus said, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of;" and the disciples, who had walked with him from Jerusalem, and listened for months to his teaching, of which almost every sentence was an illustration, had no idea that he could mean anything by "meat" but something to eat!

Women and the Pharisees often understood our Lord best. The Pharisees, because their understandings were sharpened by dislike and fear, and "they knew he spoke those parables against them;" and women, because their hearts were warm,—they felt what he meant, felt that sinners might bathe his feet with tears; that He must help a mother whose young daughter was possessed, whether Phœnician or Hebrew: that He would welcome the love which broke the alabaster vase, and poured out the precious ointment.

I wonder if the disciples understood the next parable which our Saviour spoke, or perplexed themselves as to what he could mean by there being "four months to harvest," and yet the fields, so obviously green with the young corn, being "white already to harvest?"

Probably the eye of the Master directed them to the explanation, as, turning from the broad valley behind him, green with the young corn, He said, "Lift up your eyes and look on the fields white for harvest," and as he said so glanced up the valley of Sychar, and watched the Samaritans coming to him,—the golden first-fruits of the harvest of the Gentiles.

They came down that deep valley, probably guided by the woman, no doubt conversing in eager groups as they came, and questioning and re-questioning her, on account of whose saying they had come. And when they reached the well where the Saviour and the disciples were still lingering, they besought him that he would tarry with them.

It was a new incident in that life spent among bitter enemies, and disciples so slow in understanding and heart. The people of Sychar had seen no miracle, they had heard none of those unequalled discourses. They had only heard that One sat on the well, at the opening of their valley, a stranger who saw with prophetic insight into the inmost heart and the past life, a Jew who did not scorn to have dealings with Samaritans. They came all that way in the evening from their city, simply because they had some dim hope of finding the Messiah there.

And when they found Him they recognised him. We do not read that he wrought any wonders among them. We might think it was impossible for him to come to any place without being troubled with compassion by its sorrows as well as by its sins, and healing bodies as well as souls. But we are told nothing of the kind. And for eighteen hundred years since then, his heart being the same, and his arm not shortened, he has been content, whilst healing souls, to let bodily sickness fulfil its work of discipline. Perhaps he could trust these Samaritans enough to treat them in the same way. He abode there two days.

Up this valley, which we were entering, He walked with that listening company and the wondering disciples. Beside this stream they went to that white cluster of flat-roofed houses, nestling among the thick trees.

Here, in the bosom of the hills, amongst the figs, pomegranates, and mulberries festooned with vines, on the fresh grass under the shade of the grey olives, and among the delicious sound of many waters, our Lord abode and taught for two days, and the Samaritans understood him as, perhaps, neither Pharisee nor apostle had yet done, to be not only indeed the Christ, but "the Saviour of the world."

It was Saturday evening as we rode up that lovely valley. Our tents were pitched outside the town under the thick shade of trees, amongst a chorus of streams flowing on every side. And here we were to remain for nearly two days, from Saturday until Monday.

I may add some lines which were written that Sunday at Nablous, to give some consolation for our great disappointment about the ruin of the well.

ON JACOB'S WELL RUINED BY THE ARABS.

They have stopped the ancient well,
Which the patriarchs dug of old;
Where they watered the patient flocks at noon,
From the depths so pure and cold.

Where the Saviour asked to drink,
And found at noon repose;
But the Living Spring he opened there
No human hands can close.

They have scattered the ancient stones
Where at noon he sat to rest;
None ever shall rest by that well again
And think how his accents blessed!

But the Rest for the burdened heart,
The Shade in the wearied land,
The riven Rock with its living streams
For ever unmoved shall stand.

Earth has no Temple now,
No beautiful House of God;
Or earth is all one Temple-floor
Which those sacred feet have trod.

But in heaven there is a Throne,
A Home and a House of prayer:
Thyself the Temple, Thyself the Sun
Our pilgrimage endeth there!

HOURS WITH LIVING PREACHERS.

BALAAH.

WHAT a strange course was his! strange, I mean, regarded theoretically, and without reference to the weakness and wilfulness of men,—not, alas! either strange or uncommon when we think of men as they really are. He first asks the direction of God, and, receiving it, follows it implicitly. He will not go, for the Lord has forbidden him. When the "more honourable" ambassadors press him further, he sins by soliciting God again, and endeavouring to alter his will. He receives his permission; but it is given in anger. See how the worldly heaven is working in his heart, and how nearly, but for the rebuke his madness wonderfully received, he had lost his life for it! But he acknowledges his fault, and is ready to return home,—again a partial return to duty and repentance. Sent forward by God, he still attempts divination, and would fain steal a curse, where he knew that God designed to bless. How long he struggles against the light and truth of God! till at last inspiration overbears him; and he pours out the full voice of prophetic utterance, and seems to lose all hopes of worldly honour and advancement from the faithful fulness with which he speaks cordially forth the divine blessing.

Had he gone home then, and stayed there; poor, but true; unhonoured of Balak, but faithful at the last and in the main to God, we should have drawn a different lesson from his story; we should have magnified the grace of God which had interposed so wonderfully and so often to rescue one who had so long and wilfully endangered himself, and we should have read the lesson of hopefulness and encouragement to those who have often felt tempted to give way, drawn from the example of one who had tottered and staggered over and over again, on the very edge of fatal sin and worldliness, but had at last yielded himself up to the guidance of God's grace, and in the strength of that grace had conquered, and was faithful in the end.

But alas for the deadly gift of cleverness! alas for the danger of that sharpness of wit which leads us to endeavour to compass our ends by indirect and circuitous means! The politician, who could not forego true words, tried his craft. He succeeded, and he failed. He succeeded against man; he failed against God. The evil that he planned, by means of other men's sins he brought about. The personal advancement that he sought was overthrown by miserable death, and a name blasted to all generations in the inspired oracles of God.

Oh, brethren, let us turn our eyes upon ourselves! Can we not read ourselves in much, at least, of this history? How apt we are to totter thus and stagger upon the edge of truth and duty! Not indeed visibly, intentionally, distinctly giving it up and forsaking it; but trying to hold it together with as much of worldly indulgence and prosperity as we can; trying to serve God and mammon, God and our own heart's lusts; trying by all sorts of cunning self-deceit to keep truth (so at least as not to abandon it) and be prosperous, to keep truth and be rich, to keep truth and be popular, to keep truth and be comfortable.

But if a man does thus allow himself to palter with that which ought to be the foundation and basis of all else; if he divides his aim between two objects in his life; if he goes on so, venturing to the very edge of duty and truth continually,—going, so to say, as near to the wind on every occasion as he possibly can, without actually disowning and forfeiting the truth which he believes, and thinks that he is holding fast,—do you suppose that that conflict will continue long? do you imagine that so painful a balance and inward battle can last?

No; by no means: that which the intellect holds will yield and give way; that which the heart loves will gain strength and have victory. At last it must needs be so, whether the ultimate condition of the man be produced by the gradual dying away of the intellectual hold of truth, or by some sudden device of cleverness, like the counsel of Balaam, designed, by a stroke of policy and skill, to gain both objects at once. One way or the other, the worldly heart will have its way. It smother the intellectual faith. It necessarily kills it. The world cannot be taken in to share the empire of the heart without becoming, ere long, the sole ruler and tyrant in it.—George Moberly, D.D. (Oxford.)

"I HAVE PLACED YOU."

THERE is often much comfortable suggestion in a single phrase, a word of inspired Scripture. Jesus said to his disciples in the hour of deepest grief and anxiety (John xv. 16), "I have chosen you and placed you." Our version renders it, "I have ordained you." But the original is simply, "I have placed you (ἔθηκεν)." The place we occupy, then, is his appointment, his choice. We may not like it. It may be a low place, a narrow place. The work it requires may not afford much scope for energy, or excitement to activity, or opportunity for distinction; it may not even be so directly spiritual, or have so proximate a relation as we could wish to the advancement of the kingdom of God. But if Christ by his sovereign providence has allotted it to us, we had better be contented with it and make the best of it.

One of the titles of Christ is "the Captain of salvation." No captain will permit a soldier to quit his place in the ranks because he thinks it below his merit—because it does not give him a good chance to show his courage, or to win distinction in the war. Whether he is placed in front or rear, in the forlorn hope, or among "the reserves;" whether he is attached to a scouting party, or ordered to cover a retreat, or guard the baggage, his part is bravely, watchfully, skilfully, cheerfully to keep the place and do the duty assigned him. No act of disobedience would be more flagrant than to forsake it without orders for one more conspicuous. Even to murmur or "sulk" because of the inactivity or obscurity to which he was consigned would be regarded as disloyal, and expose him to rebuke, perhaps to degradation.

The Captain of the Lord's host—the Captain of salvation—does not require a less prompt and absolute obedience than human commanders.

The most skilful and penetrating officer may be mistaken in his estimate of the capacity and skill of a subordinate. Christ cannot be mistaken in us. He made us. He gave us whatever of talent or grace we have. He will not waste a particle of either. He knows—

"the very niche we were designed to fill,"

and if we will humbly and observantly yield to his guiding hand he will "drop" us into it.

"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" was a prayer which began a glorious career of usefulness.

His own gracious words may calm our disquieting aspirations,—“he that is least among you all, the same shall be great.”

HEART AND LIFE.

It sometimes happens in a great system of machinery, that some break in the gearing cuts off the connection between the central power and the remoter parts. In that event the main wheel, with its shaft, will be seen revolving as regularly as ever, while the far distant belts, and wheels, and bars, are silent and motionless. Now, there is often a break in the gearing between a Christian's heart and his outward life. Let us offer an example or two.

Two Christian women sit chatting together with their sewing. Presently the conversation turns on the character of some neighbour. They mean no harm; but here and there among their random censures and insinuations, are many that might utterly ruin the good name of an innocent man. They are not at heart so unchristian, so inhuman rather, as to design such a result. But their words have played truant from the control of their religious principle. It has never occurred to them that their religion ought to govern every utterance of the lips, as truly as every affection of the soul. Heart and life, which God would have ever to be joined together, they have put asunder.

Again, it is the Christian theory, that all believers are uplifted to a common exaltation, as kings and priests unto God; that they are one in Christ Jesus, united in a bond as enduring as eternity. This is the theory. But how often, in practice, they are found conniving at a miserable exclusiveness in social life,—prating of their “set” and their “position” in society, and their “peculiar affinities,”—as if an interest in atoning blood were a groundwork of friendship too common, too low, for their taste. This exaggeration of the natural and necessary inequalities of life into artificial walls of distinction, is simply an encouragement of the earth-born selfishness that would gladly bury from view the one, grand, eternal distinction between the friends and the enemies of God. And yet, he would sadly err who should reason back over-confidently from this poor folly in the lives of many Christian believers, to infer from it their heart's condition. There is a break in the gearing. They have never drawn out their religion to reach their social usages; never paused to consider that it ought to control those usages as truly as their church-worship.

Others break loose, in another direction, from the control of their inward Christian principle. They bother and fret at their social position, are incessantly on the outlook for a slight, and construe into an affront the most innocent oversight. Discontent is their chronic disease. They do not feel at home in the church. They have been members of it three or six months, and nobody has called on them, except three or four humble folks who ought to have had less presumption. So, continually talking of and emphasizing the very social distinctions of which they complain, they grumble at all below and all above them, nursing their pet grudge as a silly woman nurses a whining poodle. Yet they may be, on the whole, true believers. They have never brought their religion into contact with this peevishness; for an electric shock to the latter would have awakened them to serious reflection.

There are, in short, more practical sins than we have time to enumerate, committed by genuine believers; sins which too clearly show that the spiritual life—blood at the heart has not yet been driven out to the extremities. What is wanted is not so much more religion, desirable as that may be, as the equal diffusion of the religion already possessed over all the affairs of life.

THE RIVER OF SPEECH.

THERE flows a river through the earth,
From hills of heaven it hath its birth;
Through all the lands that stream hath gone,
For men to float their thoughts upon.

Some send rich fleets of myrrh and gold,
Ships argosied with gems untold!
And though the men upon the shore
Bind them upon their hearts, the store,
Like prophet's oil, grows more and more.

And some send flowers from holy lands,
That float to little children's hands;
And some—alas! that this should be—
Send ships, that sail to meet the sea,
Beneath the pirate's flag of black,
With wreck and rapine on their track.

And some send idle straws alone;
And some rich seeds, that may be sown
In quiet creeks; for they will rise
Dear flowers to aching hearts and eyes.

And some send holy words that shed
A strange light on the river's bed—
A light so steady, earnest, fair,
You almost think God's stars are there.

Long years ago, past ships and stars,
A fleet sailed through the Eastern bars,
And on the wave a heavenly spell,
A silent consecration fell;
The stream grew holy as it bore
Christ's spoken thoughts from shore to shore.

"ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."*

PART FIRST.

TO those who have watched, of late years, the tendencies of religious speculation, and sought to trace them to their source, it must have seemed not improbable that the Christian faith of these lands was about to pass through an ordeal different, in some well marked phases, from any it had previously endured.

Its history records many an attempt on the outworks of the citadel, and its literature remains to prove that if these have been hotly assailed, they have been as valiantly defended. But none who have observed the recent movement in the hostile leaguer, the patient care and skill with which they have traced their parallels, the gradual and cautious manner in which they have pushed their approaches, and the point to which all these zigzags and covered ways were converging, could fail to perceive that the next attack would be made on the stronghold itself. Nor were there wanting indications that the ranks of the enemy would be reinforced by some strange auxiliaries.

The volume to which certain notorious incidents have given a factitious importance and wide-spread currency is but the newest, as it is far from the ablest, development of principles that have been long insidiously at work,—with which, indeed, in one or other of the many forms of the so-called Negative theology most of our Christian communities have been unhappily familiar. The sensation it has produced has been not unlike that of a masked battery suddenly opening fire at a point to which general suspicion had not been drawn. This is by no means so dangerous as the stealthy mining that had been carried on so long underground. True, the armament is heavy, and the report has been loud; but on a closer investigation, it is found that most of the seven guns bear the mark of Teutonic foundries, and are of a construction superseded in their birth-place by more modern improvements.

Besides, it is but fair to acknowledge that each of the seven assailants claims to be responsible solely for the injury his own independent aim may have occasioned, and has no idea of being involved in the general result of the discharge should it prove to have been serious. Each writer stands apart from his associates; no critic need attempt to construct a Harmony of these seven Rationalist Gospels. Each is no more to be held liable for aught beyond his own share of the book than the pamphleteers who have taken opposite sides in a public question, are to be held answerable for the contents of the volume into which they are promiscuously gathered after the controversy is ended, because they happen to be bound up within the same boards, and to repose in amicable and dusty oblivion, side by side, on the same elevated shelf of the library.

"It will readily be understood that the authors of the ensuing Essays are responsible for their respective articles only. They have written in entire independence of each other, without concert or comparison."

We fear that this concession will not be made so frankly as the sanguine writers anticipate. Since the philosophy of Epicurus was exploded, people are slow to believe in a fortuitous concourse of atoms,—nor do we see how, on their own showing, it can be made, when in this Prefatory Note they immediately proceed to express a hope that, from certain merits which they believe it to possess, the volume will result in "advantage to the cause of religious and moral truth."

Abstracting our view, for the present, from the general tendency of the book, we cannot hesitate to admit that, in the method of treatment the writers have adopted, there is a marked diversity. We know not whether it has been by accident, but so it is, that the opening and closing Essays, in their prevailing tone, contrast very strikingly with the others that form the substantial matter of the volume. With all their defects and ambiguities, in spite of their latitudinarian sympathies, and their uncertain or misleading utterances on essential points, they are pervaded by a higher tone of Christian feeling, and exhibit a less violent and painful departure from the truths and facts of Revelation as they are commonly believed among us.

There is at least a spirit of reverence in the Essays of Dr. Temple and Mr. Jowett, which might lead us to hope that Christianity is to them something different from what it appears in the remorseless criticism of Dr. Rowland Williams, or the chilling materialism of Baden Powell. Yet, in their unguarded expressions and license of speculation, untrammelled by any definite system of doctrine, it is not difficult to detect those principles in germ which are capable of being worked to the most destructive results by less fastidious hands.

The essay on the "Education of the World" is an ingenious development of the theory, that in the training of the race there is an analogy to the training of the individual, each having its three stages of childhood, youth, and manhood. "First came Rules, then Examples, then Principles: First came the Law, then the Son of Man, then the Gift of the Spirit. The world was once a child under tutors and governors, until the time appointed by the Father. Then, when the fit season had arrived, the Example, to which all ages should turn, was sent to teach men what they ought to be. Then the human race was left to itself, to be guided by the teaching of the Spirit within."

The distinction between the first and second of these periods is defined clearly enough by the expansion of the Old Testament dispensation into the New. But when we come to the transition point, from youth to manhood,—the period when the Church advanced from the lower stage of education by Example to the higher, of teaching by the Spirit, we are hopelessly bewildered. For while, according to the essayist, the Church of the early Christian centuries was still in its fresh impulsive youth, we are told that the Church of mediæval times was from circumstances obliged to revert to the discipline of Law, that is, the education of the world for several centuries was retrograding,—the dull pupil sent back to his rudiments in the close dim school of his childhood. We are left to infer, for we have no certain utterances, that the dispensation of the Spirit begins with the Reformation, or perhaps rather later, with the establishment of the idea of "toleration," and the rise of the modern school of free interpretation,—its tendency being "to modify the early dogmatism by substituting the spirit for the letter, and practical religion for precise definitions of the truth."

On a further view, the "gift of the Spirit" resolves itself into scientific culture and intellectual enlightenment. "The age of reflection begins. From the storehouse of his youthful experience the man begins to draw the principles of his life. The spirit, or conscience, comes to full strength, and assumes the throne intended for him in the soul. As an accredited judge, invested with full powers, he sits in the tribunal of our inner kingdom, decides upon the past, and legislates upon the future, without appeal except to himself. He decides, not by what is beautiful, or noble, or soul-inspiring, but by what is right. Gradually he frames his code of laws, revising, adding, abrogating, as a wider and deeper experience gives him clearer light. He is the third great teacher and the last."

It will be remarked that the "spirit" and the "conscience" are identical. This is the "spirit" (not "Spirit" in the sense of a divine personality) which leads the soul, whose office it is to guide us into truth. The law which governs and educates the grown man is "a voice which speaks within the conscience and carries the understanding along with it; a law which is not imposed on us by another power, but by our own enlightened will." For this illumination of the will the grand requisite is knowledge, knowledge of any and every kind, "for every increase in our accumulations of knowledge throws fresh light upon the religious problems of our day." At this time "the great lever which moves the world is knowledge, the great force is the intellect." "In fact, no knowledge can be without a beneficial effect on religious convictions."

It must be confessed that there is something like magnifying one's office in all this,—a kind of consciousness of the writer's professional position. The Master of Rugby delivers these platitudes with an oracular tone, as though it had never occurred to him that knowledge is not wisdom, and that faith, love, reverence more than intellect, are the real dynamic forces of the soul. The Church of the future would seem to be a reunion of men of science, transcendental philosophers, and Biblical critics,—its Scriptures an Encyclopædia,—its evangelistic agencies Societies for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. Full provision is made for the cultivation of the mind; heart and spirit are left to educate themselves.

All the truth there is in Dr. Temple's essay has been long ago condensed into the lines of Tennyson:—

"I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the sun."

It was scarcely worth while to perform so elaborate a fantasia on a theme so simple. Surely if the history of civilization, or as Dr. Temple would prefer to call it, the education of the world, has proved anything beyond all doubt, it is that a high degree of intellectual culture and æsthetic refinement is quite compatible with utter moral debasement and corruption.

The Essay on "Bunsen's Biblical Researches," by Dr. Rowland Williams is, from beginning to end, a daring and unscrupulous attack on the divine authority of the Old Testament Scriptures. It is characterized by a spirit of bitter hostility to the idea of Revelation, in the ordinary meaning of the term, as a communication of the divine will by God himself to his fallen creatures. The writer seems practised in the rhetorical artifice of reckless hardihood of assertion, and is at a loss to find words strong and stinging enough to express his pity and contempt for the ignorance, or credulity, or hypocrisy which clings to the ancient faith in these records as preternaturally inspired.

Of all these essays (with perhaps the exception of the contribution of Professor Baden Powell), we might single out this as the most utterly possessed by the evil spirit of scepticism,—that last and worst phase of scepticism, which glories in levelling the barriers with which the piety of generations has fenced in holy ground. It is surely an ominous sign when the hand of the priest rends the veil and lays open the innermost mysteries of the Temple to the unhallowed gaze of every intruder. This pre-eminence amongst his brethren belongs to the Vice-Principal of the Theological School of Lampeter. Of the seven vials, his is charged with the most malignant and corrosive poison. One might have looked for some trace of regret or compunction at the necessity (if such he deemed it) of taking away from simple minds, and lowly believing hearts, that which they had learned to love and value as a precious heritage of truth, the faith that had so long taught them how to live and how to die. But we look in vain; once and again we are reminded of him who "sapped a solemn creed with solemn sneer," only Gibbon was not an Anglican divine, intrusted with the function of training young men for the Christian ministry. This essay is the most significant in the book, both as showing the length to which the leaders of the new theological school are prepared to go, and as exhibiting the critical processes by which they have worked out their results.

Throughout this review, Dr. Williams stands forward in the character of an expositor of Bunsen, not avowedly endorsing all his theories, contenting himself at times with a simple statement of them, but not seldom taking them up, and giving them a freer development and more destructive application. The German scholar has not been generally supposed to have erred on the side of over-fastidiousness or cautious reserve in his treatment of the Hebrew Scriptures; but more than once his commentator regrets his timidity, and does not shrink from carrying out his principles to bolder conclusions. As a specimen of his manner, we may quote his remark on Bunsen's opinion, that the valid historical portion of Genesis begins with Abraham, whose character he is inclined to admire: "A sceptical criticism might indeed ask by what right he assumes that the moral dimensions of our spiritual heroes cannot have been idealized by tradition, as he admits to have been the case with physical events and with chronology rounded into epical shape." Or again, his reference to the belief which Bunsen was not disposed to surrender in the descent of mankind from a common father: "He could not here vindicate the unity of mankind if he had not asked for a vast extension of time for the development of commerce and government, and still more of languages and physical features of race, whether his petition of twenty thousand years be granted or not." No one can read these passages without feeling that the reviewer indicates his own leaning to the belief that both the Biblical account of man's creation and the history of Abraham may be relegated to the domain of legend. All the earlier portion of Genesis may be swept away amidst the rubbish of rabbinical cosmogonies and fanciful genealogies, the clumsy fabrication of a later age. Dr Williams may not know, or it is not convenient to avow the knowledge, that one of these expurgated chapters, the tenth of Genesis, containing the "Toldoth Beni Noah," the Genealogies of the Noachidæ, has extorted the admiration of modern ethnologists, who have believed they found in it anticipations of their greatest discoveries. For example, in the second verse, the striking discovery of Schlegel, which the word "Indo-European" embodies, the affinity of the principal nations of Europe with the Aryan or Indo-Persic stock, is indicated by the conjunction of the Madai or Medes (whose native name was Mada), with Gomer or the Cymry, and Javan or the Ionians.* When a French philosopher, who had evolved an ingenious theory from the depths of his own consciousness, was informed that all ascertained facts were dead against it, he quietly remarked, "So much the worse for the facts!"

The peculiar value of the "liberal criticism," according to Dr. Williams, is that "it reduces the strangeness of the past into harmony with the present." It throws everything miraculous into its crucible, melts it down, and then points triumphantly to the residuum of myth which the process leaves. Thus it pronounces the deluge to be a prolonged play of the forces of fire and water, rendering the primeval regions of Asia uninhabitable, and urging the natives to new abodes. It was the "fierce ritual of Syria, with the awe of a divine voice," that bade Abraham slay his son; but instead of doing this, "he trusted that the Father whose voice from heaven he heard at heart was better pleased with mercy than sacrifice, and this trust was his righteousness." In this surprising elucidation of Scripture it is hard to say whether the exegesis or the theology is more to be admired. The Avenger who slew the firstborn of Egypt "may have been the Bedouin host, akin nearly to Jethro, and more remotely to Israel." The passage of the Red Sea "may be interpreted with the latitude of poetry;" the probability is that Pharaoh was not drowned. This method of "reducing the strangeness" of the last of Egypt's judgments is an apt illustration of Pascal's remark, "O infidel, great is thy faith!"* An irruption of Bedouins, with such results, would seem, to unrationalistic minds, the greater miracle of the two. After this, we cannot wonder that "it provokes a smile amidst serious topics," on the countenance of the Cambrian divine, "to observe the zeal with which Bunsen vindicates the personality of Jonah and the originality of his hymn."

The same purpose of eliminating from Scripture everything that savours of "irrational supernaturalism" is carried out with relentless consistency in the writer's views of prophecy. In no other sense does he admit that the Hebrew prophets could foretell future events, than as gifted with that presentiment or sagacity which belongs to superior minds in every age—the attribute of men endowed by native powers, "the vision and the faculty divine," with a clearer insight or a wider outlook than their fellows. The idea of "literal prognostication" is dismissed with a sneer. Especially is the Messianic character of the Jewish predictions denied. The Christology of the Old Testament, which yields such affluence of material to the devout researches of a Hengstenberg, shrivels up to one doubtful passage in Zechariah and another in Isaiah; and there is every hope that, by a better adjustment of critical lenses and more skilful manipulation, these will also yield, and the last diamonds in the crown royal be carbonized. The writer cannot sufficiently admire the masterly analysis by which Baron Bunsen proves that the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah is a poetical amplification of the sorrows of Jeremiah. "Jeremiah compares his whole people to sheep going astray, and himself to a 'lamb or an ox brought to the slaughter.' He was taken from prison, and his generation, or posterity, none took account of; he interceded for his people in prayer, but was not the less despised and a man of grief, so that no sorrow was like his; men assigned his grave with the wicked, and his tomb with the oppressors; all who followed him seemed cut off out of the land of the living, yet his seed prolonged their days; his prophecy was fulfilled, and the arm of the Eternal laid bare; he was counted wise on the return; his place in the book of Sirach shows how eminently he was enshrined in men's thoughts as the servant of God; and, in the book of Maccabees he is the gray prophet who is seen in vision fulfilling his task of interceding for the people."

Masterly as is this feat of critical legerdemain, Williams inclines to the belief that by the "Man of Sorrows" is meant collective Israel, or the faithful remnant who had been persecuted by their brethren, and improving upon this conception, we have the audacious announcement that "Israel might be acknowledged as, in some sense, still a Messiah, having borne centuries of reproach through the sin of the nation." Thus wantonly is this innermost shrine, the Holy of holies of the prophetic sanctuary, violated, and a sacrilegious hand laid upon the ark to rifle its mystic treasures. The Jewish rabbins interpreted this chapter as a prediction of the Messiah, but the divinity professor of St. David's is less Christian than Jonathan the Targumist.

EPISTLES OF CHRIST.

A SERMON TO THE YOUNG.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT.

"Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men: forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart.—2 COR. III. 2, 3.

An epistle is a letter. The true Christians at Corinth served as letters to recommend both Paul the servant and Christ the Lord. The neighbours, whether Jews or heathens, learned from the holy life of the converts that the minister who taught them was true, and that the Saviour in whom they believed was divine. The apostle starts with the thought that the Corinthian disciples were a certificate in favour of himself as a minister, but he soon glides from that thought into a greater thing; he goes on to speak of the Corinthian disciples as being like written letters, in which all men may read of Christ.

It is of this second and greater thing that we propose to speak. Our subject is: CHRISTIANS ARE EPISTLES OF CHRIST. The text tells five things about this kind of letter:—

- I. THE PAPER.
- II. THE WRITING.
- III. THE WRITER.
- IV. THE PEN.
- V. THE READER.

I. THE PAPER, or the material on which the marks are made. Many different substances have been employed in successive ages of the world to receive and retain written words, but one feature is common to them all: in their natural state they are not fit to be used as writing materials; they require a process of preparation. Even the primitive material of stone must be polished ere the engraving begin; all the rough places must be made smooth. The precious stones containing the names of the twelve tribes, and together forming the high priest's breastplate, were not capable of taking the engraving on when first the Hebrews found them. A sore and tedious labour was laid out on them ere all the sharp corners were rubbed off, and a glassy polish imparted to the surface. The reeds, and leaves, and skins which were used as writing materials by the ancients, all needed a process of preparation also; and therein they are like the living epistles of Jesus Christ, who must be renewed in the spirit of their minds ere they show forth the Redeemer's likeness in their life. But the preparation of modern materials for writing, although it was not directly before the apostle's mind, contains in fact more points of likeness to the renewing and sanctifying of believers than any of the ancient arts.

Although the text does not directly refer to paper, a substance invented long after it was written, there is a remarkable likeness between the method of its manufacture and the work of the Spirit on a disciple's heart and life in preparing them to be epistles of Christ. "Filthy rags" are the raw material of the manufacture. These are with great care and labour broken very small, and washed very clean. They are then cast into a new form, and brought out pure and beautiful, ready to get a new meaning impressed on their smooth, bright breast. Paper from rags is, in an obvious and important sense, "a new creature." From all its filthiness it has been cleansed. There is now no spot nor wrinkle upon it, nor any such thing.

Such a process of breaking down and building up again takes place every time that the writing material is prepared for an epistle of Christ. You might as well try to write with pen and ink upon the rubbish from which paper is manufactured, as expect legible evidence for the truth of the gospel in the life and spirit of one who has not gotten "a clean heart"—who has not been born again.

The paper manufacturer is not nice in the choice of his materials. He does not throw away a torn or a filthy piece as unfit for his purpose. All come alike to him. The clean and glancing cloth laid aside from a noble's table and filthy rags from a beggar's back are equally welcome. He throws both into the same machine, puts both through the same process, and brings out of both "a new creature," pure and spotless. How very like the kind that our Lord accepts!—"This man receiveth sinners;" "Go ye to the highways and hedges, and as many as ye can find bid to the marriage." Christ does not find on earth any pure; he makes them. Those that stand around the throne in white clothing were gathered from the mire. They were once darkness, though they are now light in the Lord. Let no one think that he can be taken to heaven because he is good; but let no one think Christ will not receive him because he is evil. Him that cometh Christ will in no wise cast out. "The blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin."

Not on tables of stone, like those on which the law was graven, but on tables of flesh must the mind and likeness of Christ be written. Give the Lord your heart. He desires that his own name and holiness should be written there. Surrender it to him that he may blot out its stains, and mark it for his own.

II. THE WRITING, or the mind and meaning which is fixed on the prepared page. It is not Christianity printed in the creed, but Christ written in the heart. The mind of Christ is so graven in the heart, that his likeness shines through in the life.

It is well understood that a person's character may be best learned from his letters. These seem to be windows in his breast through which you may see his nature. How eagerly the public read the letters of a great man if they are printed after his death! People expect to know better by these than by any other means what the man really was.

As our Redeemer left no monument of himself in brass or marble, so he left no letters written by his own hand. He did not write his mind on tables of stone or on sheets of parchment. Even Rome, with all her rage for relics, does not pretend to show the Saviour's handwriting. Yet he has not left himself without a witness. He has left letters which truly make known his mind. Ye are "epistles of Christ." True disciples, whether young or old, when he desires to let the world know himself, he points to you. If you are renewed into his image, he expects you to walk in his steps. The world judges of Christianity chiefly from the life of Christians.

So Jesus sends a letter to the world, a letter to the people of the city, a letter to the members of a family. A merchant who is a disciple of Christ goes to India or China, to carry on his business. He sells manufactured goods, and buys silk or tea. But all the time he is a letter sent by the Saviour to the heathen. A boy becomes an apprentice in a great shop; but before he was bound to his master on earth, he had been redeemed by a Master in heaven. He is now, therefore, a letter from that Lord to all his shopmates. In his truth, and love, and gentleness they should learn the mind of Christ.

III. THE WRITER. The letter is written by the Spirit of the living God. Some writings and paintings look well for a while, but are easily rubbed off by rough usage, or grow faint with age. Only fast colours are truly valuable. Human art has found the means of making them lasting. The flowers and figures painted upon china ware, for example, are burnt in, and therefore cannot be blotted out. As long as the cup lasts the painting remains bright.

How shall we get a writing or a likeness made durable on a human heart? One thing we know,—many beautiful things in look and lip, which people admire for a day, are blotted out soon. Lessons that human hands lay on are not able to stand the rough treatment of the world. All the education which you can get at school is not enough. Its fair characters and beautiful colours may be soon stained by evil passions steaming within, or scratched by cruel treatment from without. We cannot make the writing deep enough on those secret tables of flesh. We cannot warrant it to keep the colour.

No writing on a human soul is certainly durable except that which the Spirit of God lays on. The process is in one aspect like writing, but in another it seems rather to be a kind of printing. The whole meaning is, in the Scriptures, set up like types, once for all. Then the Scriptures are impressed upon the heart, as the types are applied to the page. It is when the truth from the Bible is pressed into the soul by the Holy Spirit that any one becomes a new creature. Old things pass away, and all things become new. Henceforth the Christian bears about upon his character the likeness of Christ.

And there is also a kind of burning to make the writing durable. In conversion there is a sort of furnace through which the new-born pass. We must take up our cross when we follow Christ. We must part with a sinful pleasure, although it were as dear to nature as a right arm. Through this fire and water the Holy Spirit leads us, but he brings us into a wealthy place. It is gladsome as well as safe to "pass from death into life" in conversion; but there is something to be stripped off and something to be put on in the passage which you will never forget. Don't deceive yourselves; when, by the Spirit's ministry, you put on Christ, so that you shall be like him ever after, you must put off some things with which it is painful to part. "No man can serve two masters." In coming to Christ you must part with all that would displease him.

IV. THE PEN. In writing the new name and new nature on the tables of the heart, the Holy Spirit employs some instrument. It is expressly said in the text that Paul and the young evangelists who assisted him had a hand in the work. The terms, "ministered by us," show the place of man in the work of conversion and purifying. It is not a high place that the minister stands in, but it is the right place, and he cannot be wanted.

In photography it is the sun that makes the portrait. There is no drawing of the outline by a human hand, and no shading of the figure according to rules of the painter's art. The person stands up in the light, and the light lays his image on the glass. Yet in this work there is room for the ministry of man. Without the ministry of man the work could not in any case be done. A human hand prepares the plate for securing the picture, and adjusts the instrument for throwing the light at the proper moment on the prepared surface. Although in the real work of making the picture the artist has no hand at all—although he has nothing more to do in the end than stand still, as Israel did at the Red Sea, and see the work done by the sun, his place is important and necessary.

A similar place under the ministry of the Spirit is given to the ministry of men. God does not send angels to make the gospel known. We learn it from men of flesh and blood like ourselves. Cornelius and his house will be saved, but Peter must go from Joppa to Caesarea and open up to them the way of salvation. The Ethiopian treasurer searching the Scriptures in the desert will find the Saviour whom he seeks; but not until Philip is sent from Jerusalem, a skilful evangelist, to guide the earnest but ignorant African. It is thus that the Lord employs parents, ministers, teachers in the present day as the instruments of breaking hard hearts and binding broken ones. Nor does he confine himself to any class of instruments or any age. "Ministering children" are often used to bring the word home in power, where older ministers are not admitted. A child forgiven through the blood of Christ, and loving the Lord that bought him, may be employed, like a little vessel, to convey the water of life to another child whose heart is like the dry ground. In some cases the glad voices of believing children, singing a spiritual song together, have made a path for Jesus into the heart of a full grown man, who was living without God in the world. Children who are themselves truly on Christ's side, may become the means of winning others; for the Lord delights to do his own great work by feeble instruments.

V. THE READERS. They are a great number, and of various kinds. The words have a very wide range, for it is said that these letters are "known and read of all men." The meaning is, that the writing is not a letter sealed or locked up in a desk, but exposed daily to public view. These epistles walk about upon the streets, and mingle with the crowds in the market-place. Every one who likes may read them: they are open to all. Some who look on the letters are enemies, and some are friends. If an enemy see Christ truly represented in a Christian, he may be turned thereby from darkness to light; but if he see falsehood, and envy, and anger, and worldliness in one who is called a Christian, he will probably be more hardened in his unbelief. Those who already know and love the truth are glad when they read it clearly written in a neighbour's life,—are grieved when they see a false image of the Lord held up to the eyes of men. Christians, old and young, seeing that you are epistles of Christ open to public gaze, read by friend and foe, what manner of persons ought you to be in all holy conversation and godliness?

Take some lessons away with you in the close:—

1. Every one's life is an open letter. Some are epistles of Christ; some are epistles of vanity; some are epistles of covetousness; some are epistles of selfishness. The spirit that reigns within is more or less visible outwardly in the life. In some countries the master's name is branded into the flesh of his slave, so that if the slave should run away, any one may know whose property he is. The captive may indeed be lawfully "bought with a price," and then he receives the mark of his new master. Thus, whether we like it or dislike it, people may read from our lives, with more or less of correctness, who is our master. The surest way to appear a Christian, at all times and in all companies, is to be one.

2. Some letters are forgeries. Some lives are forgeries too. They give out that they are epistles of Christ, while they are not. The name of Christ is written upon them by some ink of their own invention, but the mind of Christ has not been poured into their nature by the Spirit of God.

3. The letter, besides being true, should be legible—that is, clearly written and so easily read. Some readers are short sighted; and therefore the letters should be large. Some readers are only half-educated; and therefore the letters should be all distinctly and fully formed, no limb left out or contracted. Some readers are blind, and therefore the letters should not only be coloured so as to be seen, but raised up, so that they may be felt by those who cannot see.

We shall not be of much use in a blinded world, until the mind of Christ shall have been so substantially embossed, as it were, upon our whole way, that in the various jostlings of life, those who shut their eyes to the doctrines of the gospel, shall be compelled to feel, as they press against us, what it is to be a Christian.

BIBLICAL HOURS.

BY PROFESSOR KENDRICK.

"Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?"— MATT. x1. 3.

THE question which forces itself on the mind here, and which the Evangelist has not answered, is, What led to this extraordinary deputation of John to Christ? All the other statements of the New Testament indicate John's unbounded confidence in Jesus as the Messiah. He had shrunk from baptizing him; he had seen the heavens opened to inaugurate and attest his mission; he had pointed him out as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and expressed his joy in him as the principal to whom he was but an accessory. And yet, seemingly in the teeth of all this, we have here an abrupt and startling inquiry whether he was in truth the Messiah. The phenomenon is certainly extraordinary, and justifies the most earnest endeavours for an explanation.

The solutions proposed are two: one, that the question was proposed to meet doubts which had arisen in the mind of John; the other, to satisfy John's disciples—to assure them, by bringing them into personal contact with the words and works of Christ, of his divine mission. This latter theory is plausible, but not convincing. John might, indeed, have sent his disciples to listen to the discourses and behold the works of Jesus, but he would scarcely have authorized them to address to him an inquiry so blunt, and so seemingly disrespectful. And again, the disciples put their question directly in the name of their master, "John the Baptist hath sent us to ask thee" (Luke)—and to John is the reply most explicitly and pointedly directed, "Go and tell John again." In short, everything about the transaction points to John as the person mainly interested, and the supposition that it was for the disciples, is improbable and gratuitous.

But how are we to explain the question as coming from John? I answer: it sprung from his misconception of the nature of the Messiah's kingdom. All Israelites expected, upon the coming of the Messiah, the setting up of an immediate, glorious, temporal kingdom. Even the most spiritual had their views alloyed by a large intermixture of secular conceptions. They looked for the breaking of the Roman yoke, the redemption of the temporal Israel, and a restoration of more than the glorious days of David and Solomon. The peace, the prosperity, the splendour which Isaiah had so glowingly depicted, were then to be the inheritance of the nation. Partly, certainly, in this light, we are to interpret the eager gladness with which the multitudes thronged to John's preparatory baptism; the anxiety of Herod to despatch the destined planter of his throne; the enthusiastic hosannahs of Jerusalem when Jesus made his public entry into it. The disciples surely did not fall behind even the religious Jews of their age, in the spirituality of their conceptions of his reign. Yet their disputes as to who should be the greater, pointed to a temporal kingdom, and the question, "Lord, wilt thou now restore the kingdom to Israel?"—put to him on the way to the Mount of Ascension—shows that even the startling phenomena of his death and resurrection had not been able to dialodge the deep-rooted prejudice. Can we doubt, then, that John shared the prevalent misconception of his countrymen? That when he came declaring that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, he had a like expectation of an immediate, glorious, outward empire?

Are we pointed, in reply, to the spiritual declarations of the harbinger in the fourth Gospel—such as, "Behold the Lamb of God," &c.? To this I answer, that John was a prophet—the last prophet of the old dispensation. As such we might expect from him prophetic utterances, and that, too, clear in proportion to his more favoured position and the nearness of the fulfilment. But we need not suppose any deviation in his case from the ordinary law of Old Testament prophecy. He did not himself fully understand the import of his own predictions. One of the greatest trials with which our Saviour had to contend to the last in his disciples, was their grovelling and unworthy ideas of his work and kingdom. Was John exalted so entirely above them?

In my opinion, we are not left to mere inference. The point is decided by the express testimony of the Saviour. He pronounces in the hearing of the multitude an exalted eulogium upon John, declaring that as a prophet, and more than a prophet, as his own harbinger, he stood fully on a level with the most eminent of the earlier saints. Abraham, Moses, David, Isaiah, none of those could take rank above John. And yet, adds the Saviour, the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. This is no personal derogation from the character of John. It shows the difference of the dispensations—the measureless superiority of the new and spiritual over the old and more secular economy. I answer here, what I do not believe is liable to any valid questioning, that the kingdom of heaven means here the new dispensation which Christ was about to set up, and that his language is simply equivalent to saying that the humblest subject of it stood in knowledge and privilege above the highest of the old. A beautiful commentary on the passage is his language to his disciples,—“Blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear; for verily I say unto you, that many prophets and kings have desired to see the things that ye see, and have not seen them, and to hear the things that ye hear, and have not heard them.”

Our Saviour's authoritative declaration, then, declares the inferiority of John. It puts him among the prophets of the past dispensation,—the last and the greatest of them, indeed, but still of them, dwelling amidst their shadows, and not emancipated from that element of earthliness which attended the clearest revelations of the old economy. This, too, is our Lord's explanation of and apology for the conduct of John. He had sent to Christ because he did not understand the nature of his kingdom—its thorough spirituality. Hence he was vexed with his delay, with his lingering in obscurity, with his contenting himself with performing miracles among the peasantry of Galilee, instead of seating himself on the throne of David, and arraying himself with the glories of an earthly potentate. He was, in fact, stumbled, offended in Christ. And he sent the deputation to remind him how tardy was his procedure, how he was failing to meet the expectations which greeted the destined Monarch and Redeemer of Israel. The question was not one of innocent ignorance seeking information, but of prejudice, misconception, and presumption, which demanded a rebuke.

And the Lord rebuked him. In language delicate, dignified, and severe, he referred John to the works of beneficence and mercy which he was performing, and then adds gently, yet severely, “and blessed is he who-soever shall not be offended in me.” John had been offended in Christ, and in sending this deputation he had shown how the weakness of the man and the prejudice of the Jew blended itself with the majesty of the prophet and the forerunner.

Let me beg the reader now to look at the whole carefully in connection, and especially to put the passages containing the question and answer alongside of that containing our Lord's comment on John's position. They mutually explain each other. They fit together like lock and key. The question from John shows what suggested the declaration of his inferiority, and this declaration again is a commentary upon the question. And as they harmonize with each other, so they harmonize with the usual tenor of the New Testament passages.

Let me add two reflections: First, this mission, thus interpreted, adds John to the list of Scripture worthies whose failings, as well as their virtues, inspiration has faithfully revealed. Abraham, Moses, David, Solomon, all appear with their faults more or less grave. Peter, in the next breath after receiving an emphatic blessing for his sublime confession of faith, is rebuked with severity for his utter failure to understand the true work of the Messiah. And so here the faithful pen of inspiration has, with its usual apparent unconsciousness, placed the record of one blot on the otherwise stainless scutcheon of the Baptist.

Secondly, my subject reminds us of the cause of that virulence and malignity of hate which accompanied the Jewish rejection of the Messiah. There was with them not merely the working of ordinary human depravity, but the overthrow and utter blasting of their long and proudly cherished national hopes. That glorious kingdom which had been their dream of ages,—whose coming glory gilded the pages of prophets, and swelled into rapture the songs of their bards, was it come to this? This man of Nazareth,—this son of a carpenter, whose retinue was the halt, the blind, the illiterate,—was it in him that all those sublime predictions of the future Deliverer found their realization? Hence the infuriated rage with which they dragged him to the cross, and loaded with execrations, and with all the ignominy which outraged national pride could heap upon him, the impostor who declared that he was the long-looked for Hope of Israel.

TEACHERS AND THEIR TRIALS.

THE village of Ashton lay nearly three miles from the rectory at M——. Long a mere hamlet, it had within a few years increased to a considerable size, in consequence of a manufactory being built on the side of its little stream. The people thus suddenly drawn together were poor and ignorant. Their distance from the parish school made it difficult for children to attend with regularity, and it was evident that the temptation of sending them to the factory before education could be finished was too strong for the parents to resist. Mr. and Mrs. Stanley saw these evils, and felt much anxiety about this outpost of their charge.

A local school for young children appeared the best remedy for the growing evil. By pleading the case with the more wealthy among his people, and liberally assisting from his own funds, the minister accomplished his object. A neat, convenient schoolroom was built, and a young person who seemed well qualified for the post established in it, and considered as under Mrs. Stanley's peculiar superintendence.

"It is more than three weeks, Edward, since I have seen Miss More at Ashton. I think I must take a walk to the school this afternoon."

"Do so, my dear; and I shall make some visits in the same direction, and look in so as to walk home with you."

"Oh, that is right, it will cheer the poor girl; she seems so to value a little kindness from you. Were not you much pleased with the children at your last visit?"

"I was, and with Miss More also. I think, with a little training and experience, she is likely to prove a first-rate teacher. My only fear is that she may be rather too refined and sensitive for her present somewhat lonely position."

"I believe she is one of a much attached family circle, and that the death of their father, about a year ago, made a great change in their circumstances, besides being a deep affliction. Do not you think that teachers as a class are much to be felt for, in their separation from home and friends?"

"You mean female teachers, of course. Men, generally speaking, can seldom expect now-a-days to settle at home. But I never thought of pitying teachers in this respect more than many others,—female servants, for example."

"Yes, a servant, if she wishes, may in general remain within reach of her father's house, but a teacher, either as governess or schoolmistress, is most frequently placed among total strangers. And home seems so naturally woman's native element, that I do feel deeply for those who are called to the trial of leaving it and going into the world alone."

"Well, Frances, we have both in our day known the heart of a stranger, and it becomes us to do all we can to cheer and strengthen others. I hope you will pay a comforting visit to our young friend."

It was lovely summer afternoon, as Mrs. Stanley took the road to Ashton. She walked slowly, sometimes pausing to admire the varied beauties of nature around, sometimes lost in reflection.

"What a sad element," she thought, "is that of separation, among the discipline of our earthly pilgrimage! It is not enough that we must part at last on the banks of 'the river' from those most dear, but how often, long ere we reach that shore, our paths divide, and each has to proceed alone! Could we but, as it were, colonize as taste or affection would desire to choose, and group around us, wherever our lot is cast, all those gifted and congenial spirits who seem most suited to soothe, to cheer, to elevate ours, as we go up through the wilderness to the heavenly Canaan! Ah no! earth would then be too like heaven, the place of exile so attractive, that there would be few longings for the Father's house. He who knows what is truly best for his people must have wise reasons for ordering otherwise."

The beautiful lines of the German poet rose to her memory, and she repeated them as she walked along.

"Thou shalt find kindred hearts, in love united,
And with them in the wilderness rejoice;
Yet stand prepared, each gentle bond untwining,
To separate, at my commanding voice.
Thus said the Lord. He gave, as he had promised,—
How many a loving heart has met my own!
But—ever must the tender ties be broken,
And each go forward, distant and alone!
Then groans of anguish in my soul would rise,
Then tears of sorrow overflowed mine eyes!—
But Thou hast known the bitter parting day,
From the beloved John hast turned away,—
Is this thy will, good Lord? the strife is o'er, Thy servant weeps no more."

But Mrs. Stanley's spirits were naturally cheerful, and before reaching the end of her walk, bright hopes and anticipations of meetings of unclouded joy in a "continuing city" yet to come, had dispelled her feelings of unwonted sadness.

The schoolhouse in Ashton was situated near the end of the village, a little retired from the other dwellings. It was a neat, simple building, and a cottage at one side had been fitted up as a teacher's house. The school hours were now long past, and no children near. Mrs. Stanley knocked more than once at the cottage door without any one replying. She turned to the lattice window, and looking in, saw a female figure seated before a table covered with books and work, leaning forwards, her head resting on and concealed by her hands. The attitude might be one of distress, but a second look convinced the visitor that the poor girl was only asleep. She withdrew from the window, opened the outer door, and knocked at that of the apartment. There was a start, a sudden movement, and then a hearty welcome.

"Dear Mrs. Stanley, I am so glad to see you! And yet I am ashamed,—had you knocked long? I believe I was asleep, I had felt so weary all the afternoon."

The speaker was a young, delicate looking girl, with no pretensions to beauty, but features which brightened up as she spoke with pleasure and intelligence.

"How tired you must be with so long a walk this warm evening! Will you let me make you some tea?"

"I shall be very glad of it on one condition, that you let me help you to carry the things into the garden, so that we may have fresh air and flowers round us. That will be better for us both than sitting in this hot room."

The proposal was received with lively pleasure, and in a short time they were seated together in an old fashioned arbour in the little cottage garden, sheltered by a chestnut-tree from neighbouring eyes. A long friendly talk, in the course of which kind inquiries drew forth many particulars as to her family history, cheered and comforted the young teacher's heart. She soon looked a different being from what she had appeared when Mrs. Stanley first roused her that evening.

"What were you doing, or trying to do, when you fell asleep this afternoon?"

"I was trying to study my German."

"German? I think that you will not find much use for that in Ashton."

"No, not exactly, but perhaps afterwards, or I might give lessons to some of the farmers' daughters."

"Well, I do not like to discourage any kind of mental improvement, but I do think in these fine evenings you ought to be taking air and exercise, when your duties of the day are over, not sitting still at study. Keep your German for the winter nights when you must be within doors. Have you much talent for languages?"

"I am afraid not, I find German very difficult."

"That is an additional reason why you should not spend your strength upon it at present. To teach English thoroughly is your present duty, and ought to be your great object of attention; and from all I have heard and seen, there is no doubt of your being able to accomplish this, with proper diligence and the blessing of God."

"But I thought by learning to teach other things, I might perhaps gain a little more money, and be able to help poor mamma. Oh! if you knew how I desire that."

Her friend's eyes filled with tears as she replied, "My dear Elizabeth, it would be no true kindness, no real help to your mother, but the contrary, were you to overwork yourself now, and have to go home to her in winter as an invalid. I have seen too much of such cases, not to dread this for you."

"But John has been working all the evening, as well as attending college in the day. He could not have gone on without it."

"A young man at his age ought to be able for more than a girl, with safety. Besides, if this is really necessary for him, he may look up to God for strength and a blessing on his labour. But to take proper means for preserving your health you ought to consider a plain duty. No work, you know, of any kind, can be done without the proper instruments, or without their being in good order. Can you sew with a blunt needle, or write with a crushed pen? Just as little can mental work, such as teaching, be done to any purpose without the mind being in an active, vigorous state, and that, by the laws God has established, must depend to a great degree on our bodily health and vigour. Without a regular proportion of fresh air, exercise, and recreation, you cannot expect to feel cheerful and energetic. Do you attend sufficiently to this?"

"Perhaps not; I have so little heart to go out alone, and I often feel so tired."

After some more questions, Mrs. Stanley said, "You must consider me as your doctor just now, and attend to my prescriptions. Rise early, however great the effort may be at first, and go out before breakfast. I do not say take a long walk, but be for at least half an hour in the open air. Take a substantial breakfast, and let your forenoon meal be a light one. When the school hours are over, make a conscience of having a good walk. Come down to see me at the Rectory; visit any of your absent scholars at a distance; explore the roads in various directions, and you will soon fall in with cottages where there are sick or aged inmates, who will gladly welcome your visits, and thus you will have an object for going so far. It is one great advantage of your position, that the evenings are lawfully your own. And they should be spent, in this fine season, as actively as possible, to counteract the evil of the forenoon's confinement." She paused, and took her hand affectionately. "I am sure you love the Saviour, my dear young friend?"

The reply was given with emotion, "I hope so—I desire so—but oh! I am often afraid I love them at home too much, more than Himself. Or else why should I feel so sad and lonely at times as I do?"

"There is nothing sinful, Elizabeth, in your warm home affections, nor in the sadness sometimes occasioned by your lonely situation. Only both must be kept in their right place. You feel your love for your mother prompt you to every exertion that will give her pleasure. So our love to Christ, if genuine, will assuredly lead us to active efforts in his service, as well as frequent communion with himself. And as we come to know him better, and love him more, we shall feel that his presence and sympathy are enough for our happiness, though all earthly sources of enjoyment were taken away. So his afflicted and persecuted people have often experienced; but this lesson is not learned in a day, nor must we wonder that we find it often difficult. But here comes my husband, who will tell you of these things better than I can do."

Mr. Stanley entered the garden as she spoke, and was cordially welcomed. He would not hear of returning to the house, but taking a seat beside them, began to make inquiries as to Miss More's family, and then her own prospects.

"You are engaged in a noble work," he said, "and I wish you much health and energy, with the divine blessing, to prosecute it."

"O Mr. Stanley, you are very kind, but I do not deserve to be spoken of in this way. Many of the children are so stupid, so heedless, and I am often like to lose temper and patience with them. I often feel as if they were making no progress, as if I were doing them no good."

"You must not judge of that from day to day, but by looking back over some space of time. As to losing your temper, that would be a much greater hindrance than the stupidity of the pupils, and there is no remedy for it but watchfulness and prayer."

"You call it a noble work to teach these poor little children to read and sew?"

"Everything is, which has such a noble aim as conveying useful instruction to the human mind, and influencing for good the immortal soul. And with regard to both, we have numberless instances of how much depends on the beginnings, the first bias, the first ideas given, for good or evil. You may not be permitted to teach those children very much, but you may give them a love of knowledge, a desire for it, which will be the true spring of all their future progress and success in life. And for their souls, by the Holy Spirit's blessing, you may be the instrument of doing everything. Children are capable of conversion, as truly as older persons. Besides, by gaining their affection and confidence, you will soon make your way with the parents, and may become of incalculable use to them also. Look upon yourself, in this quiet corner, as a home missionary to old and young. Get a true sense of the importance of your work; nothing will help you so well through it."

"Oh, how I wish my sister Emily heard you. She is a governess in a large school in Bristol. Would you speak in this way to her?"

"Surely, though I would consider her sphere more limited, and to my mind, not so desirable as yours."

"I am afraid it was very wrong and foolish, but I have been often tempted to envy my sister Fanny, and wish myself in her place. She stays at home with mamma, and takes in work."

"She is in her post of duty, and will get a blessing there, and be spared some trials which you must encounter. But there can be no question with any thinking mind as to your own post of duty being a noble one."

"Oh, if I were only nearer them, and could see them often! I think everything else would be easy then. But I do feel often so sad, so alone here." She could not restrain her tears as she spoke.

"My dear young friend," said Mr. Stanley, with much kindness, "it is the will of our heavenly Father that all his children should find this world more or less a scene of trial and discipline. Your portion at present is that of separation from those whom you most love. Seek grace and strength to take up this cross in a right spirit, and it will soon become lighter, as you get more interested in your work, and acquainted with the people around you. But recollect that nothing can separate you from the "Friend that sticketh closer than a brother." Let all your cares and sorrows be taken in faith and prayer to himself. "The joy of the Lord is our strength;" do not rest satisfied without that. Let your personal piety become deeper and more earnest, and it will be like rays of sunshine on every shady place in the pilgrim journey. But this makes me notice that we are in the literal shade now, and the sun going down. Let us join together in prayer before we part."

He commended his young friend, and all her concerns, to Him who is "the stranger's shield, the orphan's stay," and asked for all more simple trust in his wisdom and love, and devotedness to his service. Before leaving, it was arranged that Miss More's next holiday should be spent at the Rectory. And as Mr. Stanley and his wife walked home, they felt how well their evening had been bestowed in lightening and strengthening that young heart.

UNSTABLE SOULS.

[We are indebted for the following paragraphs to "What is Truth?" by the Rev. Ray Palmer, hitherto known to the Christian public of this country by his exquisite hymn, "My faith looks up to thee," &c.]

How large a number fall into the class of perpetual doubters!—of unstable souls, who habitually live in the disastrous twilight of uncertain speculation, and are carried about by diverse and strange doctrines, always catching at a new absurdity to relieve the weariness of dwelling on the last; who, in short, are very much in the condition of Milton's fallen angels when they—

"Reasoned high
Of Providence, fore-knowledge, will, and fate,
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost."

What can be more deplorable than this unnatural, this morbid bewilderment of the soul? A rational nature was surely never made to live in a realm of phantoms that for ever mock it by putting on new shapes. Such a state is, of all things, to be dreaded.

For, in the first place, it must needs be an exceedingly unhappy state. To all minds that have received even a moderate degree of cultivation, it is a source of positive pleasure to have, on all important subjects, clear views and well-defined opinions. The healthful faculties delight in reaching and grasping truth when excited to inquiry. They are gratified at being able to settle things with certainty. So, on the contrary, it is painful to the sound mind to grope about in the "everlasting fog"—to be threading backward and forward the mazy labyrinths of vague inquiry, which chases shadows and catches at emptiness, finding nothing solid on which it can rely. This, we say, is the constitutional law of the mind, let the subject about which it inquires be what it may.

But if the matter in question be one on the right understanding of which great consequences are depending, there must be, in addition to the doubtfulness, the pain of anxious apprehension. The fear of what calamities may, soon or late, result from failure to ascertain the truth, will often haunt the mind and mingle more or less with all its thoughts. Religion, it is clearly seen, if it be anything, is of the highest imaginable interest; and to miss the truth in such an affair, may, it cannot but be felt, involve irreparable loss, disaster that nothing can retrieve. Here is a most effectual cause of disquiet to the soul. How can a man have inward peace, when it is wholly uncertain, in his view, whether he is the offspring of an Infinite Mind, or of a blind chance; whether he has a nature essentially angelic, or is only a better sort of brute; whether he has any certain guide to duty, or is left to find it out by accident; and whether, if he survive the tomb, his happiness or misery will, or will not, be then at all affected by his present character and conduct? Rest content with such questions as these unsettled! A fool may—a man of reflection cannot. You might as well rest content on a stormy sea, when you know not whether your ship be sound or rotten; your chart and compass reliable or worthless; the hoarse murmur which you hear, the howling of the wind, or the roar of the surf that beats on the fatal rocks! Nothing but profound stupidity can give the mind that lives in a state of wavering uncertainty respecting the essentials of religion anything that really deserves the name of peace.

It is also evident, still further, that a state of chronic scepticism tends greatly to enfeeble both the character and the mind. There is a very common mistake on this point. It is no unusual thing to meet with those, more particularly among young men, who have the notion that there is something indicative of a superior mind in a state of doubt. They imagine it a mark of originality and penetration to be sceptical about those things which others confidently believe—to be starting difficulties in opposition to all opinions; and so they are led rather to cultivate an unsettled habit of mind, than to endeavour to escape it. But the truth is just the reverse of this. A really vigorous and healthful mind cannot be satisfied to continue long in a dubious state, when, as is true in the matter of religion, the materials for forming fixed conclusions are at hand. A strong mind presses on to a decision. It is content only when getting at results. A sceptical habit—observe I do not say a season of temporary questioning, but a chronic habit of doubting—most generally indicates a want of mental energy to lay hold of evidence and to appreciate its force; a lack of the strength of mind required in order to rise above the prejudices and biases that embarrass and tend to warp the judgment. It betrays an intellectual feebleness already existing and likely to perpetuate itself.

For when the mind has been allowed, and rather encouraged, to wander among the mists of doubt; to look rather after difficulties, than after proofs; it seems to become incapable of logical deduction and unsusceptible to the effect of evidence. Having accustomed itself to waver, it cannot, when it would, decide; or, if it has in any case decided, it cannot hold to its decision. What yesterday it examined and concluded to be true, it is to-day, just as much as ever, disposed again to question. There is a manifest enfeebling of the power by which the mind, when in a vigorous state, makes use of evidence to establish itself with collected firmness on the solid ground of truth. That it should be so results from well-known laws of mind.

It will also be true that in proportion to this loss of force of intellect, there will be likewise a loss of general force of character. He who is unable to decide with promptness, will not be able to execute with vigour. The habitual vacillation of the mind will be sure to exhibit itself in a feeble, time-serving, irresolute course of action. There is no class of truths which operates so powerfully in forming the whole character as religious truths. There are no motives which produce such energy of purpose as the motives which religious faith supplies. A state of habitual doubting therefore, while it tends, whatever be the subject, to infirmity of mind and character, must tend to this with special force and certainty when it is in relation to the essentials of religion itself that the habit is indulged. Live without any settled views in politics, in philosophy, in practical economy, and you will be a weaker man than you would be with fixed convictions in relation to those subjects. But live in dim bewilderment in regard to the great matter of religion, and the enfeebling influence will be felt in a far higher and more mischievous degree. It will make you vastly more inferior, as a man, to what you would have been with a settled religious faith.

There is yet another evil result of the habit of mind in question. It is very liable to impair the love of truth, and to lower the estimate set on it by the judgment. Truth has been well defined to be "the reality of things." To know truth is to know things as they are. On knowing them in this manner, on having a right understanding especially of those things that directly relate to us, our highest welfare essentially depends. Nothing therefore, in fact, is so precious to us as truth. As Solomon has said—the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. It is more precious than rubies; and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared to it. God has, accordingly, given the mind an instinctive love for truth, a natural desire to know things as they are. It is this that prompts the inquisitiveness of childhood—the prying curiosity that desires to have all mysteries cleared up, and that presses inquiry often back to the very elements of thought. It is an important end of education to encourage and strengthen this desire, and give it a right direction; and observation and experience show that, in respect to many subjects at least, it is, on the other hand, capable of being weakened, and almost or quite destroyed.

It is found, for example, especially easy to repress the instinctive desire to know, when there is occasion to apprehend that the knowledge of the truth might be for any reason painful; and this is the case invariably in respect to sinful man when he inquires about religion. While on this, as on other subjects, he feels the natural desire for knowledge, there are conscious reasons growing out of his own character, which prompt him to resist this desire, and rather to shrink from full and certain knowledge, than to seek it. He is inclined to indulge himself in something. The question, Is it right? suggests itself. If he presses the inquiry, he may find himself obliged to deny his inclination; and he will be very likely for this reason not to press it. The appetite for truth may yield to the stronger appetite for self-indulgence which now has possession of the mind. In every such case, of course, the love of truth must necessarily be weakened. There will be less appreciation of its value than before; and if the oftener the love of truth is repressed for such a reason, the feebler it becomes, it must finally be destroyed. But this is what is happening all the while in the unsettled, wavering, and doubtful mind. The inclination to indulge in all sorts of curious speculations and even idle fancies; to wander round and round from one opinion to another without seriously attempting to settle upon any, resists and gradually overpowers the instinctive appetite for truth. Truth now loses her attractiveness. There is a growing insensibility to her inestimable value; and at last there comes an indifferent recklessness that cares but little whether it has the truth or not; and which is ready to adopt the foolish maxim—that it 'does not matter whether one's opinions accord with the reality of things or not. Great, inexpressibly great, is the mischief done, when the rational soul, in its constitution noble, is thus virtually divested of one of its highest and most glorious attributes. It is fallen and debased, indeed, when its inward longing after truth, and especially religious truth, is felt no more.

It remains only to say finally, that a state of sceptical uncertainty is attended with great danger as regards its last result. To doubt about anything is, of course, to admit the possibility that it is true. To doubt about the claims and obligations of religion is to allow that we are not sure that these are not founded in reality. But while those who are floating on the sea of doubt, confess, by their very uncertainty, that the teachings of religion may quite possibly be true, they are sure to act, in the main, as though certain they were false. So long, for example, as you doubt whether there be a God, you will act, almost with certainty, as though you knew there were none; that is, you will live to yourself alone. So long as you doubt whether the Bible be a supernatural revelation, you will allow it to have little if any more weight with you than if you certainly knew its claims to be unfounded; you will not suffer it to control you. So long as you doubt whether you are to live beyond the grave, you will demean yourself, for the most part, as though the contrary were the fact; you will confine your thoughts to the present life. And then, by the supposition, when you have lived and acted as though these things are false, they may, after all, turn out to be the great and solemn realities which they are believed by religious men to be. When you shall have wasted life and opportunities in urging difficulties, and asking curious questions, and indulging in speculative scepticism, you may, as your doubts imply, awake to the serious certainty that there is a God, that the Scriptures are divine, that your spirit is immortal, that life was a season of probation, and that eternity is the scene of righteous and unending retribution. We are now asserting, let it be observed, that these things are indeed so; we are only saying that since by doubting, you concede that they possibly are true, even to your own judgment it must be clear that you run the tremendous risk of finding them all true, though you have lived as if they were all fiction. It needs no words to show that if you live as though the truths of religion were mere dreams, and it shall finally turn out that they are great realities, you are undone inevitably, and that for ever. This, then, is the amazing peril of resting in a dubious, unestablished frame. Even those who do this cannot but perceive that they run the hazard, the unspeakably awful hazard of a wretched, lost eternity. Religion and godliness, according to their view of things, hang trembling in equal balance. The side of religion may, they admit, preponderate; and if it does, they have made everlasting shipwreck of their souls! How much to be deprecated and dreaded is a position that involves continually the danger of a fall from which there is no recovery!

Do any of you, my young hearers, find the impressions of your childhood giving way, in some degree, so that you feel disposed to question them and to demand on what foundation they are based? You see with what seriousness you should regard the crisis. Never, in all your life, has there been a time when you so greatly needed the counsel of your kindest, most faithful, and judicious friends. To listen now to the cavils of the sufferer; to neglect calm, honest thought and careful reading; to indulge the affectation of singularity in your opinions, or the taste for idle speculation; to please yourselves with the fancy that it is a mark of manliness to doubt; is almost certainly to place yourselves in that permanently evil state which we have been considering. Such a course is worse than folly; it is madness such as words cannot express.

Yes! Believe it, my intelligent young friend—the poor way-faring man, who wanders homeless and friendless over the wide world, finding never a voice of greeting nor a resting-place in which he may take up his abode, is far—far less an object of compassion, than he whose soul is driven about perpetually in the chaos of confused and dubious thought, where all is dim and shadowy, and can find nothing that is stable; who as to the highest and most vital questions of his being, has established nothing, and positively believes nothing! Rather than suffer yourselves to slide into such a state, it were wisdom to suspend all other business, to shut yourselves up in the chamber of meditation and research, and to bend the undivided energies of your minds on this one work of reaching conclusions which will satisfy; and this with humble, earnest prayer to the Father of lights for that divine illumination without which spiritual things are never clearly seen by any of mankind.

HUBERT GOFFIN.

My young cousin Henry has been reading a history of Napoleon Bonaparte.

One evening, as we sat together, he laid down his book, and, with glowing cheek and sparkling eye, exclaimed, "Wasn't he the most splendid man that ever lived? I'd give anything to be half as great!"

The portrait so carefully concealed the blemishes of the hero, and was set withal in so dazzling a frame, that I could not wonder at a boy's enthusiasm in contemplating it. But I said, "Your chance of being half as great as Bonaparte is very good, I think. That is not always great which consists in brilliant achievement. The highest greatness is moral, and seeks the glory of God and the good of others, rather than its own glory. I could tell you of a more noble hero than Napoleon, who lived in his own time."

"I should like to hear of one," answered Harry, with an air that said he was not to be convinced. But he still loved a story; so I told him the following:—

"Years ago, in the deep heart of a mountain in Belgium, a hundred men were working a coal mine. Grim-visaged and dusky, moving about by the dull red light of their safety-lamps, they might have been mistaken for the demons of the mountain, once supposed by the peasants to dwell in its caves. Their work was hard, and surrounded by dangers; but their wives and children were in the hamlet above, and long habit made them forget their perils. So they might be contented, and even happy.

"The creaking windlass raised and lowered a huge bucket through the deep and narrow shaft, from morning till night, carrying men and tools to and fro. This was their only doorway.

"It was noonday, and the sun shone down one side of the shaft, and brought a glimmer of daylight to a part of the mine, when Hubert Goffin, the master miner, took his place in the great kibble, and was let down to the mine, many feet below. When he reached the bottom, he commenced handing some tools and stores to Victor, a blind miner, who was waiting there. Victor had left a sick child in one of the cottages, and it was to inquire after him that he stood waiting at the bottom of the shaft.

The bucket was soon emptied, and Hubert was just stepping out, when hark! What sound was that which made his cheek pale? It was the rushing and trickling of water. The next moment he caught sight of a stream forcing itself through a fissure in the mountain close to the shaft. Hubert's long experience instantly showed him their full danger. It was not a feeble, oozing stream, but a mighty pressure of water that had found its outlet here. They would be overwhelmed—lost!

"One foot was yet in the bucket—a jerk at the rope would save him. But though death stared him in the face, he could not sacrifice others to save himself. Quickly jumping out, he seized blind Victor, and placed him in the bucket, saying, quickly, as he jerked the rope, 'Tell them the water has burst in, and we are probably lost; but we will seek refuge at the further end of the right gallery. Say farewell to our poor friends.' In a moment he was gone, and with him

Hubert's only certainty of escape from a terrible death.

"The mine consisted of long, narrow passages, and on all sides deep caves from which the coal had been dug; the men were all at the further end of the mine, hewing out the solid mountain, unconscious of danger. Hubert quickly made his way along the dark passage, followed by the swift-spreading water, and soon reached his fellow-workmen with the dreadful intelligence. It was a moment for panic, when each would have rushed to certain death in a vain effort to save himself. But looking firmly into their ghastly faces, the master spoke a few courageous sentences,—

" 'Follow my words, lads, and be quick; our picks may save us!'

"Then came a few steady, quick commands, to hollow a new chamber above the level the water would probably reach. The men obeyed in silence, though each knew not but that he might be digging his own grave. A hundred pairs of hands soon finished the work, and into the cave a hundred men crowded to wait for death, or an almost impossible chance of relief. The water gradually filled all the old avenues and chambers, and then seemed stayed. Never was a situation more dreadful. Not more than a day's provisions had been saved; and already two or three of their number had been killed by the falling rocks while hastily digging the new chamber. The long, dismal hours, with no change to mark them, brought only the advance of certain death.

"Courage, brave Hubert! God, who saw thy noble sacrifice, will help thee!

"The terrified friends and townsmen, on hearing Victor's dreadful news, ran wildly about in hopeless panic. But soon, guided by the message Hubert had sent, they commenced working a new shaft as near as possible to the spot where the hapless men might be. Five days and nights they toiled, digging deeper and deeper into the solid side of the mountain.

" 'It is a vain task,' said the men. But the women cried, 'Do not cease! God will help us!'

"At length, on the morning of the sixth day, the muffled sound of blows from within met the ears of the workmen in the shaft. A signal ran along the rope, and told the news to the waiting multitude above, who rent the air with joyful shouts. Soon a communication was made. They were saved—at least, some were saved!

"Who can imagine the feelings of the unfortunate men buried for five days and nights, without food, when first the day gleamed in upon them, revealing a human face.

"Of the hundred who had been imprisoned, over seventy survived, and with them Hubert. Without him, indeed, probably no one would have been spared to tell the story.

"This noble act, done in a place and at a moment when no praise of men could have been looked for, echoed throughout Europe, and obtained the praise and gratitude of the world. The ten thousand miners of Liege hailed their fellow-labourer with delight and pride. Napoleon heard, and admired in his palace in Paris, and sent a reward to the peasant nobleman. He sent him his Cross of Honour, the mark which all the high and great coveted; and better still, offered him a pension which raised him above want for the rest of his life.

"When God unfolds in heaven the secret charity of men, many such heroes shall stand revealed, whom the earth and the waves have covered, sending no testimony to the world. Their Father who seeth in secret shall reward them openly."

BIBLICAL TREASURY.

I.—HUMANITARIAN THEOLOGY.

THERE is a mode of theologizing that wins extensive popularity, but at a heavy cost to the interests of truth. It starts from man as the grand centre, and judges of all things in heaven and earth, actual or possible, by their relation to him. Nothing is to be accounted true which cannot be made out to consist with his ideas of what is reasonable, just, and kind. However clear may be the revelation of a truth in Scripture, it is not to be believed unless we can satisfy ourselves that it is right. Any sophistry of interpretation is better than the admission of a "repulsive" doctrine.

This method of dealing with divine things is very different from that of the inspired writers. Two great principles are assumed by them as certain, and not to be conceded away: That God is just and good, and that his ways are unsearchable by us.

It is not a question with prophets and apostles, whether God is good and just. They do not make it their business to prove the affirmative. They will not listen to the negative. Instead of arguing that a given course would be right, and that therefore it must be God's will, they say, It is God's will, and therefore it must be right. Men now seek to prove that a statement is true, and thence infer that it is the sense of the word of God. Paul says, "Let God be true, though every man should be proved a liar!" According to the Scriptures, God reigns in righteousness, and requires that men should have faith in the righteousness of his will. Abraham might have said, It is cruel to sacrifice my son, and it cannot be God's commandment. That would have been quite in the modern style. But it was not thus that the patriarch became the Father of the Faithful.

The inspired writers equally assume that the will of God cannot be judged by us, because of our insufficient knowledge. If we knew all that he knows, we might be qualified to try the rectitude of his determinations. But we are now wholly incompetent for such an inquiry.

tion. A day is coming when the secrets of men shall be judged, when all the arrears of time shall be settled. It is called "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God." Then it will be seen and acknowledged how just his judgment is. Then "the heavens shall declare his righteousness, for God is judge himself." Now, clouds and darkness are round about him. Who, by searching, can find him out? Then, every eye shall see him. "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence."

Not only is the current humanitarian logic discordant with the tone of Scripture teaching, it labours under a burden too great for it to bear. Every attempt to establish religion upon that basis is a failure. A sermon which we lately read, starting with the proposition that God is good, argues that one of the doctrines of grace must be untrue, because it does not make benevolence to man the highest and controlling principle of the divine administration. The doctrine of atonement, as a satisfaction to divine justice, is also denied on the same ground; God must not be supposed to have any higher reason for his acts than a regard for our benefit. The preacher did not seem to be at all aware that this principle, once admitted, is equally decisive against the doctrine of eternal retribution. He fancied, to be sure, that when he had asserted the doctrine of the will in such a form as to make every man as much the absolute master of his own destiny as if there were no God, he had cleared away all difficulties. It being asserted that men go to destruction because they will do so, in spite of God's grace, the theory is rested on as a rock. But on what does the rock rest? The question at once recurs, Why should God create beings with such powers, knowing that they would make so perverse a use of them as to produce an inconceivable amount of misery, temporal and eternal? Or, shall we deny the divine foreknowledge, assume that God created beings without knowing what they would come to, and suppose that the whole scheme of things is an experiment on his part? That would overturn Christianity at a single blow, for without foreknowledge there can be no prophecy, and the denial of prophecy makes the apostles and prophets "false witnesses for God." When we assume that man does not exist for the glory of God, but that God exists for man's sake, we have denied the reasonable possibility of any religion whatever.

That God is perfectly good is abundantly evident from the revelation he has made. Enough is made known to leave no rational doubt of this. It is reasonable to believe that all his acts are done in the exercise of benevolence. But that is a matter of faith, not of knowledge. Abraham knew that God would command him to do nothing that was wrong, and therefore he surrendered Isaac to sacrifice. Job did not understand why he was made to suffer, but said, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Paul saw, by means of a glass, obscurely, but was willing to wait until he entered on a higher sphere of existence before he should see "face to face." "What I do," said Jesus to Peter—and he says the same to us in many a season of doubt—"thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."—Examiner.

II.—PROPHETIC PHOTOGRAPHS.*

IN respect to prophecy, Dr. Williams tells us that there is "one perhaps in Zechariah, and one in Isaiah, capable of being made directly Messianic, and a chapter possibly in Deuteronomy, foreshadowing the final fall of Jerusalem."

Not being informed which passages of Isaiah and Zechariah are intended, I may be allowed to make a few observations on the single definite prophecy thus graciously left to us by Dr. Williams, the prophecy contained in the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy; for I will venture to assert with confidence that that prophecy alone is sufficient to supply at least the foundation of an answer to the criticism which thus audaciously denies the supernatural inspiration of the Old Testament.

Nearly fifteen hundred years before Christ this prophecy was spoken. It declared the promises of God to the children of Israel in case of their obedience, and his judgments if they should prove finally disobedient. It was spoken when the people still wandered in the wilderness, homeless and landless, and before yet even the sight of their promised inheritance was allowed to Moses. "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as the eagle flieth,† a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; a nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favour to the young." Had Moses mentioned the Romans by name, this would have proved, according to Mr. Jowett's view of prophecy that the words were spoken after the event,—but can description of a nation be mere precise or unmistakable than the description here given by Moses of the Romans, some seven centuries before Romulus? Are they not, as it were, photographed, though not named in these words? "And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout all thy land: and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates throughout all thy land, which the Lord thy God hath given thee. And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee. . . . The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, and toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and straitness wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates."

Need I refer to the horrid tale of "Mary the daughter of Eleazer" told by Josephus, which makes the siege of Jerusalem by Titus,—Jerusalem which did not belong to the children of Israel for some five hundred years after this prophecy was uttered,—conspicuous for "tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be," among all nations?

Is this a case of clairvoyance not supernatural, according to Baron Bunsen, or of "seeing the ideal in the actual," according to his improver Dr. Williams.

Or shall we be told that sieges of cities, and famine, even to so dreadful an extent, are not such strange or unusual events in the history of a nation as to require us to suppose supernatural prescience on the part of the lawgiver,—or that perhaps the very particulars of the prediction indicate a date when the Jews already possessed a fortified city, and were uneasy about the possibility of an Assyrian attack, so that the quasi-prophecy might find its fulfilment in the days of Sennacherib? I do not now urge the photographic description of the conquerors, nor the language of the historian, who plainly believed that the characteristic horror of Titus's siege was unprecedented in the sufferings of other times and people, but I confidently ask whether the wonderful sequel of this prophecy does not absolutely fix its meaning to the final destruction of the city, and prove beyond a doubt, to all who are not wedded to scepticism, the supernatural prescience of the prophet: "And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth, even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: and thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life. In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see."

There is no vagueness here. The judgment denounced against the nation after the destruction of its city, is one most signal, definite, and unexampled. "Slay them not, lest my people forget it, but scatter them abroad, O Lord our defence!"

The Jewish nation has now been scattered for near eighteen hundred years. They have had neither land nor city, neither temple nor daily sacrifice in all that time. They ceased to be a nation near five hundred years before any of the existing nations of Europe began to be; above seven hundred years before England was united as a single nation under one ruler. They have suffered precisely such unspeakable distresses in their scattered state as the lawgiver above three thousand years before denounced in such striking and wonderful terms. Yet they are found, and have been found, in every land; present, yet never blending; suffering, pillaged, yet never rising again to wealth and affluence,—better known, at this moment, to all men by feature, by character, than the natives of any other country upon earth.

Is this a case of natural clairvoyance, or the sight of the ideal in the actual? Perish the miserable, self-styled philosophy which would dare to call it so! No! It is the finger of God making good in history and life the word of God. Many miracles may be of temporary evidential force, many prophecies may be of doubtful interpretation,—but every city of Europe with its "Jews' quarter," its "Old Jewry," and the like, every Jewish face with its unmistakable features, every fact in ordinary life which testifies to the continued existence of "the Jews" among us, as in the midst of us, yet distinguished from us, not by dress, not by colour, not by rank, not by habits, but by the unextinguishable nationality of God's scattered wanderers, is a continued witness, addressed to the mind of every single man among us, of the truth of God, of the divine inspiration of his servant Moses, and, pro tanto, of the supernatural character of Holy Scripture.

IN MEMORIAM.

ANOTHER little form asleep,
And a little spirit gone;
Another little voice is hushed,
And a little angel born.
Two little feet have gone the way
To the home beyond the skies,
And our hearts are like the void that comes
When a strain of music dies.

A pair of little baby shoes,
And a lock of golden hair;
The toy our little darling loved,
And the dress she used to wear;
The little grave in the shady nook
Where the flowers love to grow—
And these are all of the little hope
That came three years ago.

The birds that sit on the branch above,
And sing a requiem
To the beautiful little sleeping form
That used to sing to them.
But never again will the little lips
To their songs of love reply;
For that silvery voice is blended with
The minstrelsy on high.

THE UNJUST STEWARD.

LUKE xvi. 1-13.

BY THE REV. CHARLES J. BROWN.

I THINK you will find the key to this difficult but weighty parable of the unjust steward, in the fourth verse, "I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses"—a worldly-wise, sagacious, though unprincipled man, who, in the prospect of being turned out of one comfortable residence, will make quite sure, if he can, of finding another—this verse, along with the latter part of the eighth, "the children of this world are in their generation wiser [more prudent—the word is not the ordinary one for wisdom] than the children of light"—more prudent, that is to say, in the affairs and for the interests of that perishing world to which they belong, than the children of light are in the affairs and for the interests of the higher and nobler world to which they have devoted themselves. Carrying this key with us, we touch rapidly on the story, or as it were narrative, here.

"And he said also unto his disciples"—it will come out gradually why Christ addresses the parable, unlike those of the previous chapter, more especially to his disciples, that is to say, not the apostles alone, but all around him who had made a certain profession of faith in him and allegiance to him—"There was a certain rich man which had a steward," or manager of his whole property,—one intrusted, as will immediately appear, with large responsibilities and powers in the administration of it; "and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods"—accused, or informed against. The word is one which usually refers to a false accusation; not necessarily, however, and not here. It may simply mean an accusation, true, but preferred out of selfish and malignant motives. In the present case the accuser might have been some one, for example, who coveted the lucrative situation of the steward, and so gave information to the master of his corrupt and wasteful administration. "And he called him, and said unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward." Give an account of thy stewardship, evidently does not imply here any hesitation,—any mere purpose of investigating the state of matters with the view of determining on the course to be followed. The idea merely is, render up the state of thy accounts, of my affairs with thee. The dismissal was a thing decided on. The evidence had been unquestionable—"give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward. Then the steward said within himself, What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed." "I cannot dig"—have been brought up too delicately for manual labour; "to beg I am ashamed." He was not ashamed, however, to take a dishonourable course. Ashamed to beg, he was not ashamed to sin. "I am resolved what to do," he continues, "that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty." He knew that the bill, or writing of debt—I acknowledge myself to owe so much to such a one—that this document, signed by the party, and countersigned by himself the authorized steward, while he still retained his office, would stand good in the eye of the law, as the sufficient and only legal evidence of the debt. Hence his words, "sit down quickly"—it points to the approaching dismissal from the stewardship—"sit down quickly, and write fifty. Then said he to another, And how much owest thou? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write four-score." The thing having been done and completed, no attempt was made at any careful concealment. The man had gained his object, and was comparatively indifferent about discovery. The lord, the master, speedily became aware (possibly by information still from the same quarter) of the dishonest transaction, but too late to make a better of it. And so, contenting himself with bringing the stewardship now as speedily as possible to an end, himself perhaps a man of the world who cared not very much about the mere dishonesty as such, he takes occasion to pass a compliment on the keen, quick-sighted sagacity of his old servant (as it is written, "men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself")—"the lord," that is to say, the master of the steward, "commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely," prudently, sagaciously for himself—a shrewd, sagacious fellow that, at least! "for," adds the Lord Jesus, "the children of this world are in their generation more prudent than the children of light."

Here I may be allowed to refer back to a somewhat full illustration of this apophthegm, or maxim, or weighty saying of Jesus, which had been given in a previous discourse. The general idea of it being obviously this, that the children of this world are more prudent than the children of light, not absolutely, but relatively—more prudent (as already hinted) in the affairs and for the interests of that passing world for which they live, than the children of light are in the affairs and for the interests of the nobler world to which they belong, the maxim had been found holding solemnly and mournfully good in such respects as the following: the thoughts of the children of this world running constantly on its interests; their making everything else bend to these; their skillful arranging and economizing of time with a view to them; their turning to the best account all means within their reach of advancing them; their requiring certainty, clear and definite security, as far as possible, in connection with them; and their lying on the watch to seize those special occasions of promoting them which come from time to time in their way.

But while the maxim is thus obviously a large and general one, and while Christ doubtless designed his disciples to view it thus largely,—studying it carefully, to learn many a lesson for eternity and heaven from the manner in which the children of this world pursue the interests of earth and time, the context, however, will now be found to point our thoughts more especially in the direction of the second and fourth of those examples or particulars. The second of them, that is to say, the children of this world making everything else bend to its interests. This man did not hesitate to make even his eternity bend, to sacrifice truth and righteousness, his soul, God, all, to his interests of earth—"he called every one of his lord's debtors to him," &c,—a keen and cutting rebuke this, surely, to the children of light who, pursuing an everlasting inheritance, are yet found to grudge too often some little sacrifice of ease, or pleasure, or satisfaction, for the sake of it!

But more specially still, the parable, as it now proceeds onwards in its application at the ninth verse, points our thoughts in the direction of the fourth of those examples, namely, the children of this world turning to the best account all means within their reach of advancing its interests. For, see how this man, in view of being turned out of one comfortable house, bent on the one definite object of making sure another, loses not a moment in bethinking himself how this may be accomplished, and very promptly makes up his mind, and at once proceeds to execute it. He will secure friends for himself, at any cost, among the debtors of his lord, that he having done a good turn for them, they may do another for him,—that, when he shall be put out of the stewardship, they may receive him into their houses. "And I say unto you," continues Jesus, "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations." Now, if this verse be looked at with a very little care, I think it will be found not only free of any material difficulty, but full of weightiest instruction for the christian life—I say the christian life, because it is now plainly coming out why Jesus addresses the whole parable more especially to his professing disciples.

Observe, then, that Christ passes here, at this ninth verse, from the larger and more general application of the maxim of the eighth, to its application to one specific subject—that of our property—the right and wise and christian use of whatever of this world's goods may have been intrusted to us by God. For, mark a moment, first, the expression, "the mammon of unrighteousness"—"make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness." The word mammon simply means wealth or riches. It is a Chaldee word, from a root signifying to trust—a humbling derivation, by the way, bearing witness to the deep-seated tendency of the fallen heart to idolize, to trust in riches. Then, when Jesus calls wealth "the mammon of unrighteousness," or the unrighteous mammon, he has partly in his eye those endless shifts, and frauds, and falsehoods, of which the corruption of man in every age and country has made wealth the occasion and the subject; and partly he has in his eye the uncertain, treacherous, deceitful character of riches—men putting their trust in them, and continually finding what a broken reed they have leaned on,—how their trust becomes their chief trouble and torment, as Paul speaks, "They that will be rich fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows."

But now, what does our Lord mean by the exhortation to his disciples, "Make to yourselves friends of," or from, or out of, "the mammon of unrighteousness?" It is plainly a figure drawn from the conduct of the steward in securing friends for himself from among the debtors of his lord, who, on his being turned out of the stewardship, should receive him into their houses. Even so, says Jesus, make friends to yourselves out of your worldly possessions and goods—so use them wisely as to turn them to your eternal advantage—so lay them out that they shall in the end become, not enemies and curses, but as it were friends to you—so lay them out for God and his kingdom, for the poor and the needy, that He shall at last reward your use of them a hundred-fold,—that "when ye fail," when ye die, they may, as by the hands of so many friends, welcome, "receive you into everlasting habitations." Compare those words of Paul, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life:" and those words of Jesus, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink," and so on. "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations." Ah, everlasting habi- tations! What a contrast to the houses, the poor! earthly houses of that fourth verse, "I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses!" It is but a little, very little while, and the houses that here know us shall know us no more for ever. Happy they who, in the near prospect of departure, can say, "My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever"—"We know, that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens"—"that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations!"

But now, do you see how Jesus is passing here into the idea of a trust, a stewardship in his kingdom—a high and holy stewardship among his disciples? "And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much. If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" Observe, that he does not so much affirm such a stewardship, as assume it. It was enough, at least, that he had introduced at all the idea of a steward, and his account, into the parable; from hence he passes at once into it as a thing well known and certain, that there is a stewardship in his kingdom, standing, indeed, in deep and obvious contrast, many ways, to that in the parable, equally as respects the steward and the master there, yet corresponding with it in these fundamental particulars at least—the fact of a stewardship, and a fast approaching end of it, and an account of our stewardship to be rendered by us when we may be no longer stewards.

Only it seems to some as if there were a certain difficulty about that ninth verse, taken in connection with the previous story, as if Christ seemed almost to lend in it a sort of half countenance to the arts of Jesuitism, or at least to frown less deeply and strongly on them, and all approach to them, than is usual with him. Oh no, no. The fact is, on the contrary, that he only will not condescend to affirm in so many words, but assumes it as obvious, that the one element in the character of the steward which he holds up for the instruction of his disciples, is his keen and prompt sagacity in discovering, and at once following out, the means best fitted to secure a particular end, but that in the stewardship of his own kingdom, and with God for the Master, whom no cunning can ever overreach, and no iniquity ever please, not only can unprincipledness, injustice, avail nothing, but the very sagacity, prudence, wisdom here are identical with fidelity, righteousness, truth—as witness, accordingly, the immediate transition which Christ makes from the prudence of the ninth verse, "make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations," to the fidelity of the tenth, and eleventh, and twelfth, "He that is faithful in that which is least"—assuming, evidently, that the prudence and forethought exhorted to in the ninth verse are all one with the uncompromising fidelity of this one, "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much. If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?"

Nor can I help just marking here a grand distinction which obtains between the stewardships and services of earth, and the service of the blessed God, which imparts a greatly additional emphasis and beauty to that rapid transition from the ninth to the tenth verse. I mean, that it never can well happen in the service of an earthly master, that the servant shall best consult his master's interests by just consulting thoroughly for his own, and, conversely, best consult his own interests by consulting singly, and thoroughly, and always, for his master's. But so entirely has God bound up his own glory with our highest interest and welfare—so entirely are these not only consistent, but inseparably linked together, that true prudence and fidelity,—self-interest at the long run, and righteousness and truth, are here altogether co-incident and identical. Hence the emphatic meaning and deep divine beauty of the transition here, "make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. He that is faithful," and so on; and "faithful," "faithful," is still the leading, central word in each of the three verses—Christ passing sublimely, and all the more sublimely that he makes no mention of any transition in so many words, from "the prudence which the steward had, to the fidelity which he had not,—the harmlessness of the dove, to which the serpent, with all his wisdom," or subtlety rather, "is a total stranger."*

And now a very few words will suffice on these three verses—suffice, that is, for the purposes of lecturing or exposition. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much." Taking this as a general axiom or principle, the thought evidently is, that fidelity does not and cannot depend on the mere amount intrusted to a man's care, but on his conscientious sense of responsibility; and that he who feels this in a little, will feel it also in much, and so conversely. But do you notice what it is that Christ means here by "that which is least,"—that he means riches, and not a little of them, but any amount of them which a man can possess? He calls all our worldly possessions, however great, "that which is least." Comparing them with the true, the everlasting wealth, see how he speaks disparagingly, almost contemptuously, of them, making them important only as they furnish a test of our fidelity, or otherwise, to God and his service. It reminds one of that significant fact in the Saviour's life, that he let poor Judas carry the bag—counting it, though it contained the earthly all of Jesus and his disciples, that which was least among his affairs: "This Judas said," writes John, "not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein:" and again, "Some of them thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast; or, that he should give something to the poor." How solemnly instructive! "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." Compare those words in the parable of the pounds, "Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds"—"Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." "And he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much." Compare the words, "Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin"—"Thou wicked servant, wherefore gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds. Those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me."

* See Dr. David Brown of Aberdeen's brief but very valuable Notes on the Gospels (Glasgow: William Collins).

Then, a single word will be enough on the eleventh verse, "If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?" If ye have not been faithful in the poor, treacherous, deceitful and deceiving riches of this world, much more you prove yourselves unfit to be intrusted with the everlasting kingdom,—with that which alone is worthy to be termed "the true riches," even the crown of glory, of righteousness, of life, the inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. "And (ver. 12), "if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's,"—more exactly, that which is another's—"who shall give you that which is your own?" That which is another's. Here the idea of the stewardship comes more expressly out—"If ye have not been faithful in that which is another's." Of course it is still our property Christ is speaking of. Ah! but it seems it is not our property at all as in reference to God, "that which is another's." It seems we are proprietors of nothing we possess, as in relation to God, but only stewards, administrators. O ye who are saying in your heart, Our goods (like our lips) are our own; who is lord over us? know, that though your goods are your own as regards me, they are not your own as regards God, but only a loan from Him, a trust, a stewardship; and that using them otherwise than according to his will and for his glory, you are guilty of the crime of appropriating and wasting the property of another —squandering, scattering that which is another's, and that other your very Maker! "If ye have not been faithful in that which is another's, who shall give you that which is your own?"—that is to say, what would otherwise have become your own at length—referring to the heavenly blessedness, which shall become the property, as it were, of the saints in due time,—no longer, as with their goods in this world, to be held by them on mere loan, for a very little while, as a stewardship, as a probationary trust, but to be held by an inalienable, indefeasible title, secure to all eternity.

And now, in the last verse of all, the thirteenth, our Lord puts his finger, with divine unerring touch, on the hidden spring and source of all the evils against which the whole parable and passage are directed—even the attempt, alike sinful and vain, to serve two masters, God and the world: "No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Observe that the general maxim, "No servant can serve two masters," holds good even when the two services are not opposite in the character of them; since, if the one master bid the servant come here, and the other bid him at the same time go there, he cannot obey both, but must necessarily make his choice between the two. But much more, when, as with God and the world, the services are diametrically opposed, and essentially irreconcilable. In this case, if you will make the attempt to serve both masters, you must needs hate the one and love the other, love the world and hate God; "or else," if you shall say, O no, it is true I am no saint; I do no doubt love and serve the world; but I do not hate God, not I—well, Christ will not dispute this matter with you for the present. It comes to the same thing. Either you love the world and hate God, or else, and at the least, holding by the world, you practically despise, repudiate, turn your back on God and his service—"Ye cannot serve God and mammon." To attempt it is a crime; to perform it is an impossibility.

And now, in conclusion, how much is there here to humble the children of God! how much also to animate, how much to direct and guide them! How much to humble them in the dust! Ah, that stewardship! And once it was the utter waste with you of the Master's goods. But alas, even since you have tasted that the Lord is gracious, how much waste still! How much unfaithfulness! What a painful contrast between the zeal, the forethought, the energy, of the children of this world in their pursuit of its interests, and the manner in which you pursue the higher imperishable ones! "If thou, LORD, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord who shall stand?" As old Herbert says, in his peculiar but beautiful way:—

"Almighty Judge! how shall poor wretches brook
Thy dreadful look,
Able a heart of iron to appal,
When thou shalt call
For every man's peculiar book?"

What others mean to do, I know not well;
 Yet I hear tell,
 That some will turn thee to some leaves therein
 So void of sin,
 That they in merit shall excel.
 But I resolve, when thou shalt call for mine,
 That to decline;
 And thrust a testament into thy hand.
 Let that be scann'd:
 There thou shalt find my faults are thine."

And thus how much is there also here to animate you, believers! The true riches—the everlasting habitation—that which shall be your own, yours soon by an inalienable title for ever! And how animating the principle, that in the service of the blessed God, we best consult for the Master's interests, when truly and thoroughly consulting for our own, and best for our own, when consulting most singly and always for the Master's! And thus, also, how much here to direct and guide! Stewardship, fidelity, prudence—"Be ye wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." And one only Master—"O Lord, our God, other lords beside thee have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name." "O Lord, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds."

But ye who are still out of Christ,—who make either no profession of discipleship, or a profession of it and nothing more, what shall I say to you? Soon that voice must reach you, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward." And how different a Master from him in the parable! He could be overreached, and long was kept in ignorance of the waste of his goods. But "be not deceived; God is not mocked"—"all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do." Soon, I repeat, the voice must reach you, Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward. And then you must go forth from your houses in this world—yea, forth from the world itself into eternity—friendless, homeless, and with that terrible account to give up! But might not you also begin this day to say:—

"Almighty Judge! how shall poor wretches brook
 Thy dreadful look," &c.

Oh done, done, with the vain, miserable attempt at serving the two masters! If the world be God, by all means serve it. But if not,—if, when you die, it can do nothing for you but hang as a mill-stone about your neck to sink you in deeper ruin,—if Jehovah be God, then serve Him. "Take with you words, and turn to the Lord: say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips. Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses; neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy." "Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets, saying, How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge? Turn you at my reproof: behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you"—as if Christ should say, I offer that testament to you also, that you may hand it back to me, as the first and foremost part of your answer to my "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward." Ah, testament? "Riches and honour are with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness. My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold; and my revenue than choice silver. I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment; that I may cause those that love me to inherit substance; and I will fill their treasures."

RESTING IN GOD.

Since thy Father's arm sustains thee, Peaceful be;
 When a chastening hand restrains thee,
 It is he.
 Know his love in full completeness
 Fills the measure of thy weakness;
 If he wound thy spirit sore,
 Trust him more.
 Without murmur, uncomplaining,
 In his hand
 Lay whatever things thou canst not Understand.
 Though the world thy folly spurneth,
 From thy faith in pity turneth,
 Peace thy inmost soul shall fill,
 Lying still.
 Like an infant, if thou thinkest
 Thou canst stand;
 Childlike, proudly pushing back
 The offered hand,
 Courage soon is changed to fear,
 Strength doth feebleness appear.
 In his love if thou abide,
 He will guide.

Fearest sometimes that thy Father
 Hath forgot?
 When the clouds around thee gather,
 Doubt him not.
 Always hath the daylight broken.—
 Always hath he comfort spoken,—
 Better hath he been for years
 Than thy fears.

Therefore, whatso'er betideth,
 Night or day,—
 Know his love for thee provideth,
 Good away.
 Crown of sorrow gladly take,
 Grateful wear it for his sake,
 Sweetly bending to his will,
 Lying still.

To his own thy Saviour giveth
Daily strength ;
To each troubled soul that liveth,
Peace at length.
Weakest lambs have largest share
Of this tender Shepherd's care ;
Ask him not, then, "When?" or "How?"
Only bow.

THE PROMISE AND THE SONG.

*For the Lord shall comfort Zion: he will comfort all her waste places; and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; Joy and gladness will be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody."—Isa. li. 3.

"Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth; for the Lord hath comforted his people."—Isa. xlii. 13.

A LIVING, loving, lasting word
My listening ear, believing, heard,
While bending down in prayer;
Like a sweet breeze that none can stay,
It fanned my soul upon its way,
And left a blessing there.

Then joyful thoughts, that come and go
By paths the holy angels know,
Encamped around my soul;
As in a dream of blest repose,
'Mid withered reeds a river rose,
And through the desert stole.

I lifted up my eyes to see—
The wilderness was glad for me,
Its thorns were bright with bloom;
And onward travellers, still in sight,
Marked out a path of shining light,
And shade unmixed with gloom.

Oh! sweet the strains of those before,
"The weary knees are weak no more,
The fearful heart is strong;"
But sweeter, nearer, from above,
That word of everlasting love,
The promise and the song.

"ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."

SECOND PART.

As if these critical methods were not found sufficient for the work of destruction, another canon is enounced, which may be "trained" to bear with decisive effect upon the whole subject-matter of religious belief. It is that in our study of Scripture "we are obliged to assume in ourselves a verifying faculty, not unlike the discretion which a mathematician would use in weighing a treatise on geometry, or the liberty which a musician would reserve in reporting a law of harmony." That is, there is a kind of professional aptitude or knowingness in dealing with Scripture which comes to the critic by education and practice, by virtue whereof he can bring all its narratives and precepts to the standard of his own "moral instincts," so that when he finds, from his own inward sensations, these narratives to be "inherently incredible," or these precepts to be "evidently wrong," he is bound summarily to reject them. This, it seems, is the meaning of "having the witness in ourselves." In this principle we find the key to the whole volume. However much the writers may differ among themselves as to the extent to which they apply it, there are many indications that on this point of a "verifying faculty" they are substantially agreed. We can conceive the results which follow from the application of this critical test to such doctrines as those of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, the great spiritual facts of Sin and Redemption. The work of Christ as the foundation laid for human hope is thus described,—"In Him man finds brought to fulfilment the religious idea, which is the thought of the Eternal, without conformity to which our souls cannot be saved from evil." The Son of man, as he stands before us in the Gospels, is "dimmed by the haze of mingled imagination and remembrance, with which his awful figure could scarcely fail to be at length invested by affection." The simple meaning of this is that we may regard all the miraculous incidents of His life, and death, and resurrection, as mythical, the legendary accretion of after ages round the idea of the man Jesus.

Justification by faith is "the peace of mind, or sense of divine approval which comes of trust in a righteous God, rather than a fiction of merit by transfer." It was the conception of a later age that "shifted salvation from evil through sharing the Saviour's spirit into a notion of purchase from God through sharing his bodily pangs." It is possible that some of the writers would shrink from conclusions like these. But once admit this principle of a "verifying faculty" ("falsifying," we would suggest, as a more congruous term for an organ whose function seems to be to discredit revelation in every possible way), and where is the limit to be drawn? In the conflict, or collision of "verifying faculties," which is to have final jurisdiction, who is to have the right of arbitration? We are told that the more thoroughly the methods of scientific criticism are studied, and the more honestly they are applied, the idea of an external revelation will appear more apocryphal; from which it surely follows that, in proportion to philological attainments, and practised facility in wielding certain critical canons, the "verifying faculty" will at once be raised to a higher power of scepticism, and be invested with weightier judicial authority in its decisions. It is possible that the Vice-Principal of Lampeter is a greater adept in the art of rationalistic interpretation than the Head-master of Rugby; but Dr. Strauss, who is the Coryphæus or Hierophant of these unholy mysteries, leaves the Welsh theologian far behind. To his "verifying faculty," the historic Christ is the shadow of a shade,—the facts of the Gospels a clumsy forgery,—the whole body of Christian doctrine an allegoric presentment of the progress of humanity, God, the world-spirit, working in the gradual elevation of the race, which is a part of the divine being,—Christ, the God-man eternally incarnate, not an individual, but an idea, the idea being man exalted and spiritualized by railroads, and telegraphs, and the general enlightenment of the nineteenth century. We believe that, as all theories of ecclesiastical authority overruling the individual conscience, find their consistent development in Romanism, this theory of the supreme arbitration of our internal faculty in matters of religious belief,—call it an enlightened will, or a moral instinct, or spirit, or reason, or conscience, or what you please,—must inevitably result in that apotheosis of self, that transcendental pantheism, baptized with Christian symbols, which the Lutheran Church has seen so long as the abomination of desolation standing in its holy place. From Rationalism to Romanism the passage is short and easy. A religious community, founded on scientific criticism, would soon find itself governed by a general council of pedants, or by a despotic grammarian, the completest impersonation of the system; some rationalizing divine raised to the Patriarchate or Pontifical chair of the philosophic Church by the suffrages of his brethren.

We might select the essay by Professor Baden Powell on the Study of the Evidences of Christianity, as ominously indicating in another direction the extent of the divergence on the part of the new school from admitted principles of belief; in fact, fixing the low-water mark of its scientific speculations. No one can rise from its perusal without a painful doubt as to whether the writer admits in any Christian sense the existence of a personal God. Nor is the saddening impression weakened by the thought that, since the publication of his views, the author has passed away beyond the judgment of men. Throughout the whole visible framework of the universe we seem to see nothing but a play of physical forces,—laws mechanically operating in a chain of unbroken and inviolable sequences according to a preimposed necessity. He holds it as established that it is impossible by any amount or cumulative force of testimony to prove the fact of any miraculous interference with those laws, and that Darwin's masterly disquisition, "The Origin of Species by the Law of Natural Selection," substantiates on undeniable grounds the principle so long denounced by the first materialists, the origination of new species by natural causes, a work which "must soon bring about an entire revolution of opinion in favour of the grand principle of the self-evolving powers of nature." This grand principle aims in effect at dethroning a divine intelligence from the government of the world, and making nature all in all—an attempt often made before, but one that comes upon us with a novel sensation when we see the glitter of Voltairean armour under priestly surplice and academic stole. In this view the world becomes a wilderness from which all genial life has withered, all bright signatures of a divine hand effaced, illumined only with the cold, dry light of material laws—no fountain springing, no spot of living verdure in the arid, melancholy waste, where the despairing spirit may wander and die without hearing the sound of a voice from heaven, a Father's voice of grace and hope to break the sepulchral stillness.

One of these Essays, that "On the National Church," is by the vicar of a country parish, and as a sample of the spirit of the teaching which must be addressed from the pulpit to a simple rural population week after week, to fit them for the business of life, and train them for immortality, we cite the following, which, after sundry careful perusals, we do not profess to understand. After remarking that "our Lord's own words leave no doubt of his teaching having been what we may call, from want of a better word, moral," Mr. Wilson goes on to say: "But to represent the Spirit of Christ as a moral Spirit is not merely to proclaim him as a law-giver, enacting the observance of a set of precepts, but as fulfilled with a Spirit given to him 'without measure,' of which, indeed, all men are partakers who have a sense of what they 'ought' to be and do; yet, flowing from him, especially on those who perceive in his words, and in his life, principles of ever-widening application to the circumstances of their own existence, who learn from him to penetrate to the root of their conscience, and to recognise themselves as being active elements in the moral order of the universe."

We might point to this sentence as an illustration of the mysticism or cloudiness of thought and style which pervades the volume. Looking at it as a whole, its literary merits are of a very mediocre kind. One has frequently to go back through a tangle of words to find the clue to the writer's meaning; only, when it is found, to be mocked and baffled by vanishing glimpses of ideas looming through a haze. The vicar of Great Staughton has expressed his unfeigned "assent and consent" to the Articles of the Church of England, and of course to the divine authority of Holy Scripture. But though Scripture may be called in a sense the "Word of God," all that this implies is, the "Word of God is contained in Scripture, whence it does not follow that it is co-extensive with it." "Under the terms of the sixth Article, one may accept literally, or allegorically, or as parable, or poetry, or legend, the story of a serpent-tempter, of an ass speaking with man's voice, of an arresting of the earth's motion, of a reversal of its motion, of waters standing in a solid heap, of witches, and a variety of apparitions. So, under the terms of the sixth Article, every one is free in judgment as to the primeval institution of the Sabbath, the universality of the deluge, the confusion of tongues, the corporeal taking up of Elijah into heaven, the nature of angels, the reality of demoniacal possession, the personality of Satan, and the miraculous particulars of many events."

We are told that it is the duty of those who are able to do so to lead the less educated to distinguish between the different kinds of words which Scripture contains, "between the dark patches of human passion and error, which form a partial crust upon it, and the bright centre of spiritual truth within." His theory of a future life might almost seem to indicate sympathy with the Brahminical or Buddhist tenet of an ultimate absorption of all souls into the Divine essence. "The Roman Church has imagined a limbus infantium. We must rather entertain a hope that there shall be found, after the great adjudication, receptacles suitable for those who shall be infants, not as to years of terrestrial life, but as to spiritual development,—nurseries, as it were, and seed grounds, where the undeveloped may grow up under new conditions, the stunted may become strong, and the perverted be restored. And when the Christian Church, in all its branches, shall have fulfilled its sub-lunary office, and its Founder shall have surrendered his kingdom to the Great Father—all, both small and great, shall find a refuge in the bosom of the Universal Parent, to repose, or be quickened into higher life, in the ages to come, according to his will."

If such is the mould in which the articles of our Christian faith are to be recast and refashioned, so as to bring them into harmony with the demands and necessities of an age of intellectual progress,—if these are the doctrines to be deduced from the expurgated Bible of the new theology, we need not wonder that a shout of triumph has already been raised in the infidel camp, as if, when the battle was waging, a notable defection had taken place from the Christian ranks to theirs. We think it quite reasonable that they should express their surprise, and even contempt, that men who have traitorously surrendered the substance of Christianity, should affect to cling to its shadow.

They are shrewd enough to see that, when divine rewards and punishments, the fall, original sin, the vicarious penalty and salvation by faith are all, in the natural sense of the terms, denounced as figments, or exploded blunders, it is the merest folly to suppose that the Bible, which contains these untruths, can continue to be to the people the book of life. Well may one of the leading organs of our anti-Christian literature * ask, "Is the crumbling edifice of orthodoxy to be supported by sweeping away the whole of its substructure, and Christian divines taught to surrender all the most exacting criticism assails?" We quite concur in its remark, that "the mass of ordinary believers may well ask to be protected from such friends as their worst and most dangerous enemies."

We have no sympathy with much of the language of timid apprehension and foreboding which the appearance of this volume has called forth; the fears expressed as to its probable effect on the general mind, as if the foundations of faith were destroyed, and the righteous could do nothing but take up a lamentation over the departed glories of the Temple. Christianity has nothing to dread from an attack which recoils with the most damaging effect on its originators. Dr. Williams, with a characteristic sneer, alludes to this irruption of rationalism as the "Last Monster out of the Deep," and represents English scholarship as standing before it stricken with dismay and paralyzed by craven terror! One would think, from the self-complacency with which this Welsh theologian surveys the ruin he has wrought, that the mystery, hidden from ages and generations, had been made known to him, only the offensive arrogance and pretentiousness of his tone is fatal to his claims of inspiration, at least of a supernal kind. This vain philosophy may have its hour of seeming triumph, and it is easy to understand why it should be so. We see in it only the necessary re-action from the traditionalism of the Anglo-Catholic school. The pendulum has swung back in the direction of Tübingen, as far as a few years ago it oscillated in the direction of Rome. We knew that German rationalism was the product of the dead orthodoxy of the Lutheran Church—the fungous growth that marks the presence of corruption. Corruptio optimi pessima. For a season the Negative criticism ran its course, but, as Neander predicted, it had the sentence of death in itself. When a fire has crackled and swept over a tract of moorland or hill-side, leaving a wide and dreary stretch of blackened ashes, the heath and furze soon put forth green sprouts again, and the clothing grasses come up more succulent and tender. After the hideous ruin and combustion of the Neologic period, we have seen a healthier and purer spiritual life awakened in the birth-place of the Reformation, and men, chastened and tutored by experience, beginning to retrace their steps to the good old paths, where they may find rest to their souls. There is the same weakness and hollowness at the heart of this spectral system, which brandishes its brazen spear and vaunts so loudly. Before the everlasting truth of the gospel it cannot stand; in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth this lying spirit must follow its forerunners into the abyss.

We would deprecate all attempts to suppress a volume like this by mere ecclesiastical authority, or to neutralize its effects by a demand for recantation. The witness of one of its authors is true, "He is guilty of high treason against the faith who fears the result of any investigation, whether philosophical, or scientific, or historical." The very apprehension of such a procedure at once drew sympathy to the writers, and from that moment the work, heavy enough in itself, began to rise steadily against an adverse wind.

"Truth, like a torch, the more 'tis shook it shines."

Let the reasonings of the essayists be fairly met; let their sophistries be unravelled; let their errors be carefully confronted with those truths which have a self-evidencing power in them to the conscience and the heart. Let their treatise be answered by the clear and faithful exhibition of the mystery of Redemption in its divine adaptation to the deepest necessities of man's spiritual being, and the result will be to place both the facts and doctrines of revelation on a firmer and more impregnable basis.

Time after time the deluge rises; the landmarks are seemingly submerged, and the high hills that are under the whole heaven are covered. By-and-by the Spirit of God moves upon the face of the waters, and they are assuaged,—Ararat, standing in its ancient place, lifts its green head again, and down in the valley, the olive-tree uncrushed, uninjured, puts forth its fresh and tender leaves.

STEPPING-STONES TO THE CITY OF GOD.

I.

"THE development of mankind," said I, "appears to be laid out as a work for thousands of years."

"Perhaps millions," said Goethe, "who knows? But let mankind last as long as it may, it will never lack obstacles to give it trouble, and never lack the pressure of necessity to develop its powers."

"Men will become more clever and more acute, but not better, happier, and stronger in action, or at least only at epochs. I foresee the time when God will have no more joy in them, but will break up everything for a new creation. I am certain that everything is planned to this end, and that the time and hour are already fixed in the distant future, for the occurrence of this renovating epoch. But a long time will elapse first, and we may still for thousands and thousands of years amuse ourselves, in all sorts of ways, on this dear old surface."—(Eckerman's "Conversations.")

Thus spoke, on the 23d of October 1822, the most godless of all men that ever lived; the man who, during his long period of eighty years, built up systematically a life of the calmest atheism, and the grandest selfishness, that the world has seen. To this end did he come. Such was the view of life from those deep, clear eyes, that had resolved to look upon all things, and be as God, knowing good and evil. It is perhaps the most melancholy passage in all literature.

This strange saying of Goethe's brings to our recollection the striking passage in that book of a nobler man, "Sartor Resartus," where the German professor sits in his little garret or watchtower high above the city, and soliloquizes upon the world below. He hears the mighty hum "like the stertorous, unquiet, alumber of sick life." "The joyful and the sorrowful are there; men are dying there, men are being born, men are praying,—on the other side of a brick partition men are cursing; and around them all is the vast, void night." "All these heaped and huddled together, with nothing but a little carpentry and masonry between them,—crammed in, like salted fish, in their barrel,—or weltering, shall I say, like an Egyptian pitcher of tamed vipers, each struggling to get its head above the others. Such work goes on under that smoke-counterpane. But I, my Welter, sit above it all; I am alone with the stars." A cruel irony, full of deep and honest sadness, and therein better than Goethe's, and, also, nearer the truth.

The following incident may have been a dream, but there is no reason why it should not have been real. I was walking through the streets of a great town on a warm autumn evening. A high wind was driving huge masses of cloud across the sky, a sight which, by some curious association, always awakens the deepest thoughts in my mind. So it was on this evening. I think I never had such a profound feeling of the emptiness and worthlessness of human life. How futile, and vile, and God-forgotten we seem; what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue! So thinking, I turned into a literary institute which stood near. A man was speaking there, and he was no mere babbler. He spoke eloquently and well of science, and literature, and art; and the more he spoke, my heart sunk within me the more. I looked round upon all those half-interested faces, of men immortal and sinful, and went out from among them in deep dejection. The wind was still roaring overhead, and the sky grey and troubled, as I turned to go home. But on my way, seeing another door open, and hearing a noise inside, I went in. It was a poor, uncomfortable room, not like the hall I had left, and the men and women there were simple and uneducated people, and many of them with faces filled with care, yet not without a grave gladness. The rich and refined people had been talking of art and science. The poor people were singing as I went in,— "Blessed be the everlasting God,

The Father of our Lord;
Be his abounding mercy praised,
His majesty adored.

When from the dead he brought his Son,
And raised him to the sky,
He gave our souls a lively hope
That they should never die."

My despair vanished, as a cloud dissolves into rain. I went out once more, and the wind roared overhead; but it seemed now filled with the voice of the Eternal One,—that voice which calls sinful worms to the present possession of eternal life.

II.

Diogenes was a man whose nature God had made noble, and human sin made sour. Being asked by some of the people of Athens, whom he ever hated and scorned, in what part of Greece he had seen good men, he spoke with a cruel truth, "Men, nowhere; but good boys at Lacedemon."

Three thousand years later, an English poet, in whom the conscience of sin was far less developed than in the cynical Greek, and whose conception of Christianity was therefore dim and faint-lined, felt, in looking back, a mysterious blessedness about childhood. He has expressed this in words which convey to the minds of many a deeper and more touching meaning than he himself knew was there,—

"Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
 Shades of the prison-house begin to close
 Upon the growing boy,
 But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
 He sees it in his joy;
 The youth, who daily further from the east
 Must travel, still is Nature's priest,
 And by the vision splendid
 Is on his way attended;
 At length the man perceives it die away,
 And fade into the light of common day."

* * * * *

Hence, in a season of calm weather,
 Though inland far we be,
 Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
 Which brought us hither;
 Can in a moment travel thither,
 And see the children sport upon the shore,
 And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore."

Nor are these things to be believed merely, to quote the words of an old author, "with a poetical faith." There is something more in them. For JESUS CHRIST, when he called "little children" unto him, said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven;" and added, with an emphasis for all ages, "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in nowise enter therein."

But is there any use in thinking of these things? The past is gone. It is irrevocable. Can God indeed do this thing—to give us back our youth? He can make the evil man a good man; but can he make him a child, with a child's freshness of heart? How can a man be young when he is old?

For ages men had sought the golden Indies by travelling east, moving slowly and painfully to the rising sun. But in the fifteenth century, one great-hearted mariner, trusting to the indications of nature and the promises of providences, resolved to seek them by sailing away into the distant west. The world laughed at him; but he turned his vessel's prow into the unknown expanse, and saw the sun sink day after day behind mysterious waves. And so God gave to Columbus, and Columbus to Castile, a new world behind which the Indies lay.

We who are hard in sin, and on whom custom lies with a weight deep almost as life, let us not wall over the past, or grope backwards for a forgotten youth. The land of youth is before us, and a Voice calls us to it. For those who hear that voice, it is "not too late to seek a newer world," even here, in the midst of our mortal years.

"His flesh shall be fresher than a child's; he shall return to the days of his youth; he shall pray unto God, and He will be favourable unto him; and he shall see his face with joy; for He will restore unto man his righteousness." s.

A REMARKABLE INTERVIEW.

APART entirely from the mysteries that are supposed to surround it, that was a most remarkable interview which took place in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem nearly four thousand years ago. An Arab chief—a comparatively new settler from the other side of the Euphrates —who had pitched his tent amid the rich pastures of Southern Canaan, is seen approaching on the one hand, bearing the trophies of a victory which he has just gained over some of the natural born kings of the country; and on the other is witnessed the unexpected spectacle of one of the very class that had been conquered—one of Canaan's kings—coming forth from his palace, not to try another battle with the intruder, but to bestow his blessing upon him, and offer to his weary followers the acceptable refreshment of bread and wine. This singular conduct of the King of Salem, however, was, when we take all things into account, not so extraordinary even as the style in which Abraham responded to the kindness. We infer that Melchisedec had learned that the immigrant from Mesopotamia was no common man. Himself a worshipper of the true God, in the midst of idolatry, he had recognised the fact with satisfaction, that the new comer was of the same faith. He had heard, moreover, and he believed that Jehovah regarded the man with especial favour, and intended to make him and his descendants a blessing to the world. And these, and other such considerations, moved him, doubtless, to resist any natural impulse he might feel to make common cause with the native chiefs, and elect rather to ally himself with the stranger. That is all very intelligible. But the strangest part of the case comes after, when we see Abraham, him who had the promises—the friend of God—and the heir of the world, not merely receiving courteously and thankfully the provision offered to his men, but thereafter presenting to this petty king the tenth part of all the spoils, and submitting to take as from the hand of a superior the boon of a formal blessing. What did Abraham see in Melchisedec to make him render to him such extraordinary homage? It was, we are told, because, besides being one of the kings of Canaan, he held high office in the Church of the living God.

Strange that in the heart of such a country—among such a race—and at such a time, there should have been a man of princely rank cleaving steadfastly to the primitive faith, and well known in the godly household at Beersheba as distinguished for his piety. It does not make the matter less wonderful to say that, in all probability, he was of the family of Japhet and not of the family of Ham. The question still remains, how came a member of that race into such a spot—how, above all, was there a well of living water in Salem, when all around was a dry and parched land? Ages, it may perhaps be answered, dovetail into one another. With the call of Abraham commenced a new era; but the transition from the old into the new economy was not so rapid and abrupt as that, on his appearing, all traces were instantly swept away, even of the better features of the previous time. Jehovah never for an hour left himself without a witness on the earth. The line of succession in the Church has, in the most literal sense, been unbroken. And it is easy to believe that while Terah's family were serving idols on the other side of the Euphrates, the family of Melchisedec preserved in its purity the traditional faith, and upheld, in the midst of universal defection, the worship of the God of Adam, of Enoch, and of Noah. Just then, as we look with interest on the last flower of a passing summer, or the surviving representative of a bygone generation, we could not but have read the story of Melchisedec with deepest interest, even had we known nothing more about him than this, that he was the latest in the first series of the early patriarchs.

There is, however, something still more strange in this case than what we have now referred to. We are surprised to find a king in Canaan a witness for the truth; we are still more so to find that king executing the functions of a priest of the most High God. It is evident that the office described as being held by him, was not simply that which, before the consecration of Aaron, every head of a house was allowed to maintain by a sort of natural right. There was clearly something specially distinguishing about him. He had been singled out by Jehovah from the crowd. He had been ordained for higher than family purposes. And from Abraham's accepting his blessing, and paying him tithes, it is plain that the Father of the Faithful himself must have well understood that he occupied a place of pre-eminence in the primitive Church, and that even he and his household owed him homage as such. Is it too much to say that Melchisedec stood to Abraham in very much the same relation as that in which John the Baptist stood to Jesus Christ? John was the morning star, belonging properly to the departing night, yet lingering long enough in the sky to salute the rising Sun of righteousness. He was in plain terms the last prophet of the old dispensation, but he lived to preach in the new; and when by his preaching he testified to Christ and his baptism, he bestowed on him his blessing, it was like the dying economy saluting its successor, and joyfully making way for a greater than itself to come. That day when two of Canaan's princes met near Salem, and exchanged what seemed to be only the courtesies of life, nothing occurred to strike the senses or stir the curiosity of a common onlooker. But there was then, we cannot doubt, the meeting of two dispensations. A new and definite era is commencing. A fuller light is to be vouchsafed to the world. Clearer and more glorious promises are about being made. And there seems a beautiful propriety in the introduction at this point of a representative of the former time to offer to the rising hope of the world his salutations, and to receive what even the Son of God gave to his forerunner, that all righteousness might be fulfilled, the reverent recognition of a divine, though, it might be, a decaying institution.

The swiftness with which that single scene passes by us in the history, prevents, it is probable, many from even thinking for a moment of the suggestive circumstance that these two remarkable men lived together for a time in the same country, and, possibly, within visiting distance of each other. Knowing each other as they did, recognising each other's claims and positions as they rejoiced to do, it is surely no fanciful notion to suppose that they must have been now and then in each other's company. And if so, what high converse must they have held respecting the world's melancholy past, and the same world's more hopeful and glorious future. Here, however, all is conjecture. The story does not tell what they said, or how far their views agreed as to the destiny of the chosen people. But it requires no stretch of imagination to feel assured that Canaan would have been a stranger land to Abraham than it was, if he had not found in one of its kings a friend with whom he could take sweet counsel; and that, prepared as he was to trust God in all circumstances, he felt his disposition to do that greatly stimulated on discovering that in the land where he had to take up his abode there was, besides abundance of pasture for his cattle, by no means an absolute dearth of that higher provision needed for the sustenance of his spiritual life.

We might have wished a fuller account of this king of Salem. But in the Bible there is a reason for everything. The brevity of the notice was intentional. It was, that Melchisedec might the better be used as the type of a greater priest, who, in the future time, was to be raised up "after his order." It is not our purpose here to pursue the line of thought suggested by this fact. But just by way of showing still further, in a word or two at the close, what a remarkable man this was who held his place among the kings of Canaan, when the father of the faithful crossed its borders, we may barely mention some of the typical elements in his character and position.

He was a priest upon a throne. Nor was the throne he occupied an ordinary one. His own name, and the name of his kingdom, were significant of something different from all merely earthly sovereignties. He was first king of righteousness; and after that king of peace.

No other priest but one approached him in dignity. It seems to us, as we read his history, that there could not have been then living in the world a greater man than Abraham. But there was a greater than he; and Abraham himself admitted as much. He accepted Melchisedec's blessing, and paid him tithes of all; and in doing this, not only did he personally acknowledge his official superiority, but Levi also, and the Levitical priesthood, offered homage in him.

His priesthood, moreover, is to us in a manner everlasting. That is to say, We know him in no other character than that of a priest. Suddenly, as by a flash of sunlight, a photograph is taken of a striking scene. A man of whose previous history we are told nothing, and whose subsequent history is equally unknown, comes forth upon the stage, and performs certain sacerdotal acts, which stamp his name and character for ever. And as the artist seizes some scene of nature, or some stirring event in life, and with his brush and colours arrests it, so to speak, ere it vanishes, and gives it a certain kind of immortality on his canvas—so the sacred writer, by fixing this interview in his pages, and none other, has made Melchisedec to us a priest for ever; thus foreshadowing the royal, the glorious, and the eternal priesthood of the great Redeemer.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

JONATHAN EDWARDS.

PART SECOND.

EDWARDS died at a comparatively early age. He had never very good health to boast of, and his position as a country minister in an obscure colony was not, to say the least of it, exceedingly favourable to the leading of a literary life. And yet, as everybody knows, few have written so largely, so elaborately, and so profoundly on the most difficult questions in theological science. It is far from being the design of this paper to review his works. About their intrinsic worth and the manner in which they are executed, we need at present to say nothing. We are inquiring, however, specially into his personal character; and we should overlook one of the most remarkable features in that character if we failed to notice this notable fact, and did not endeavour to ascertain to what, in his constitution or habits, it was probably due. Here, if we mistake not, many of us may learn a lesson which we greatly need.

In the first place, I suppose we may admit that he was constitutionally methodical. His mind, while it was far from lacking that faculty of insight or intuitive perception which entitles us to call him a man of genius, was perhaps mainly logical in its cast. What we chiefly admire in his writings is the care and patience with which he collects and classifies his facts, and, by the slow yet sure process of induction, proceeds to rear upon them a solid and closely-compacted superstructure of argument. This habit of patient and thorough investigation appeared very early, and may be set down as having originated in a natural or constitutional tendency.

But, even making allowances for this, he would certainly never have achieved so much as he did in after life had it not been for one notable peculiarity in his training. Even when a boy, he began to study with a pen in his hand, not for the purpose of copying off the thoughts of others, but for the purpose of writing down and preserving the thoughts suggested to his own mind. This most useful practice he commenced in several branches very early, and he steadily pursued it in all his studies through life. His pen appears to have been always in his hand. "From this practice steadily persevered in, he derived the very great advantage of thinking continually during each period of study; of thinking accurately; of thinking connectedly; of thinking habitually at all times; of banishing from his mind every subject which was not worthy of continued and systematic thought; of pursuing each given subject of thought as far as he was able, at the happy moment when it opened spontaneously on his mind; of pursuing every such subject afterwards, in regular sequence, starting anew from the point where he had previously left off, when again it opened upon him in some new and interesting light; of preserving his best thoughts, associations, and images, and then arranging them under their proper heads, ready for subsequent use; of regularly strengthening the faculty of thinking and reasoning, by constant and powerful exercise; and above all, of gradually moulding himself into a thinking being—a being who, instead of regarding thinking and reasoning as labour, could find no enjoyment but in intense, systematic, and certain thought." How many might have left their mark upon the world, if they had followed the practice, so early adopted and so persistently pursued, by Jonathan Edwards. No farmer with any regard to his own interest, will allow his fields to lie fallow if they please. He knows well that the soil requires to be systematically cultivated if it is to be really profitable; and he has his mind tentatively set on a plentiful crop in the harvest, to neglect the means necessary to secure that desirable end. Few of us, however, seem to look with anything like the same practised eye upon the capabilities and resources of our minds. They are left to grow wheat or tares—nothing or much—just very much as circumstances may chance to direct; and thus it happens that we stand in utter amazement when we come to contemplate a life like that of Edwards, in which there appears an extraordinary return for the outlay which, according to our calculation, ought to have preceded it.

But it was not merely the divine gift of "thought" that Edwards husbanded, so as to make the most of it. Time also was with him a talent far too precious to be wasted. He accustomed himself to rise at four, or between four and five in the morning; and, in winter, spent several of those hours in study which are commonly wasted in slumber. Not, however, that he neglected recreation entirely. In the evening, we are told, he usually allowed himself a season of relaxation in the midst of his family; and, while in the summer season he rode or walked for exercise, in the winter time he was in the habit of taking axe in hand and spending half an hour in preparing wood for household consumption. Yet still, with all these systematic endeavours to give himself relief, we can find that he seldom succeeded in securing entire abandonment for his mind. Even when he rode out into the country—ostensibly for recreation—he carried his pen and ink along with him, to note any thought that might be suggested, and which promised to throw light upon any important subject; and when these could not be used at the moment, he adopted a kind of artificial memory, with a view to the recollection of trains of thought or illustrations, pinning pieces of paper here and there upon his coat. We cannot but admire, of course, this thoroughgoing effort to turn every moment to account; though, perhaps, according to our modern notions, it would have been better, for the health at once of body and spirit, if he had suffered his thoughts on these occasions to range abroad somewhat more freely.

To all this it may be added, in further explanation of the point now in hand, that recognising the intimate connection which subsists between body and mind, he endeavoured to regulate his diet so as to get the greatest possible amount of work out of both. In eating and drinking he was usually abstemious, and constantly watchful. He carefully observed the different sorts of food, and selected those which, while it sustained his bodily vigour, left his mind most sprightly and active; he most scrupulously and exactly confined himself to the prescribed limits, regarding it as a shame and a sin to waste his time, and his mental strength by animal indulgence. In a word, to sum up the whole in the language used by his biographer: "So exact was his distribution of his time, and so perfect the command of his mental powers, that, in addition to his preparation of two discourses in each week, his stated and occasional lectures, and his customary pastoral duties, he continued regularly his 'Notes on the Scriptures,' his 'Miscellanies,' his 'Types of the Messiah,' and a work he soon after his settlement at Northampton commenced, entitled, 'Prophecies of the Messiah in the Old Testament, and their Fulfilment.'"

It was to have been expected of one who was thus so frugal in the management of his time and strength as to accomplish an unusual amount of public duty, that in the more personal work of promoting the prosperity of his own soul he would exhibit at least an equally anxious and painstaking spirit. And such actually was the case. Among his private papers there are very many maxims and reflections in which this appears; and just as from the study of his plan of life we can explain to ourselves how it was that he was able, with his weak body to do so much of literary and pastoral work, so from an examination of his diary and resolutions, we can account, humanly speaking, for his eminence as a Christian. One or two extracts from these will serve to illustrate this point:—

"Resolved,—Never to lose one moment of time, but to improve it in the most profitable way I possibly can.

"Resolved,—To live with all my might while I do live.

"Resolved,—To live so at all times, as I think best in my most devout frames, and when I have the clearest notions of the things of the gospel and another world.

"Resolved,—To study the Scriptures so steadily, constantly, and frequently, as that I may find, and plainly perceive, myself to grow in the knowledge of the same.

"Resolved,—To ask myself at the end of every day, week, month, and year, wherein I could possibly in any respect have done better.

"Resolved,—Never to give over, nor in the least to slacken my fight with my corruption, however unsuccessful I may be.

"Resolved,—After afflictions, to inquire what I am the better for them; what good I have got by them; and what I might have got by them.

"I think it a very good way to examine dreams every morning when I awake; what are the nature, circumstances, principles, and ends of my imaginary actions and passions in them, in order to discern what are my prevailing inclinations, &c.

"How it comes about I know not, but I have remarked it hitherto, that at these times when I have read the Scriptures most I have evermore been most lively and in the best frame.

"Determined, when I am indisposed to prayer, always to premeditate what to pray for, and that it is better that the prayer should be of almost any shortness than that my mind should be almost continually off from what I say.

"I have loved the doctrines of the gospel; they have been to my soul like green pastures. The way of salvation by Christ has appeared in a general way glorious and excellent, most pleasant and most beautiful. It has often seemed to me that it would in a great measure spoil heaven to receive it in any other way.

"There are very few requests that are proper for an impenitent man that are not also, in some sense, proper for the godly.

"Though God has forgiven and forgotten your past sins, yet do not forget them yourself; often remember what a wretched bond-slave you were in the land of Egypt.

"One new discovery of the glory of Christ's face will do more toward scattering clouds of darkness in one minute than examining old experience, by the best marks that can be given through a whole year."

These sentences show that Edwards was not one who was concerned merely about right thinking in theology. The thirteen hours which he spent daily in his study were devoted to other ends besides the preparation of learned books. His thoughts took, to a great extent, a personal and practical turn. And hence we find in his writings quite as much of what may help us in holy living as what will give us clear, and sound, and satisfactory views of Christian doctrine. In every respect, in short, Edwards was pre-eminently a life in earnest, and as such it may be commended to the study, not only of those who have talents to employ in the public service of the Church, but of the humblest individual believer.

We had intended to have given in this paper a brief sketch of the revivals in which Edwards took a part, and of his important contributions toward the right management of such movements. But our space in the present is exhausted. In the meantime, we may conclude with remarking that the kind of service which this great Christian thinker has rendered to the Church generally, is exactly that which we might have expected. Sitting from day to day in his study with his thoughts concentrated on the Bible—the system of divine truth which he believed it to reveal—and the relation of the gospel to the world at large, and to the individual soul with which it was brought into contact, he could not but feel impelled to address himself to the solution of the more perplexing spiritual problems, and to the discovery, if possible, of an inner law of harmony under the outward chaos which appears in so many places to reign. Accordingly, we have from his pen elaborate treatises on such subjects as Original Sin, and the Freedom of the

Will,—a comprehensive review of the history of the world in its bearings on the great central event of all time, the crucifixion, under the title of the "History of Redemption,"—a searching examination into the nature and phenomena of spiritual religion in his "Religious Affections,"—and many sermons and other minor works, in which an effort is made to grapple with all the more pressing difficulties which trouble thoughtful and earnest minds.

WORDS TO SEEKERS.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER.

A FORMER article, addressed to the seeker after Christ, has called forth many kind and frank responses from various quarters. One of our correspondents writes to us out of the very blackness of darkness. Evidently an honest inquirer after elementary Christian truth, he proposes some very simple questions, which he says he "does not find intelligently answered" by those from whom he seeks spiritual guidance. As he states that "thousands of others" are as much in the dark as himself, we will try to reply to him and to them through the same column.

1. His first question is, "What is it to believe in Christ? As the devils are said to believe, how am I to believe differently from them?"

My friend, you want to know what faith is. It is simply taking God at his word. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." When the camp of Israel was in peril of death from the fatal bite of the fiery serpent, the command of God was to look at a brazen serpent on a pole which Moses set up in sight of all the people. That was a simple process surely—merely the looking toward an emblem of brass. The dying Israelite might sweep the horizon with his languid eye, and all to no purpose; but the moment that he fixed his eye on the serpent of brass, he was cured. Now there was faith in its simplest simplicity. He took God at his word. He trusted what God said, and relied on it. The restoration of the bitten Jew was made to depend on trusting in God's appointed method of relief. And your soul's salvation will depend on your obedience to God's command to "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ."

You will perhaps understand faith in Christ somewhat better if you separate the idea into its three component parts. In the first place it implies knowledge. You know (from the teachings of the Bible) that such a being exists as Jesus Christ, and that he made an atonement for sin upon the cross. In the second place it implies assent. You acknowledge, with all the heart, the truth of this atonement, and the sufficiency of it; and this you do in reliance on God's veracity. But knowledge is not enough, nor is assent enough. They are both matters of the understanding. You must also trust. This is the third element of faith, and so vital is it that there can be no saving faith without trust.

While assent is somewhat a speculative thing, trust is a real and a practical work of the will and of the affections too. The will makes choice of Christ as a Saviour, and the affections cling to him. He is entirely and thoroughly relied on as having atoned for our sins, as having taught us how to live by his own spotless example, as having provided for us a complete salvation. To him you are to submit. To him you are to give up your heart; you are to love Christ more than you love your gold and your silver, more than you love your wife or child, more than you love your own life. Whatever Christ bids you do in his word, that you are to do cheerfully. No matter how severely it may tax your selfishness, or try your patience; no matter what loss of time or fortune or friends it may cost you. Obedience is the test of faith. If you are not willing to take up a cross and follow in the path which Christ and your conscience direct, you cannot claim to be a Christian. You are not a true believer. For while the devils in the pit know of Christ, and assent to the claims of his divine power and majesty, they do not trust in Christ, nor do they love him. Here is the answer to the second part of your question. The devils have a speculative faith in Jesus, but their wills do not submit to him, and their affections do not cling to him; instead of that their whole souls boil with hatred and malignity toward him.

And now, my good friend, I have tried to tell you, in the most transparent language of which I am possessed, just what it is to believe in Jesus Christ. Whenever you can honestly trust in Jesus, and in Jesus alone, for your salvation—whenever you can shun an attractive object simply because Jesus forbids you to touch it—whenever you can cheerfully do a disagreeable, painful duty, solely because Jesus commands the self-sacrifice—whenever your heart begins to love Christ, and to love men around you as his children, and to love to draw men to Christ,—then may you begin to hope that you are a Bible Christian. You will never reach that state until the Holy Spirit comes to your help; and you must cry for his powerful influences upon your heart. It is a stubborn, wilful, wayward, selfish, wicked heart, that only a divine power can reform. But pray, do not insult the Most High by asking him to make you a better man, while you are lazily drifting along in the current of your own selfish lusts and desires, or else persistently holding to every bad practice you were ever inclined to. There is no such thing as faith without works. I have no confidence in the conversion of a tippler who occasionally seeks out his old haunts for his favourite glass. I have no confidence in the conversion of a passionate man if he is still willing to explode the wrathful oath, or to strike the revengeful blow. I have no confidence in the conversion of a miser if it does not unlock his purse, or of the slaveholder, if it does not lead him at once to treat his slave as a man, and not as a chattel, and to apply at once to that slave the golden rule. I have no confidence in any "faith" that does not make its possessor a better man, a better neighbour, a better citizen, a better child of our heavenly Father. Even a man's cat and dog ought to be the better off for his being a Christian.

I am not surprised to hear you say that you do not understand the nature of faith. Its very simplicity troubled you. You could not realize that the great thing and the one thing you were to do was simply to go to Jesus Christ, and to let him do the saving work for your soul. So in my schoolboy days in the country have I often seen a frightened sheep bewildering itself as to the right fashion of escaping from a pen, although the gate stood wide open. After many frantic dashings of its foolish head against bars and rails, it got the idea at last that it would be easier to pass out through an open gate than through a chestnut fence or a stone wall; and when it had found the right place, it bounded off with high leaps, perfectly overjoyed with its emancipation.

"The way of salvation is perfectly plain to me now," remarked a person once to her pastor. "The darkness is all gone. Everything is clear to me now. I do not know how or why it is so. But you read a hymn the other night, with these words:—

"A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
On thy kind arms I fall;
Be thou my strength and righteousness,
My Jesus and my all!"

I saw then at once that I had nothing to do but to trust in Jesus. I sat all the evening just thinking of those lines. I did not hear your prayer, nor your text, nor a word of your sermon. I thought of nothing but those lines then and ever since. I am so contented and happy. Why, sir, don't you think that the reason why we do not get out of our darkness sooner is that we don't believe?" From that evening onward that person had no difficulty with the way of salvation. She found out the right road when she trusted Christ to lead her into it; and having once entered upon it, she found it a path of pleasantness and of peace. My friend, Christ says to you as he did to Jairus, ONLY BELIEVE. "Ask and ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened to you." Perhaps the greatest difficulty with you after all is not so much an ignorance of the way of salvation as a refusal to walk in it. The theory of faith may continue to be a theological puzzle to you until you earnestly and prayerfully undertake to carry it into practice. Then you will discover that the right way of learning how a thing is done is to do it. May God give you strength equal to your day! He says, "Ye shall seek me and find me when ye search for me with all your heart."

SOUND LOGIC.

"Sir," said a pious lad to his pastor one evening, "the fellows in our shop are always picking flaws in Christians, and arguing against the Bible, and I don't know how to answer them."

"The best logic any one can use," answered his pastor, "is what a good man has called the logic of the life. Give them that, and they can't gainsay you."

"The logic of the life?" asked the lad, not quite understanding what his pastor meant.

"I will tell you," said he. "There was once employed at a dye-house as ungodly a set of fellows as could well be,—scoffers at religion, despisers of the word of God, swearing, drinking, betting, fighting, gambling. At last one of the number was drawn to a prayer-meeting, when the Spirit of God laid hold of him. Poor John was almost in despair about his sins, which, he said, looked black and blacker. But Jesus Christ came and spoke peace to his soul. Light broke upon him. Old things passed away, and all things became new. John really was 'made over.' He gave up his cups and the companions of his cups. He brought home his wages, set up family prayer, and everything, both within and without, wore an altered and improved look. Two of his fellow-workers, seeing this change for the better, took to John's new ways, reformed, went to meeting with him, and behaved like good Christians. John joined the Church, and from a tiger he became a lamb."

"John's religion was severely put to the proof at the dye-house. The dyers bantered him, ridiculed him, swore at him, and brought all their infidelity hotly to bear against both him and his religion. Tom and Jem tried for a time to stand up for him, and withstand the ungodly storm of their persecuting associates; but after a while they gave in, grew ashamed of their religion, deserted John, and went back to their old ways. As for John, much as his temper was tried, he bore himself patiently, watched over his weak points, clung closer to Christ, and stood firm as a rock. Poor John never undertook to say much, but his consistent Christian life was a powerful plea in behalf of his principles. One day however, after his fellow-workmen had been boasting what good infidelity would do, and how much harm the Bible had done, John's soul was stirred within him; he turned round, and said feelingly, but firmly, 'Well, let us deal plainly in this matter, my friends, and judge of the tree by the fruit it bears. You call yourselves infidels. Let us see what your principles do. I suppose what they do on a small scale they will do on a large one. Now there are Tom and Jem,' pointing to the two who went with him and then turned back. 'You have tried your principles on them, and know what they have done for them. When they tried to serve Christ they were civil, good-tempered, kind husbands and fathers. They were cheerful, hard-working, and ready to oblige. What have you made them? Look and see. They are cast down and cross; their mouths are full of cursing and filthiness; they are drunk every week, their children half clothed, their wives broken-hearted, their homes wretched. That is what your principles have done.'

"Now I have tried Christ and his religion; and what has it done for me? You know well what I used to be. There were none of you that could drink so much, swear so desperately, and fight so masterly. I had no money, and nobody would trust me. My wife was ill-used. I was ill-humoured, hateful, and hating. What has religion done for me? Thank God, I am not afraid to put it to you. Am I not a happier man than I was? Am I not a better workman and a kinder companion? Would I once have put up with what I now bear from you? I could beat any of you as easily now as ever. Why don't I? Do you hear a foul word from my mouth? Do you catch me at a public-house? Has anybody a score against me? Go and ask my neighbours if I am not altered for the better. Go and ask my wife. Let my house bear witness. God be praised, here is what Christianity has done for me; there is what infidelity has done for Jem and Tom.'

"John stopped. The dyers had not a word to say. He used a logic they could not answer—the logic of the life. If you cannot argue, you can act. If you cannot reason with the enemies of the Bible, you can live out its blessed truths, and so 'with well-doing put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.'"

SEEING AND NOT PERCEIVING.

HUMAN beings and the higher classes of animals have five senses—so the schools taught us. Whatever is cognizable by either of these, we perceive, while other objects have for us no existence. Revelation assures us that ministering angels visit our world. They exist among us, and the possession of another sense would enable us to perceive them. But at present they are without our consciousness, and exist to us only in faith. There are tribes of animals that are destitute of some of these senses, and men who are created without them, and hence the particular class of objects perceived by this wanting sense, have for them no existence. All beautiful objects in art, or nature, are annihilated to him that has no eyes.

"Cloud instead, and ever-during dark Surrounds them."

The concord of sweet sounds exists not for him who cannot hear. The whole material world to us exists in our senses, and passes with them away.

These physical malformations suggests the frequent absence among men of some one or the other of what we may call the moral senses, or the faculty by which certain moral evils are recognised. We often see persons utterly unconscious of the evil that attends their steps. A man will walk over his plantation, hear the lash of the overseer, look upon brutalized beings that call him master, with no more capacity to perceive the real misery about him, than an oyster (supposing that animal to be made without ears) has of hearing the roar of the ocean. The assertion of the latter that the sea never makes a noise, is as convincing as the testimony of the former to the happy state of things existing about him.

Neither intentionally mislead, but both indicate clearly that a sense is wanting to perceive realities that are very near to them—as near as the angels are to us sometimes, without our perceiving it.

This want of a particular sense is manifested in the inability to understand the conduct of others. Men often move under the force of impulses, which their observers do not feel, in the clear view of things which they do not see. How inexplicable to most of the men of his day was the career of Martyn. Away from home, and kindred, and country, and the fair prospects which his learning and talents held out to him, he was borne by a force as mysterious as that which in the face of the wondering spectators urged the sailless, oarless boat of Fulton against wind and current. They wanted the "sense" by which to perceive the truth that, shining into his soul, made plain and luminous the path he trod.

"He saw a sight they did not see,
He heard a sound they did not hear."

In a review of Bunyan's "Pilgrim," Lord Macaulay asserts that some of the writer's religious experience exhibits evidence of insanity. In proof of this he quotes, among others, the following passage:—

"I walked to a neighbouring town; and sat down upon a settle in the street, and fell into a very deep pause about the most fearful state my sin had brought me to; and after long musing, I lifted up my head; but methought I saw as if the sun that shineth in the heavens did grudge to give me light; and as if the very stones in the streets and the tiles on the houses did band themselves against me. Methought that they all combined together to banish me out of the world! I was abhorred of them, and unfit to dwell among them, because I had sinned against the Saviour. Oh, how happy now was every creature over I! For they stood fast and kept their station. But I was gone and lost." To this quotation the reviewer adds the following comment. "Scarcely any mad-house could produce an instance of delusion so strong, or of misery so acute."

Now, to multitudes, Macaulay has here proved, not Bunyan's insanity, but (the want of a sense to perceive the truth set forth in these words) his own inability to understand the language he criticises. Bunyan, with his peculiar temperament, and living in an age when no one thought or spoke by the halves, expressed feelings which great numbers now living have experienced in kind, and which are not therefore to them evidences of insanity at all, but of a singularly clear conception of the truth relating to man as a fallen and accountable being. How many a poor man could have shown him that these were words of truth and soberness, and perfectly plain to any one who had experienced the transforming power of the Spirit upon his own heart. We often read comments upon religious experience which remind us of a blind man's assertion that the colour of green resembled a cube. The talk is very fine, only it displays an utter misapprehension of the whole subject. The apostle explains the cause of the failure in 1 Cor. ii. 14.

"It is a misfortune to lose any of our senses." It is worse than that to lose some of them.—Congregationalist.

THE TEMPTATION OF CHRIST.

THE Christ, so suddenly revealed, has vanished as suddenly from the sight of the Baptist. After those few moments of silent prayer, He has mingled with the throng of penitents, and passed through unnoticed as he came. The bright celestial sign that had rested on his head has disappeared, but the fulness of the Spirit abides on him, and not as the Man Christ Jesus came to the banks of the Jordan does He go his way—not now to turn his homeward steps to quiet Nazareth, but into the broad world of God lying in the shadow of sin, to begin the work to which he has been consecrated by the mystical unction of the Holy One. Yet before He can stand forth as the Messiah in the eyes of Israel, a season of severest discipline, a spiritual preparation for his work, must intervene. Other eyes than those of angels and men had witnessed the scene on Jordan's shore. That voice from heaven had struck the powers of evil—invisible yet anxious watchers of the baptism—with foreboding and dismay. Interpreted, it meant that the promise of Eden was at length fulfilled,—that on this earth, where the tempter had held for ages the souls of men in bondage, One had sprung up from amongst his brethren to defy the adversary and redress their wrongs. In that transient gleam which through the opening heavens had illumined the face of Jesus of Nazareth, the Redeemer had been unmasked to the Destroyer; and from this moment he is singled out for the fiercest assault of the Spirit of Evil.

A few hours, and as the purple fire of sunset burned out on the ridges of Moab, and the broad, still expanse of waters at their feet changed to ashy paleness, night closed in upon the Saviour amid strange and dreary scenes. It has been but a step from the crowded terraces of Jordan to the wild, chilling solitude of the desert. For miles around him stretches the unpeopled wilderness,—tangled thickets, and rocky caverns, where the wild beasts crouch and prowl—whether we are to look for the region of the forty days' retreat amidst the gaunt ravines into which the mountain chain is cloven that walls in the Dead Sea at its western shore, or where old tradition has placed it, amidst the precipitous cliffs of Quarantania that overhang in gloomy isolation the plain of Jericho. It is the same Spirit who guided His steps from the hills of Galilee, to the sacred river who now leads him into the wilderness, and leads him thither to be tempted. He has girded on his armour, and here, enfeebled and alone, he is to meet the first brunt of the assault, to realize in profound experiences that the conflict is begun, of which not till he hangs on the cross shall he say, IT IS FINISHED.

Regarding this retirement with its fast of forty days as a preparation for His ministry, we cannot overlook the parallel to it that occurs in the history of the two greatest prophets of the Ancient Church. Moses, the giver of the law, Elijah, the restorer of the law, had been for the like period in the solitudes of Horeb, supernaturally upheld—a season passed by them, we cannot doubt, in prayer and self-discipline and communion with God. And there would seem in this to be a symbolic association of His work, as the Fulfiller of the law, with theirs; only that this experience with him stands out in a grander and severer form, invested with a spiritual sublimity of its own as befitting the transcendent dignity of His person and his mission,—as if the highest human manifestations of self-sacrifice in endurance and saintliness in devotion that had been seen on earth, were but prefigurations of that which was to reach the measure of its perfectness in him.

From the narrative of Matthew, we might suppose that the temptation commenced at the close of the forty days; but from the testimony of the other evangelists, it is clear that through all the time he was in prolonged conflict with the powers of darkness. He was with the wild beasts, but

They at His sight grew mild,
Nor sleeping him nor waking harmed; His walk
The fiery serpent fled, and noxious worm,
The lion and fierce tiger glared aloof.

Other shadows fell upon his path, deadlier enemies were ambushed round him. Nothing can give us a more terrible impression of the malignity of the Evil Spirit than to conceive of him as restlessly haunting and assailing our Lord all that long interval,—bringing all his resources of craft and subtlety to bear,—exhausting all the devices of that practised warfare which he had waged from the beginning with the souls of men. By sudden onset or insidious approach, by dark suggestions or distracting thoughts, invading the holy hour of prayer, or the quiet vigil of meditation, he strove for forty days to wear out and overpower the man Christ Jesus. But this untiring and relentless tenacity of purpose was met and baffled by a will collected and inflexible in the calm fortitude and unsleeping vigilance of its resolves.

Throughout this period, without nourishment of any kind, the Saviour's strength had been miraculously sustained. Now, as if this support had been suddenly withdrawn to give the adversary a greater advantage, he begins to feel the physical faintness, and, we may imagine, the mental depression consequent on a lengthened fast.

His frame must have borne traces of exhaustion; and this encouraged the tempter to a more desperate effort. Hitherto he has been preternaturally upheld,—now that his bodily strength is giving way, his spiritual energy may be relaxed, and in the next trial he may prove weak as another man—He, and in him all the hopes of the world, struck down on the threshold of his great enterprise.

Accordingly, we may regard the three recorded Temptations as the master-devices of the enemy, embodying the principle or germ of the manifold wiles with which he entangles and ruins the souls of men,—the three concentrated forms in which the evil that is in the world takes substance, and stands in seductive guise before man's spirit,—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life.

At the end of the forty days the tempter came to him. Hitherto invisible, the fallen angel now assumes in his terrible daring a material form, puts on, in ghastly mimicry of the Incarnation, the likeness of man. We accept the statements of Scripture in their plain and literal sense, as implying that throughout these closing scenes Satan stood face to face with Christ, that he audibly spoke to him, really transported him to the battlements of the Temple, and thence to an exceeding high mountain. We cannot believe that these were a series of visions presented to the Saviour's imagination, as if, in the faintness that ensued from protracted abstinence, he had fallen into a trance, in which His fancy was excited through the tempter's influence into morbid activity. And still less can we entertain for a moment another view, but rather indignantly recoil from the impiety, which, from unwillingness to admit, or a determination not to admit, the personality of Satan, supposes that these temptations were the spontaneous suggestion of the Saviour's own mind in this state of physical and mental depression; as if the imagined possibility of a soul like His initiating any evil solicitation were not destructive of all genuine belief in his essential and perfect holiness. The capability of enduring temptation was inseparable from his perfect humanity. The capability of generating temptation was inconsistent with his inherent sinlessness. Evil originating there, wrong desire self-evolved in the faintest tinge of feeling or the most evanescent shade of thought, would have sullied His absolute purity, and Jesus Christ could not have been man's Redeemer.

The first temptation was addressed to the sensual appetite, and may be regarded as an enticement to unbelief or distrust of the divine power and goodness: "If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread,"—the first audible word in the ear of Jesus since the voice from heaven proclaimed, "Thou art my well-beloved Son." The voice from hell insinuates a doubt,—"If thou be;" and demands a proof on what seems a specious ground. The Son of God perishing at the gate of his Father's house, where all have bread enough and to spare; hiding in a desert from the eyes of men, forsaken, suffering, helpless,—in want of bread! The contradiction was indeed strange and painful. How easy, how natural, to show by sign that he was what he claimed to be. Miracles had been done in a wilderness before. Manna had fallen on the stones, and a word from the lips of the Son of God could surely change these stones into bread. Our Lord repels this temptation not by any reassertion of His Divine Sonship, but by placing himself on the common level of humanity, affirming, as Man, his trust in God's upholding power,—"IT IS WRITTEN, MAN LIVETH NOT BY BREAD ALONE, BUT BY EVERY WORD THAT PROCEEDETH OUT OF THE MOUTH OF GOD." He who had provided bread from heaven for Israel in the desert, could provide for Him the hidden manna of his word,—could give him meat to eat that others knew not of. Forty days already he had been sustained without the sense of hunger,—now that he is an hungered, He will cast the burden of his maintenance on God, and find food convenient in the promise, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be." His Father has brought him into this trial, and He will bring him through it. He may not grasp at any sinful expedient to deliver himself, for this would be to assert, as man, independence of choice and action; but patiently leave the time and way of deliverance in God's hands, and in quietness and confidence shall be his strength. The same spirit that breathed in his first boyish words, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" inspires this calm response to the tempter, "Wist thou not that I must be submissive to my Father's will?" that "my meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work?" It is the same patient, unassuming, trustful spirit,—ever drawing strength into itself from a heavenly source, to lift it above the pressure of earthly trials—that may be traced through all His human life—that shone out in its last sublimest phase when, in his dying agony, he heard the taunt, "If he be the King of Israel, let him come down from the cross;" and he made no answer, and sought not to save himself, till He could say, "It is finished," and become the Saviour of our fallen race.

The second temptation, following the arrangement of Matthew, who narrates them evidently in the order of succession, was of a more spiritual kind. It was artfully constructed out of the answer to the first, and appealed to that devout and implicit trust in God which He had expressed. By some mysterious power permitted to the adversary over the person of our Lord, he is enabled to transport him to the pinnacle of the Temple—probably the aerial summit of Herod's royal portico, on one side overlooking the ravine of the Kidron at a giddy depth below, and on the other the open court of the house. Jesus had said, "I will work no miracle that would show distrust of my Father's power to provide for me." The tempter suggests, "If such is thy firm trust in God, here give public and visible proof of it. Do not confine this display of faith to the wilderness where there are no eyes to see it. Here, on the loftiest battlement of the Temple, stand forth in the sight of men. Proclaim thy Messiahship in hearing of the priests and worshippers below. Cast thyself headlong from the verge, and thus evince thy trust in the promise, "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." Borne up on invisible wings, thou wilt softly alight on the marble pavement, and all Jerusalem will hasten to greet the Son of God and the King of Israel. The temptation was barbed by a subtle reason, the keen and venomous point well hidden in these words of sacred inspiration.

Jesus said unto him, "IT IS WRITTEN AGAIN, THOU SHALT NOT TEMPT THE LORD THY GOD." That clear perspicuous glance pierced in an instant to the heart of the enticement, and unveiled the sin that lurked in its specious folds. Distrust may be wrong, but it does not follow that presumption is right. Because the Christ may not shrink from the trial to which God has called him, it does not follow that He may rush into a trial to which God has not called him. He could not be tempted to employ means which were unlawful to prolong his life; no more will He be tempted to neglect the means which are lawful to preserve it. He would not change stones into bread that he might live; neither will he cast his body down from the dizzy parapet to show that he cannot die. He will not work miracles where God can provide means yet unknown. He will not demand miracles when he despises means that are at hand. There is a difference between trusting God and tempting God. I will trust him at all times; I will tempt him never. Many a time in the after life of the Man of Sorrows was this spirit—the "meekness of wisdom"—to be seen in clear and consistent operation. In the harmonious action of these two principles, holy confidence and holy watchfulness, ardent zeal tempered by calm deliberation, boldness to act and prudence to wait,—His was a plain and even path, trodden with a foot that never swerved to either perilous edge of despondency or presumption. By no sudden pressure of events could he be forced from it either way, or the balance of his soul be disturbed. Never do we see Him rushing into danger, but often withdrawing from the violence of his enemies, because his hour was not yet come; and then when the hour approached, steadfastly setting His face to go to Jerusalem; and when it came, standing forth amidst the gleam of torches and the glitter of weapons in Gethsemane, and saying, "I AM HE!"

More refined and insidious than the first, which sought to ensnare through a bodily appetite, the second essayed to ensnare through a spiritual feeling, the strength and simplicity of His dependence on God. Thus stealthily will the Serpent wind himself into the soul; thus has he often worn out the saints of the Most High,—practised and prospered. The heart that has been closed to the hissing whisper of the fiend of darkness, has not been proof against the bland and silvery voice that has stolen over it from the lips of one appalled as an angel of light.

The third temptation would seem to have been wildly inspired by the hope that a sudden and overpowering appeal to that selfish passion in which he knew from long experience the secret of man's weakness lay—that thirst for fame, which has been called the "last infirmity of noble mind," might discover the vulnerable point in Him, if such were to be found. Through the lust of dominion he had from the beginning led men captive at his will, strengthened his deadly hold on this world as its prince through the gilded baits he had dangled in the eyes of men; and if in this human soul one grain of pride were latent, the glory of a vision of earthly power and sovereignty lighting up its inmost recesses would make it visible, the fiery breath of the tempter passing over it would kindle the smouldering spark into flame. From the Temple parapet Christ is borne to the ridge of an "exceeding high mountain," whence, by some infernal sleight or enchantment of the sense, "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them" are shown in a moment of time,—all that earth held of royal state and grandeur, of glittering pomp and loveliness, of bewitching art and luxury, gathered into a dazzling focus, or marshalled in a magnificent pageant that swept as in a golden mist before His gaze. He had just seen Jerusalem, and we doubt not the Man of Galilee now saw Rome, the imperial city, the sight of which in its glory was one of the three strange things which Augustine wished he might have seen on earth.

"The city which thou seest no other deem Than great and glorious Rome, queen of the earth,
So far renowned, and with the spoils enriched
Of nations; there the Capitol thou seest
Above the rest lifting his stately head
On the Tarpeian rock, her citadel
Impregnable; and there Mount Palatine,
The imperial palace, compass huge, and high
The structure, skill of noblest architects,
With gilded battlements, conspicuous far,
Turrets and terraces, and glittering spires.
Many a fair edifice besides, more like Houses of gods, thou may'st behold
Outside and inside both, pillars and roofs,
Carved work, the hand of famed artificers
In cedar, marble, ivory, or gold.
Thence to the gates cast round thine eyes, and see What conflux issuing forth or entering in;
Prætors, proconsuls to their provinces
Hasting, or on return, in robes of state;
Lictors and rods, the ensigns of their power;
Legions and cohorts, turns of horse and wings
Or embassies from regions far remote."

A gleam of imagined triumph must have shot from his eyes, as, unvizarding himself at last, the Spirit of Darkness said, "All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it. If thou therefore wilt worship me, all shall be thine." It was but for a moment,—that voice found no hollow place in the heart of the Son of Man to send back its echo. The calm, untroubled eye of the Holy One met his, as He crushed the falsehood and the blasphemy with a few words of truth,—“Get thee behind me, Satan; for IT IS WRITTEN, THOU SHALT WORSHIP THE LORD THY GOD, AND HIM ONLY SHALT THOU SERVE."

That vision of sense had no charm to eyes that had seen the glories of heaven; it could awaken no feeling but of loathing and sadness in Him who beheld on all earth's beauty the blight of evil, and heard the wail of human spirits pining in the prison-house of sin. The gorgeous apparition was but a masque of Death—a ghastly phantom procession; and through its haze of deceptive splendour the Man of Sorrows had only a clearer vision of the cross.

His long probation is ended. Baffled and confounded the tempter departs, though but for a season, stung by the shame of his first defeat since he had prevailed over man in paradise, and with a presentiment of coming overthrow. In this desert the Tree of Life, withered long ago in Eden, has begun to bloom for human-kind again. "The devil leaveth him," and angels come to minister to the Lord, reviving his outworn frame, and soothing his weary, long-strained spirit with a breath of heaven. Unspeakable must have been the joy and refreshment of that communion with God, undisturbed and undarkened by the intrusion of the accursed shadow that had haunted Him so long. "In all points tempted like as we are," He goes forth from the wilderness into the world, which, though under the spell of Satan, is still his Father's house, with a more intense and tender sympathy for all the infirmities and trials of men, weakened through the loss of their original holiness. Tempted, yet sinless, He gives us the assurance that in the season of spiritual conflict he will be at hand with heavenly succour. No desert so lonesome, no Gethsemane so dark and fearful, that he, as the strengthening Angel, will not be there, helping us to stand fast and overcome. For our use he has left that weapon of celestial temper which He wielded, the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. And drawing help and courage from His presence, resting on the sure word of his promise, the weakest liegeman that fights under his banner need not fear though an host should encamp against him. Armed with this talisman, IT IS WRITTEN, He can pass through the thickest ranks of the legions of darkness unharmed. They may compass him about like bees; they may thrust sore at him that he may fall, but clad in ethereal panoply, the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, he is invulnerable and invincible. The shield of faith inscribed with this legend is able to quench the fiery darts of the wicked. The Word in its inexhaustible fullness, in its perpetual freshness of resource, is the mystical tower of David, builded for an armoury, hung round with golden bucklers. A thousand swords may threaten the Christian soldier, but there are a thousand shields to guard him. He is wiser than his enemies, and stronger too. He fights in a good cause; he has great allies; he serves under a Captain who has made him already more than conqueror. And for each true heart that manfully fights the good fight of faith, the palm-branch of victory is waiting, when, after this mortal toil and weariness, he has reached the better country, where there is "neither adversary nor evil occurrent."

"THY HIDDEN ONES."

I SUPPOSE we never shall know how many dangers we have escaped in this life until we are beyond it. Heathen fable has given birth to two very touching symbols of providence—the enveloping cloud and the guardian angel. The ancients used to believe that around those whom the gods loved there was thrown, on all needed occasions, a mantle of impervious nebula, through which they could easily see, yet behind which they could remain unseen by all who sought to do them injury. And, moreover, to make their safety absolutely certain, a particular spirit was drafted from the heavenly host, to stand viewlessly by each individual, and care for his good.

Our Christian faith has given reality to both of these representations. And what is the more remarkable, is the fact that inspiration has caught the same emblems by which to speak of this special help and sedulous watching. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "The Lord will create upon every dwelling-place of Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night."

We run along the verge of the strangest possibilities, sometimes in our everyday existence, and no one ever seems to know it but God. In one of the bright tales of polite literature, there is drawn a picture of real life, in a very simple but most powerful apologue. A youth, ingenious and ambitious, starts to seek his fortune far away from his native village. Wearied with travel, he falls asleep at the entrance of a city, beside a public fountain. While he lies there, unconscious, and apparently unprotected, the throng of hurrying thousands continues to pass by him. And many a one has a remark to make concerning the slumbering stranger. An aged couple stand for awhile conversing about a plan of adopting him for their son. A merchant pauses to think of making him a partner or a clerk. Two robbers whisper together, plotting to murder him for the sake of his little wallet of clothes. A young girl, of wilfulness and wealth, pleased with the ruddy and honest face, beseeches her father to send the carriage to bring him to their home, that he may live there with them. Thus, in turn, the changes and the chances of life, the evil and the good, are just within hailing distance. Yet he sleeps on, and at last rises for his journey again, never knowing how near he has been to what would have been thought his making or his ruin. God had his own plans for the lad, and in the end the story develops them, and all are for good.

Now, have we not all passed through similar 'crisis-times to this? One single alteration in the direction of our tastes or our principles in our forming years might have for ever checked the usefulness of our lives. One purpose of man, left to be fulfilled, might have turned away the most gracious purpose of God, and stranded us on the sand, wrecked and dismantled. Richard Baxter was wise enough to admit this in his own case. He has recorded with much gratitude a kind interposition of Providence, by which, he says, he had in early life "narrowly escaped getting a place at court." If he had been entangled then, where would the poor world have found its "Call to the Unconverted," or the hungering Church sought for its "Saints' Rest?" God had a work in his own purpose, which he "hid" him just then to do.

There is really great comfort in this remembrance. Every good man's life is a plan of God. This ennoble its purpose, and dignifies its course. He will be kept out of danger, or protected even in the midst of it, that the Almighty will may be done. These are grand words for him to sing to his soul: "He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust; his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling." Every true Christian may throw himself back upon this protection, trusting in the very name he bears as one of the "hidden ones."

There are needed, however, two cautions of great practical moment. The one is, that we keep within our legitimate sphere of duty. God has never promised to stand by a zeal which is not "according to knowledge." Rashness is not a Christian grace, but an imperfection. Going too far is just as bad as going not far enough. Going on, is not always advancing. Going back, is not always going wrong. The Israelites were going back all the way into Canaan. "There is an overdoing," says the quaint Matthew Henry, "as well as an under-doing; and such an overdoing as amounts to an undoing."

You must have observed how wily Satan was in his temptation of our Lord. In one of the Scripture passages he quoted, there were a few words which bore hard upon his doctrine. These he quietly dropped. He wanted the Saviour to cast himself off from the top of the Temple, and so startle the people into admitting his Messiahship; "for it is written," said he, "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou shalt dash thy foot against a stone."

"Yes, all that was written; but that was not all that was written. The best part, the wisest part, the limiting part of the verse, he left out. Take your Bible, and see how it reads in the ninety-first Psalm, which was what he pretended to quote. "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." As long as one is where he ought to be, in the "ways" where God and duty call him to be, he is safe. But when one runs before he is sent, or where he is not wanted, off the path which God gave him to walk in, then he may be assured he will dash his foot against a great many stones, for all that the angels will do to keep him. Resisting the devil is duty, and God will help us out in it, though we are pressed to the last. "I am immortal," said Whitefield, "till my work is done." But falling down an uncalled for pinnacle, among a violent and wrong-headed mob, is not a duty. And if anybody be a "hidden one" in such a case, it is likely to be the angel.

The other caution is, that we always remember it is God who hides the Christian, not the Christian who hides himself. In the time of danger he must leave it to his captain to order a retreat. Out in the plain is our place till the command comes to send us into the refuge of rock. Martin Luther once longed for just such a place as Wartburg Castle, and once was very impatient at being within its walls. But he was heady enough to desire to be in, when the Reformation needed him to be out; and to desire to be out, when the greater glory of God needed him to be in. In this world of conflict, to be manifest is the rule; to be withdrawn is the exception, and needs a special order from head-quarters to each soldier by name. Nicodemus may come at night as secretly as he will, but he must come at the break of day with his spices. A poor invalid may creep up as unobservedly as possible to touch the hem of the Saviour's garment; but when the Master asks, "Who touched me?" she must come out without fear of the crowd, and boldly acknowledge him.

Now it is worth something to bear this in mind in such times as these. The days of sifting have come. Right down in the midst of the communities a new standard has been planted. The need now is to know who is on the Lord's side. Every Christian is to show himself clearly. The tests are as numerous as the spirit of evil can make them. The Sabbath is menaced in our halls of legislation. The Bible is attacked in the midst of our schools. Morality is undermined by daring exhibitions of vice. The Church is assailed from the popular platforms. Great principles of truth and justice are contradicted by those high in authority. In the midst of such exigencies constantly arising, it becomes us to forget we are "hidden ones" in any sense other than protected ones; protected just in order that we may become manifest without peril.

The easiest way is to sail over the sea on our own errands, and leave the factions to fight. But the easiest way is not the most loyal, nor even the safest. If a ball comes beating over the water, it is craven to attempt to fly. Up with the banner of Christ to the mast-head, and trust to his unseen help. There will be other roarings heard, and other shot cleaving the air, before a single ship shall go down. "A good man struggling with adversity," said the old heathen, "is a sight for the gods to look at." A Christian battling for the right, is a nobler sight than that.

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN.

BY REV. JAMES BOLTON.

"And he wept aloud, and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard."—GEN. xl. 2.

I NEVER read this Scripture in the Old Testament but I think of another in the New Testament, so like it, and yet so different. You will find it in Acts xvi. 25, "And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises unto God, and the prisoners heard them." Now, we should have imagined that Joseph would have been the person to sing aloud, and Paul and Silas the persons to weep aloud; for Joseph was surrounded with every happiness, whilst Paul and Silas were in a dungeon, in the dark, their feet in the stocks, their backs torn and bleeding, hungry and thirsty. Yet it was Paul and Silas who sang aloud, and it was Joseph who wept aloud. The prisoners in the Philippian jail heard singing, and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard weeping.

It is strange that though the two things—weeping and singing—seem so opposite to each other, they are often hand in hand; tears never fall faster than when our hearts are bursting with joy!

Still, it is one thing to sing aloud and another thing to weep aloud. Children weep aloud constantly; it is their way of expressing pain, vexations, wishes. It is as easy to get a cry from a child as it is to get a shower from an apple-tree when it has been raining.—You have but to touch it, and down come the drops! It must be said, too, that women—our mothers and sisters—frequently weep aloud.—They are so tender that a little thing will set them off. But I will venture to say, that some of you never heard a man weep aloud. Ministers have to go into hundreds of sad scenes, and yet I can only remember hearing men weep aloud three or four times. I recollect hearing a poor German emigrant weeping aloud in a barn in America.—I could not understand what he was saying, but I shall never forget how it frightened me. I recollect a husband suddenly breaking out into wild lamentations over the grave of his wife; they are in my ears now! And I recollect a father running in from his garden, wailing piteously. He had lost his favourite boy: they had been playing on the lawn but yesterday; he had been racing over the flower-beds, digging with his wooden spade, and carrying grass in his tiny wheelbarrow, but that evening he sickened and died. The father, for the sake of others, had borne up bravely at the death-bed, and during the solemn interval between it and the funeral. He had even borne up bravely at the burial,—at least his weeping was silent weeping; but when all was over, and he went for a walk in the garden, there stood the wooden spade and the loaded wheelbarrow, and there were the small footmarks on the flower-beds, just as his darling had left them a week ago: That was too much for him, and, as I said, he hurried back weeping aloud!

So, whilst we laugh at children's tears, and whilst they are a woman's ornament, it is an awful thing to hear a man weep aloud,—generally he has good cause for it,—well, then, why did Joseph weep aloud? He has sent all his servants and suite out of the room; he is alone with his brethren, and the first thing that his servants and suite hear is—"Hark! what is that?—it is somebody weeping aloud! It is Joseph's voice!—Not a sound but Joseph's convulsive sobs!"

You are familiar with the beautiful story; can you guess why he thus wept aloud? I fancy I can see six reasons for it:—

I. His pent-up feelings. When we give way to our feelings, as we generally do, directly they affect us, we can get through without much trouble; but when we hide and restrain them for a while they become turbulent. When I was a lad I used to be fond of damming up a brook which meandered through our farm: it was a quiet brook, you would scarcely have noticed that it was moving along; but we built a wall of stones, and sticks, and mud across it, and threw it back over the meadow, till, by-and-by, with a rush and a roar like a cataract, it broke its rampart, and swept stones, sticks, and mud before it as if they were chaff.

Now, Joseph had been "refraining himself" for months, and on several very trying occasions. If he had relieved himself, it had been in his secret chamber, and then he had put on his stern face and careless air again. Is it any wonder that when all this was at its height, and on the point of being loosened, it vented itself in these boisterous emotions?

II. There was the sight of Benjamin. He had longed to see him, and when he saw him, he had longed to fold him to his bosom; but he had to deny himself hitherto, and treat him as a stranger. Now he confronted him with a heaving breast. He was his own dear brother—"my mother's son." He called to mind how they had sported together in their infancy, how they had whispered their secrets to each other, and shared each other's pleasures. And for twenty years they had been cruelly separated!

Would not the sight of Benjamin help to unnerve Joseph?

III. There were the thoughts of his father—his aged and fondly loved father. How vividly what had passed had brought him up before him!—His early partiality for him, his fervent kisses, his morning blessing, his talk about Rachel, his coat of many colours for him, his listening to his curious dreams, that hour when he had bidden him farewell at the door, never more to gaze on his venerable form, till sorrow had whitened his head! His brethren had been speaking much of Jacob—of the “old man”—of his grey hairs—of how he had pined for his Joseph. This had stirred Joseph to the depths. He had his father's image and tones vividly present; and this, too, would account for his weeping aloud.

IV. There was his harsh treatment of his brethren. This had been most difficult, and yet most necessary. He had recognised them the instant they entered his presence, and as quickly he had determined to punish them, for their own welfare. They had steeled themselves to his “anguish when he had besought them;” now he will steel himself to theirs, till they are thoroughly humbled and contrite. He put them through a rigorous course of discipline. His lessons for them had cut them like knives. He had charged them with meanness, treachery, theft, falsehood. He had treated them now with disdain, now with rigour, now with bitterness. They believed him to be a tyrant; and yet his bowels yearned towards them. When he spoke fiercely to them, —when he commanded them to be bound and led to slavery, he could barely keep his arms from flying to embrace them. When this was finished, he could not but accuse himself of severity to them; and this would add to his inward struggle.

V. There was Judah's earnest pleading. Study that remonstrance for yourselves. There are not more melting words in the Bible. They would have softened a stone. They must have wrought Joseph to a perfect pitch of excitement. It was impossible for him to resist such an appeal. Mark how he pictures their common parent; his enfeebled frame; his grief at Joseph's fate; his doting attachment for Benjamin; his reluctance to part with him.—“His life is bound up in his life.” Mark how magnanimously he declares himself responsible for Benjamin's return,—“If I bring him not unto thee, then I will bear the blame for ever,” and entreats Joseph to accept him as his bondsman in Benjamin's stead.

Ab, Joseph, no marvel that you wept aloud after that intercession!

VI. There was what he was about to disclose to them.

Startling news has a queer fashion of choking our utterance and paralyzing our tongues.—We want to communicate it, but it hangs fire, and at length explodes us instead of our exploding it! Who has not wept aloud when he was about to relate what would be sure to produce weeping aloud? And here Joseph had it on his lips: “I am JOSEPH! I am he whom ye sold into Egypt! God hath made ME LORD AND RULER throughout Egypt! Go and fetch my father; and he and you shall have the fat of the land during the famine! Benjamin, you remember me, don't you? Judah, Simeon, Reuben, you remember me, do you not?” Is it surprising that, with this disclosure on his lips, Joseph wept aloud ere he could stammer it forth?

I conceive not. I conceive that these six things working together in him were sufficient reasons for his weeping aloud, and probably were the true grounds of it. Would not you have wept aloud with half of them fermenting in your breast?

But now arises the question, What do we weep aloud for? All of us have fountains of tears in us, and various things will set them overflowing. It was a custom with the ancients to have small bottles in which they caught their tears at their friends' sepulchres; and then these bottles were deposited in the urns which contained their ashes. David says, “Put thou my tears into thy bottle.” What quantities of bottles some people could fill with tears! They would require half a dozen a month! But is it not so, that we are prone to weep aloud over what really is not worth it, or over what really is beneficial to us? What should we say to a gooseberry bush weeping aloud because it was not planted in the first row, or because it had not as many dew spangles on it as its neighbour? And what should we say to a currant bush weeping aloud because the owner at this season cut out its dead wood and its waste wood, in order to double its red clusters in July? But we are weak creatures. We cannot check our tears, though we may admit that they are foolish. But now I will mention four things which we may properly weep aloud for, which we cannot bewail too much:—

First, Our Sins. They offend and dishonour God. They defile, and wound, and destroy our souls. They crucified Jesus. We are indignant with the Jews and Romans for piercing His precious flesh on Calvary; but our sins were what compelled Him to be so tortured, —they were the nails which fastened Him there. Oh, weep aloud over your sins, as Peter did over his denial of Jesus,—as Esau did over his forfeited birthright,—as David did over Absalom,—as Joseph did here! I once asked an American school-fellow what spots on earth were dearest to him.—I meant what places where we had been together. He said, “Those where I have watered the moss or the dust with tears for my sins,—those shady lanes,—those narrow glades in the forest,—those corners in the cherry orchards around the college, to which I crept from the cricket-match or baseball.”

Second, Our UNKINDNESSES. Would that I could engrave on every youthful memory those simple lines,—

"Evil is wrought from want of thought
As well as from want of heart."

We do not intend always to injure or distress ; but we say what does it, or we do what does it, and then we treat it lightly, whilst the sensitive sufferer goes home refusing to be comforted. We eat, drink, and are merry, whilst he has no appetite ; we sleep sweetly, whilst he cannot close his eyes ; our cheeks are rosy, whilst his are pale ; we laugh, but he sighs. And what if we intended this ?—what if we do it deliberately and repeatedly ? I am satisfied that there is nothing which will so haunt us, when we are lying at the door-step of eternity, as such unkindnesses. Then we shall weep aloud over them ; but it is better to do so now, when we can pick out the thorn both from our own consciences and the wronged one's side.

Thirdly, Our INGRATITUDES. Who has not these to mourn over : Ingratitude to God, our bounteous Creator and Preserver ; ingratitude to Jesus, who redeemed us by his own shame and agony ; ingratitude to the Holy Spirit, who has sought our salvation when we have disregarded it ; ingratitude to all those who are over us in the Lord ! A young man whom he had rescued from drowning, was reproved by a Christian gentleman for Sabbath desecration. He actually swore at him, and bade him attend to his own business. But that base ingratitude rose up before him wherever he went. It wasted him to a skeleton ; but he would not tell anybody what it was. At last he beckoned his sister to his couch, and said, in broken accents, "I am sinking fast. I have never forgiven myself. If I could have met him, and acknowledged my wickedness, it would have relieved me. Pray for me, that I may be pardoned for Christ's sake."

Our WASTED OPPORTUNITIES. If a girl, who had been strolling in the parks or pastures before breakfast, came in laden with bunches of primroses and violets, with cowslips for bracelets, with daisies for brooches, and dandelions for ear-rings, you would not reprove her, or consider that she had forfeited a splendid chance : What was there better than these fair blossoms ? But now, if every pebble in her ramble had been a diamond, or a topaz, or an amethyst, and yet she came in with nothing but these fading blossoms, what would you say to her then ? Would you not exclaim, "Silly, stupid girl ! you have missed a fortune ; you have despised treasures ?" And what shall we say of ourselves if we occupy ourselves in worldly vanities, or scramble on anyhow in idleness, when God has strewn our path with what should enrich us for Heaven ? We might have gathered wisdom, which "is above riches ;" we might have gained God's favour ; we might have adorned ourselves with virtues and graces ; we might have imitated Mary in her choice ; but we let the whole train glide by us, without seizing on a single gem !

Is not this something to weep aloud for ? Weep, then ! yes, weep aloud for these ! And when you weep aloud over these, look to it that you do it where it will be "heard" by Him who alone can absolve you. Your weeping aloud over them will not wash them out.—They are crimson stains, which neither nitre nor soap can efface. But pour your tears at Jesus' feet, with your eye on His cross ; and God will "hear" you, and say,—I have blotted out as a cloud thy transgressions, for His sake who once wept aloud at Gethsemane for thee.

DUNCRA FARM.

MARY WILSON's father was out riding one day among his country patients, when his horse stumbled and fell with him. Some labourers working in a field, who saw the accident, came hurrying to the doctor's assistance, and when they had lifted him up it was found that his leg was broken in two places. He was carried home ; medical aid was immediately procured, and the shattered limb was set and bandaged as carefully as it could be. When all this had been done, good old Dr. Bold, who had taken a chief hand in putting all things right, led Mary's mamma aside.

"You know, my dear Mrs. Wilson," said he, "just as well as I do, that this must be at the very best a tedious case, and that almost everything depends, to begin with, on our patient being kept perfectly quiet. Now, you know best whether you hadn't better send away your little girl out of the house for a while, till all chance of fevering is past."

And so it was arranged that Mary should be dispatched that very afternoon to pay a visit to an uncle, a brother of her mother's, who had a large farm about twenty miles off. She started by the 2.15 train from Logan, the town in which her papa practised, and she got to Duncra, her uncle's place, in time for tea. Mr. and Mrs. Meldrum were exceedingly kind, warm-hearted people, and they received their niece very affectionately. Their two boys, Andrew and Thomas, shortly after came in from school, and they were equally glad to see their little cousin. So that, if Mary could have forgotten the sad sight she had seen at home,—her father with his face white with pain, and her mother struggling to repress her tears,—she would, even in a strange place, have been almost happy. But she could not get the thought of home out of her mind. Now and again her feelings overcame her. The good-natured attentions of her uncle and aunt, and the more simple but equally kindly enticements of the boys, failed to make her recover her spirits ; and hoping that a night's rest would help to compose and hearten her, Mrs. Meldrum proposed that she should be sent to bed.

"Please," said Mary, "do not send me till worship is over. I always sit up at home ; and I should so much like to sit up to-night, that we may all pray together for dear papa."

Mrs. Meldrum looked a little embarrassed for a moment. The fact was, there was no family worship at Duncra. Mr. Meldrum was a minister's son,—and a pious minister too,—and, like his sister, Mrs. Wilson, he had been well instructed from his youth up in the things of God. But having become a farmer, and not meeting much religious earnestness among those with whom he mingled in the markets, and having a great deal of business to attend to, and having, to crown all, married a wife who, though extremely amiable, had neither knowledge of nor interest in spiritual matters, he had grown so strangely careless and indifferent, that the name and the claims of Christ were hardly ever alluded to in the most distant manner in his family. Such a singular thing is conscience, however, that, though it had suffered the household to continue for years undisturbed in its ungodliness, it was now roused into a flutter of excitement by the simple proposal of a little girl. What gave the proposal its edge, indeed, was its very simplicity. The thing was so entirely a matter of course with her. The duty of family prayer was to her so self-evident that it never struck her to suppose that in her own uncle's house it would be neglected. No wonder, then, that there was some awkwardness and embarrassment.

"Never mind, Mary, for to-night," said her aunt. "You have had a long journey, and are wearied. The best thing for you is to get a good sleep."

"But oh, dear aunt, mamma said, when I wished to remain and help her to nurse poor papa, that I could help her here as well,—that I was to pray for him, and I was to ask uncle to pray for him; and I know I shall rest better—I am sure I shall—if you will only let me sit up till reading is over."

"Nonsense, child," said Mrs. Meldrum, a little sharply, for she somehow did not like all at once to confess how the case really stood to the earnest-minded girl; "go to your room now, and we shall see what to-morrow will bring."

Mary had never been accustomed to dispute long with those who had the right to command her; so, without another word, she rose, kissed her uncle, and aunt, and cousins, and went quietly up stairs with the nurse.

Mr. Meldrum sat up pretty late that night. He had some business letters to write, he had told his wife, who went to her room before him, and so he had; but these were finished, and still he sat before the dying fire in the dining-room, gazing into the embers full of sad and, as it seemed, painful thought. The truth was, as the poet puts it, "the leaves of memory" were making "a mournful rustling" in his spirit. Mary's mother, Mrs. Wilson, had been his favourite sister, and Mary was her very image. He remembered occasions when, long ago, outgoings of the same earnestness which he had that night seen in the daughter had appeared also in the mother, and when he himself had been moved by them to wish to live a Christian life. The first Mary had fulfilled the promise of her youth; and here was a second

Mary breathing, it would seem, the self-same spirit. While he—he actually trembled when he thought of himself, his wife, his boys, his servants—and of how he had overlooked and neglected all that he ought to have valued and held most dear. Through the clouds which rose and rolled over him he could hardly catch one glimpse of the Star of Hope. But he did at last see it glimmer through the gloom; and when the clock struck twelve, the farmer of Duncra was on his knees confessing his past transgressions, and vowing, through grace, to live another life in time to come.

As he proceeded after this with soft step and chastened spirit to his own apartment, he heard a slight stir in the room occupied by his niece. Gently opening the door, and approaching the bed, he saw by the dim light of the rushlight which burnt on the hearth two large eyes—wide awake and sleepless—looking up into his face.

"Mary," said Mr. Meldrum, "have you not slept yet, my child?"

"No, uncle."

"Are you too tired? or is it the strange bed? or your lying alone? or what is it, my darling? Can I do anything for you?"

"O uncle," and the great eyes grew dim, while she was speaking, with tears, "it is just as I said down stairs. I cannot sleep for thinking of papa and mamma at home. If you would only pray with me for them."

"I will, dear," said Mr. Meldrum, scarcely able himself to speak for emotion; and he knelt down at once by the little crib, and an earnest prayer was sent up for those who were suffering and watching in her distant home.

"Will you sleep now, Mary, do you think?" asked her uncle, when the service was over.

"Oh yes, dear uncle," replied the little one cheerfully, "I am sure I shall."

"Good nights" were exchanged, and before another half hour had passed the whole household, without exception, was buried in slumber.

Next morning things were about to go on as usual. The boys were making a great racket in the house by way of getting ready to go to school. Mrs. Meldrum, an active housewife, who saw after everything herself, had not a minute in the day to lose. The maids were stirred into a never-resting bustle by the diligence of their mistress. And the men outside were on the outlook every moment for the early outcoming of the master. The idea of having half an hour to set apart at Duncra farm in the morning for religious worship had not occurred as yet to any but one member of the household. He had formed his purpose deliberately, however; and when the suitable moment arrived, he ordered the whole family to be assembled in the dining-room, and proceeded to read the word and pray, as if such a practice had never been neglected. The thing caused some surprise and plenty of talk, but it was the beginning of a new life to the family; and years after, when Mary Wilson and her papa paid a visit together to Duncra, her always kind aunt, who had in the interval imbibed the spirit of her husband, said with a tearful smile to Dr. Wilson, "Ah doctor, that was a happy accident to us which befell you in your country ride in 18—. In getting Mary among us then, we entertained an angel unawares."

"OUR LITTLE GRETCHEN."

THE children in a Sunday-school class were saying sweetly in concert:—

"Around the throne of God in heaven, Thousands of children stand," when the teacher, happening to raise her eyes, saw in an adjoining row of little girls, one serious face, whose tender and devout expression was evidently produced by the echo of these two lines falling on her attentive ear. The child had a fair, oval face, her yellow hair was brushed smoothly under the knitted cap that she wore, she looked out of blue eyes, soft and pleasant. The little ones in the teacher's own class were rather restless; they repeated perfectly, but without emotion,—

"Children whose sins are all forgiven,
A holy, happy band."

In vain the lady looked into their black, brown, and grey eyes, hoping that their souls were touched. But still wistful and grave sat the child in the other class, with a peaceful face, as if she was nearly ready to stand there too.

The good seed is easily wafted. Like the winged dandelion it floats with a breath from soul to soul. The teacher was reminded of German pictures of fair-haired children, as she watched the foreign little face. Although small, and apparently quite young, she had a womanly, thoughtful way, which interested the lady strangely. No lines of care marred her face, yet she seemed to have already learned the meaning of life. The school closed. The blue-eyed and brown-eyed children pressed down the aisles. The teacher went away with a prayer in her heart for the unknown child, so eager to drink a drop of water out of the "wells of salvation."

Autumn often brings dull, cloudy days, not inspiring. On one of the gloomiest and most cheerless, the same lady walked out for the sake of diversion. She was not accustomed, however, to follow her own inclinations without an object. Therefore she determined to look after a missing scholar. Around a large factory are always grouped clusters of houses, often uninviting in their appearance. These little brown cottages were less dingy than many others on the lane. Bits of garden separated them, and beyond were distinctly seen glimpses of the blue river and the outline of distant hills. In one house the lady was particularly interested. The tiny garden spot had been well kept, and was not defaced by old shoes, broken crockery, and rusty tin. A few late flowers lingered among the frost-killed vines and blackened stems. A pretty woodbine creeping to the very roof still did its best to beautify the poor home with its crimson leaves. The path to the door was well made, and grass-bordered. Instead of dismal paper shades, clean white curtains brightened the small windows. In one of them appeared a geranium, that sweet variety which, being crushed, makes the whole air fragrant.

The lady longed to see the interior, and asked some children passing who lived there. "Why," said one of them in apparent surprise, "our little Gretchen." She did not hesitate to knock at the door to find out who this little Gretchen was, and what she could do for her. Her kind smile insured a welcome, as the little maiden of the Sunday school opened the door. How nice the little kitchen looked, with its clean floor newly washed, and homely furniture. Who was "our little Gretchen," with her dark stuff dress and white apron!

The child was twelve years old, and motherless. On the labour of her small hands depended the comfort of four younger children, and of their father. It was marvellous to see how well she conducted the household, keeping the cottage in order. Washing and mending the brothers' and sisters' clothes, making the daily soup and coarse bread, sending the children to school in season with well-washed faces and hands, tidy aprons, and smooth hair. The outline of her busy life was told, with sweet modesty, in words not yet free from the German sound. In the morning, while the children were away, she worked willingly with her hands, singing as she went songs learned in the Sunday school. In the evening she left her father to smoke his pipe in peace, while she cut out and made coarse garments or crocheted laces and tidies, which she sold to procure for them various little comforts. Hence came the Sunday pennies always ready, and the school-books for the little ones.

"Our little Gretchen" had in her hands a pretty thread mat, nearly finished. The lady asked the little woman if she might buy it, as she had been wishing to get one. A hearty smile spread over her entire face. "My money was all gone," she said, "and to-morrow is Lord's day again."

"Perhaps you cannot always manage to carry a penny for the collection," said the teacher; "you must not work too hard."

"Oh, it does me good in my heart," she answered quickly, "those pennies come so easy."

Four children, rosy-checked, came in, and presented themselves to "our little Gretchen" to be kissed, rather shyly, however, for they saw the lady's silk dress resting on the bare floor. Then the two boys and two girls sat down demurely on low stools around their protectress, the girl only twelve years old.

One of the boys began to weave a coarse basket very skillfully. The lady noticed that his clothes, clumsy and ill-fitting as they were, looked whole and warm.

On the face of "our little Gretchen" no shadow of doubt or distrust seemed ever to rest. She had received "the kingdom of God as a little child," and was "not faithless, but believing." The teacher did not attempt to impart any instruction. She could carry away many lessons. "Even a child is known by his doings." No one needed to ask "our little Gretchen" if she loved the Lord Jesus.

Engaging a tidy, some pieces of lace, and a basket from the little boy, the lady went home in the early dusk, earnestly desiring for herself the simplicity and child-like faith of her little German friend.

On the morrow the Sunday-school teacher went with a glad heart to her class. The sight of "our little Gretchen" quickened and revived her soul. With deeper love she told again the story of the blessed cross. The blue eyes of the German child filled with loving tears, as she listened also to the account of one "led as a lamb to the slaughter."

Verily "a little child shall lead them" through the daily struggle of poverty and inexperience, through the following of "the Lamb whithersoever he goeth," even through the "much tribulation." Perhaps "our little Gretchen" will lead her hard-working father, her two brothers, her two sisters, up to the throne of God.

THE POOR DRESSMAKER.

A LITTLE orphan girl lived with her grandmother. There were only those two. They were very poor, but very neat and tidy. Perhaps I should say they were rich in one thing; they had a Bible; and in the Bible they found God a tried friend. In the Bible they found Jesus Christ a precious Saviour. In the Bible they found a beautiful garment; that was holiness. In the Bible they found a beautiful ornament; that was a meek and quiet spirit. In the Bible they found a house not made with hands; that was heaven. So the old grandmother and the little girl were not so poor after all. They were richer by far than people with plenty of money who had not found these. The little girl's name was Sarah Martin.

When Sarah was old enough, she had to earn her living, and as she was too slender to do hard work, her grandmother thought she had better learn dressmaking. For this purpose she had to go to Yarmouth. Yarmouth was a town three miles from the village where they lived, and she used to walk in in the morning, and out at night. Wasn't she afraid? Sarah was so sweet tempered and good, I am sure nobody would harm her; and then she put her trust in God, and she knew he would take care of her. By-and-by she began to earn a shilling a-day by pretty diligent sewing, and she was very thankful for it.

The court used to hold its sittings at Yarmouth, and one day a woman was going to be tried for cruelly beating her little child. Awful stories were told about her, and everybody's blood curdled at hearing them. She was lodged in the jail. Sarah used to pass the jail going to and from her work; and she as well as everybody else looked up to it as they passed, thinking of the cruel creature in it.

Did Sarah hate her? Almost everybody did, judging by their talk. Did she despise her? Did she call her "horrid," "awful," and all the hard names she could think of? No. Sarah loved her. "That is strange," you will say. Well, she did; and I think she was the only person in all Yarmouth that had a spark of love for her. If Sarah did love her, what then? You know love well enough, perhaps, to know that it always wants to be doing something. Love, you may depend, is very industrious. But what could poor Sarah Martin's love do? She thought she should like to go and see the woman. But that great, black, ugly-looking jail, who would have a heart to go there? It seemed even to smell wicked. She however stopped one morning at the porch and knocked, and when the jail-keeper came to the door, she asked leave to visit the poor creature who beat her child so. "No," said the jail-keeper, eyeing her, "you can't go." This looked as if her love wasn't of much use; so she turned and walked sorrowfully away to her work.

A few days after she stopped at the porch again. "It must have been curiosity," you say. You can judge when you know more. Let me tell on. She knocked, and the jail-keeper came, and again he saw modest little Sarah Martin at the door. She asked what she asked before, and he said, "Yes," and let her in, and told the turnkey to conduct her to the right cell. "Curiosity!" I daresay, he thought; yet he would not say "No" a second time. Sarah followed the turnkey through the long, dark, damp, passages of the big jail, with their small, high, grated windows, which we should think the cheerful sun would hardly condescend to look into, only that the sun is not at all proud; it visits the lowly just as much as the high, and always the poor prisoners when it can get in—as Sarah Martin has, for by this time she is directly opposite the cell, and the turnkey is rattling his huge keys, and unlocking the big lock, and the iron door is swinging open, and Sarah is face to face with the bad woman. I wonder if she minds the straw bed, and the dirty coverlet, and the miserable, comfortless look everything has. The woman—she has a horrid expression in her eye—stares at her unexpected visitor. "What you come here for?" she asked Sarah in a harsh voice.

"I come," answered Sarah meekly, "because I love you. You are guilty and miserable, and I come to tell you of God's mercy, and the comfort you can find in the grace of his dear Son." Oh, that kind tone, that pitying eye! The woman knew in a minute that she had got a friend; and the poor sinner burst out crying, and thanked her for coming. What the law and the officers of justice, and the jail and jail-keeper could not do, Sarah Martin's Christian love did—it softened her hard heart, and paved the way for her amendment. It was a good visit; the first, but not the last.

She went again and again, and the other prisoners hearing of her, wanted her to come and see them. She always carried her little Bible with her, for that she called the prisoner's friend, and read to them, and instructed them in its precious truths. Old grey-headed criminals wept as they listened to her; thieves, pick-pockets, wicked sailors, and bad boys respected her; and as she read, prayed, and felt for them by turns, it seemed as if an angel had come. They saw how blessed it was to be good, and for the first time in their lives, perhaps, longed to be good themselves; their wicked ways never seemed so wicked. Sarah found a great many of them could neither read nor write, and she felt she must have the privilege of teaching them. Where was she to get the time? "I thought it right," she says, "to give up a day in the week from dressmaking to serve the prisoners." Poor as she was, nobody ever paid her for the time; yet she said, "It was now a pecuniary loss, but it was ever followed with abundant satisfaction, for the blessing of God was on me." Oh yes, God paid her. She found such delight in his service as nothing in this world could give. The Holy Spirit helped her every step of the way, otherwise it would have been a very hard task.

A poor dressmaker giving up one-sixth part of her working time to do good among the worst of society in a common jail, must make a good many of us ashamed. How backward we are even to make one visit to the needy; how loath even to try to save a poor soul from ruin. How unbelieving about the Holy Ghost helping us, or the Lord Jesus receiving poor sinners, if we do try.

At last the old grandmother died, and left Sarah an income of ten pounds a-year. She then moved into Yarmouth, and took two small rooms in a poor part of the town. But her dressmaking began to fall off; it quite fell off. Ought she not to give up the poor prisoners, and try to get back her business? Prudent people told her she ought. "No," said she with quiet firmness, "I have counted the cost, and my mind is made up. If while instructing others in God's good truth I am exposed to temporal want, so momentary a privation is nothing in comparison with following the Lord in thus administering to others."

How she enlarged her labours, and finally gave her whole time to them, and refused all pay, and went home every night to her poor little lodgings tired and hungry and cold, and kindled her own fire and made her own tea, and went to bed all alone, and how God blessed and prospered her work, and filled her bosom with sweet peace and contentment, I may tell you another time.

Is not this enough to kindle in you a desire "to go and do likewise," or at least to do a small something for God and poor sinners around you?

ROBBING THE RAILROAD.

"I REALLY can't see why you should not take a trip out of town on Sunday by the railway. You can go to church in the country, if you are so mighty particular about it," said one neighbour to another.

"No," said Mr. Birt, "I like to have my Sabbath, and I'm not going to commit robbery."

"Robbery! and who said you were? What do you mean?" asked the neighbour in surprise.

"I mean this: the engineers, firemen, brakemen, conductors on the railway, have as good a right to their Sabbath as I have to mine, and if I travel on that day, I shall help to rob them of their Sabbath."

"I call myself honest as anybody," said the other, stammering. "Don't you think you talk a little too strong when you call it robbery?"

"No; it's robbery all ways," said Mr. Birt. "I rob God and I rob my own soul when I rob any man of his chance to attend public worship; and you see it is not doing as I would be done by, and I call it robbery."

There is, alas! a great deal of this robbery committed in our town; not on the railroad, for that is Sabbath-keeping, but on the stable-keepers, hostlers, and drivers, who are robbed of their Sabbath rest, of their places in church, of their opportunities of religious instruction, and of becoming better men; and the poor beasts also are robbed of their Sabbath rest, which they need as much from week-day toil as you or I do. It is a robbery not arraigned at our courts, but it is one we may have to answer for at a higher bar.

"ALL'S AGEN ME."

"ALL's agen me," said a poor creature; "the world's agen me, and I'm agen myself; for a man told me this very day as he didn't like the look of my face. Ah, it's hard to be 'bliged to say so, but all's agen me."

"I never had no chance. What chance had I to grow up with a bright, clear face, when from a baby I was taught to like the gin-bottle and roll in the gutter! I should like to see the fellow that 'ud grow up good-looking upon hunger, and filth, and blows. And when I tried to be honest, folks wouldn't believe me, and so I went with fellows as seemed to pity me, and got into trouble; and then the very first time as ever I heerd I'd a soul to be saved, was when I'd lost my character, and was, as I may say, done for; and since then I've tried—I have indeed, but nobody seems inclined to trust me. I tell you, all's agen me."

Many a poor creature feels just so—discouraged. Boys get discouraged; girls get discouraged; everything goes hard with them. They have nobody to lend a helping hand. But be sure, all's not against you. There is One who loves you—Jesus Christ. He pities you; he weeps over you; he left his Father's house to come to this wicked world to die for you, to wash your sins away in his blood, to bring you to heaven. He is not against you. He came on purpose to save the lost. "Come, come unto me, and I will give you rest." When everybody else cries, "Go off; get away," He says, "Come, come!" Oh, what a sweet word of welcome! And we, if we follow Christ, shall not step aside and turn our backs and speak rudely to the poor outcast, but heartily try to help the best way we can. And is not the best way to lead him to Jesus?

KATY AND HER CHICKEN.

Nor long ago a little girl in the Sabbath school heard a missionary tell about the heathen children, especially the little heathen girls, how cruelly they were treated, because they were girls; put to the hardest work, and then beat if their strength gave out and they could not do it; their fathers always rough to them, and their brothers never kind; no pretty plays, no sweet kisses, no beautiful books, no pleasant schools, no god but an old stone, or an ugly block; no lovely spirit of forgiveness, no dear child's prayers, no "Now I lay me," no knowledge of Jesus Christ, the precious Saviour of the world; all rude, miserable, and down-trodden, because Jesus was not there. He would put things right, and mend the homes of these little girls and boys, and no one else could. And he had already sent them word what to do.

"He sent word by Matthew, and Mark, and Luke, and John, and Paul. But Matthew, and Mark, and Luke, and John, and Paul cannot get there without your help," said the missionary to the Sabbath scholars. "Won't you help these go and preach the gospel which tells how sin can be washed away?" The Sabbath scholars looked at the missionary with, "I am sure I want to," in all their eyes. One little girl said to herself, "Oh, I must help; I will." She went home thinking. She told her mother what the missionary said, and she said,—

"Suppose, mother, I was a poor heathen; should I not think it very hard if Sabbath-school children here did not send me the word of Jesus—didn't try to save my soul?"

So upon the Christian principle of doing as she would be done by, she began to think what she could do. She was very poor. She had nothing to give. She was sickly, and could earn nothing. She could pray. Yes, a little child can do that; and she did: but that only made her the more want to do something besides.

The next morning her mother minded she waked up pretty early, and the first question she asked was,—

"Mother, is Pet mine to keep?"

"Yes," answered her mother; "Pet is yours to do what you please with."

Pet was a little motherless chicken about a month old, which a neighbour gave her, and which the little girl named and loved dearly. She never had a pet before. And Pet loved the little girl. It knew her voice, and used to run after her wherever she went, like a little dog. This was the little girl's "all," her treasure.

"Mother," she said, with a sweet seriousness, "I am going to give Pet to the missionary. I've nothing else, and I'll carry it to the minister's house this morning."

"Well," said her pious mother, "do, Katy, as you think best."

Katy gave chicken its breakfast with tears in her eyes. It pecked so cunningly, and these were its last crumbs from her hand. But mother did not like to interfere. If the Holy Spirit was teaching and strengthening her little child to give its all to Christ, she should not stop the work. So Katy stirred up the wool in Pet's basket, and put it in. Pet did not want to go in, it had rather run about the kitchen, as it was used to; for, of course, it did not know it was to be a missionary chicken, and if it did, I daresay it would have been too chicken-hearted to appreciate it. Katy took the basket in her arms, and set off to the minister's. Poor Katy.

I do not know what happened in the minister's study, where Katy told her story. I only know that a tear dropped from the good man's eye on the study table, and he said,—

"Who of my parish will give their ox, or a cow, or a sheep, or a barrel of apples, or a load of hay, to preach Christ to the heathen?"

The minister bought the chicken. He paid Katy sixpence for it. She put the sixpence in the mission-box on the minister's table, and was about to take leave of her dear Pet, when the minister said,—

"I've nobody to take care of little chick in my house, Katy; won't you carry it home and keep it for me?"

"Oh yes, sir," she cried; and home little Katy trudged with basket and chicken, as happy as child could be. She was faithful in little, and God fulfilled his promise in making her "faithful also in much."

SPARKS FROM HELL; OR, "COVER IT, COVER IT."

I REMEMBER long ago when I, a little girl, was playmate with my brothers and their companions, there was one rather dangerous sport in which we took great delight. Our favourite play-ground was a fir-wood behind the garden, and there in the sandy soil, and amongst the gnarled roots, we kindled fires and built ovens. Never was any feast so delicious as the potatoes we baked among the ashes, or the half scorched apples we roasted on the embers. Even the sloes and wild plums, the very remembrance of which now sets my teeth on edge, were esteemed by us as dainties, after we had cooked them with our own hands in our much-beloved fires. As I was the only girl, I was made generally useful, and my strong linen pinafore, held by the corners, formed a most convenient receptacle in which to gather sticks and fir-cones to feed the fires, or potatoes and apples to roast in them.

On one occasion, whilst I was stooping over the fire, feeding it with fuel, a spark from the burning wood lighted unseen in the folds of my dress beneath the pinafore. It smouldered away in the thick tweeled cotton, and burnt through to the clothes beneath, till at length my attention was attracted by the smell of burning and an extraordinary feeling of heat in my bosom. I hastily drew up the pinafore, and at the same moment the air caused the fire to break forth into flame. I remember feeling horrified at the damage done to my dress, and holding my pinafore as well as I could out of harm's way, I began to run towards a stream, which flowed through the wood at some distance from us. But one of my companions springing after me, drew the pinafore close over the flames, and at the expense of his own little hands, poor fellow, put out the fire, and very likely saved me from serious injury. I will never forget the sudden breaking forth into flame of the smouldering fire, nor my little friend Johnie's sensible cry, "Stop and cover it, cover it!"

Now, dear children, I don't know whether fires and cookery are fashionable amusements amongst children now-a-days. I hope not, for, especially with girls, they are very dangerous ones; but even, although not played with, there is always a certain amount of danger in fire. I wish you would try to remember, if by any chance you or your companions are set on fire, Johnie's advice, "Cover it, cover it." If nothing better can be done, throw yourself on the ground and roll on it, but never run, for the motion and the air will only make the fire burn more fiercely. But I hope you will never need to apply the advice in this way. There is another kind of danger from fire to which you are constantly liable, and it is it which I have in my mind in telling you this story.

Do you remember what James says about the tongue being "a fire," and "set on fire of hell;" and speaking of the mischief which a few words may do, he says, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." Now, there is no way in which the tongue does this more effectually than in kindling and spreading strife.

It kindles strife, by unkind, unjust, angry words. These are sparks from hell, and lighting from your tongue on another's heart, oh, what a flame of angry, unholy passion they may kindle there.

It spreads strife and feeds strife, by repeating evil words spoken of others. "Where no wood is there the fire goeth out, and where there is no talebearer the strife ceaseth." Never repeat to another any unkind, evil word you have heard spoken of him. Never repeat of another, any wrong, unlovely thing you have seen in them. "He that covereth a transgression seeketh love, he that repeateth a matter separateth very friends."

Neither carry sparks to kindle fire, nor wood to feed fire. Wherever you see a spark from hell has lighted, and is burning in another's heart, do what you can to cover and quench it.

Most boys love to feed bonfires. When they see a fire burning, they run here and there gathering fuel to make it burn brighter and fiercer. So some children cannot see two inclined to quarrel without doing all they can to feed Satan's flame. Love covers and hides the faults of others; and in place of stirring up strife, does all it can to put it out.

But what if a spark from hell light in your own heart?

What if an unkind word or deed kindles a fierce flame of passionate anger there? And I think some of you must know, how catching that fire is, and how rapidly a very little matter lights up a burning flame within. What are you to do then? Well, the only safe thing for you is just to cover it, and fast too, before it gets beyond your reach. Cover it from others. Don't let it flare out in angry words in return. If you do, it will soon be a blazing fire, beyond your power to cover. Don't cover it from God. Show it to him—confess it—ask him to cover it, and so to quench it. The fiercest sparks from hell are put out and quenched, when the soul is washed in the blood of forgiveness and the living water of the Holy Spirit. The forgiven soul cannot help forgiving. It loves much, and where love dwells, resentment, and hatred, and anger have no abiding place. Love covers even a multitude of sins, and forgives an offending brother, not only seventy times a day, but seventy times seven.

My dear children, I am sure that every day, and often every day, you have opportunity of either putting out sparks or fanning them. "A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger." How often have I seen a child taunting and provoking another to wrath, whose rising colour and sparkling eye showed how the sparks from hell were kindling. Fanning sparks to a flame is doing the devil's work, covering and quenching them is the work of God's children. "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

The soul, where anger and resentment is suffered to rage, is consumed by this fire of hell. It is tortured, too, in this flame. It is filled with misery.

Be alarmed if you feel within, the stings of an unforgiving spirit. Rest not till it is quite subdued, and you are enabled from the heart to forgive. Many a scorched and scathed human ruin—ruined in body, soul, and mind—testifies to the awful nature of this fire, where it gets the mastery, and has not been covered and quenched in its earliest sparks.

Now, will you try, in school, at play, in the nursery, everywhere, to be on your guard against sparks from hell. The golden rule is a capital thing to have always at hand to cover sparks with,—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." You can't bear to have your naughty words and deeds spoken of. Don't speak about those of your companions. You like always to be kindly and gently spoken to. Learn to be kind and gentle in your speech to all. "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you," and so you will show yourself to be one of the children of God, who is kind even to the unthankful and the evil.

"An ungodly man diggeth up evil, and in his lips there is a burning fire."

"Hatred stirreth up strifes, but love covereth all sins."

TWO KINDS OF GREATNESS.

"I WANT to be distinguished—to be a Kane, or a Washington, or President of the United States, to receive three bushels of letters a day begging for office; would not that be great?" so asked Harry Gray.

"Yes," said his cousin; "something or nothing, I say."

"And I wish above all things to be a Victoria or a Florence Nightingale—somebody famous, that people will run to see," said Sarah, his other cousin.

These children wanted to be great. Almost all intelligent children have some model characters, which they wish to become like. Now, there are two sorts of greatness; one to be great in the sight of men, the other to be great in the sight of God. These children chose the first. What makes people great in the sight of men?

Last year a young college student from England visited this country. He was not a boy of remarkable talent; he had made no mark as a scholar; he had done nothing to distinguish himself from a thousand other clever English boys; yet he was everywhere met with marked attention. Wherever he was expected people flocked to the depôts to get sight of him. The streets through which he rode were crowded with men, women, and children. The first men in the land called upon him. Everybody was ready to do him honour. Why? On account of his rank. He was the Prince of Wales, the future king of England. Rank, therefore, position in society, is one thing which makes people great in the eyes of men.

What is another? Money. "There goes a man worth half a million"—always the man of our village pointed out to strangers. A man worth plenty of money will find people enough to run after him, pay him attention, and regard him as a great man, simply on account of his bank-notes. It is a poor sort of greatness, but that is the way men of the world estimate things.

Talent is another thing which makes greatness. Not very long ago an imposing funeral took place in London. The procession was two miles long. The streets were lined with spectators, elbowing each other to see it. The body of the dead man was not being carried to a grave-yard for burial. It was to be laid with kings and queens, poets and statesmen, and England's most illustrious dead, in Westminster Abbey. Westminster Abbey is a grey old church, full of the monuments of great men. Whose funeral was this? The son of a poor collier. The son of a poor collier whose talents had made a distinguished man of him. His name was Robert Stephenson, the son of George Stephenson, a father and son who built the first railroads and the best bridges in the world.

Some have talent for one thing, some for another. Some as painters. A girl in Paris has painted a splendid picture of horses, for which she has been offered upwards of £2000. Some as writers; some as discoverers and inventors.

Rank, money, talent; are these the things which make people great in the sight of God? The Bible describes a man "great in the sight of the Lord." Who? Luke tells us it was John the Baptist. What was it that made him great in God's sight? What do you suppose, children? Can you think? He was the humble forerunner of the meek and lowly Saviour.

And in what did his worth and excellence consist? One word is enough, only one—obedience. John did just what God directed him to do. He did it always. He began early to love and serve God, and did not wait till he became a man. He also gave up everything which would interfere with his doing the best he could. He was a temperance boy. "He drank neither wine nor strong drink." He had the Holy Spirit to help him. No person can be good or great without this blessed Keeper. The Holy Spirit taught him to love God, and love made obedience ready and sweet to John. God directed him to live in the wilderness, and he did. God commanded him to preach repentance, and he did. God bade him go and tell wicked Herod of his sins, and he did. Herod might be angry and kill him; but God said, "Go," and he was not afraid to go. He went, and the terrible consequences you know. He lost his life by it. His obedience rendered him great.

And you, my child, if you obey God, like John, will be great in his sight too. The Lord Jesus says, "You are my friends, if you do whatsoever I command you."—Child's Paper.

"I DON'T CARE."

"MANY, unless you keep more steadily at your work, I'm afraid what mother gave you to finish before dinner will not be done," said an elder sister to a little girl who kept jumping up and running to the window to see the passers-by.

"I don't care if it isn't finished," was the reply; and again Mary dropped her work, and sat swinging her feet, while she commenced humming a tune, as if in defiance of all advice."

"But you will care by-and-by," continued Fanny. "When mother comes home and finds how idle you have been, she will not take you to ride this afternoon, as she promised if you were a good girl."

Mary was content to please herself for the time being; so the work was unfinished, and she had the mortification of seeing her mother and little brother drive off from the door without her, leaving her to console herself the best way she could for thus really cheating herself out of a long talked-of pleasure.

"I don't care" has been the occasion of much sorrow in the world; and such carelessness about our duty to God and man will be the bitter lament of many a lost soul.

THE LISTENER AT THE DOOR.

MANY years ago lived a little boy whom we will call Willie.

Willie's father had been dead for years ; but he had a loving band of brothers and sisters, and a mother who nobly strove to stand in the place of both parents towards her fatherless little ones.

Willie's mother was not sure that she had given her heart to God ; and coming from church one day, bowed beneath a sense of guilt before God's pure eye, she sought her own room for prayer.

Willie followed as far as the door, and throwing himself on the floor, he placed his ear at the crack, that he might hear his mother pray. And that prayer—it has ever since lingered in his heart. Such earnest pleading for mercy for herself and her children through the Lamb which was slain on Calvary, that God would indeed give her a good hope, which should daily grow brighter and brighter, and at last end in perfect rest ; that having knowledge and strength given her from heaven, she might train her little ones in the way their heavenly Father would be best pleased to see them walking in. There in the bedroom the mother wept and prayed, and there, too, on the floor, with his ear at the crack, little Willie was an attentive listener.

Years have come and gone ; and trusting in the salvation of Christ Jesus, the mother has welcomed the summons,—“Child, your Father calls—come home.” But long before her departure her loving heart was gladdened by seeing her children treading the same road.

Some of them are in a foreign land, proclaiming to benighted souls the surpassing love and compassion of Him who “spake as never man spake ;” while little Willie, grown to manhood, a faithful, earnest Christian, from Sabbath to Sabbath proclaims the wondrous story of the Saviour's life of toil and death of agony. How fondly does he cherish the recollection of the day when he heard, through the crack of the door, his mother's petition for pardoning mercy. Many souls has he been the means of leading to the Ark of Refuge, both by the truth and believing earnestness of his preaching, and the beautiful faith mirrored forth in his daily life.

THE HEART'S DOOR.

“I'LL not forgive Fred as long as I live,” said Dora angrily, as she came into the parlour, holding up before her mother the fragments of a beautiful little sofa, a piece of the set of furniture her uncle James had given her a few days before.

“Dora, my daughter!”

“Well, I mean just what I say,” continued the excited little girl. “Fred came rushing into the summer-house just as he always does, and trod on it with his great boots ; and when I spoke to him about it, he said he didn't care a bit, and wished he had broken the chairs too.”

“Think before you say more, my dear. Perhaps you vexed Frederick by your manner of speaking.”

“I only told him he was careless and ugly, and so he was. It's too bad.” And as she turned over the pieces of the ruined toy in her hands, her face grew dark with angry feelings.

“Hark, Dora ! Listen ; some one is knocking, I'm sure.”

Little Willie, a three-year old younger brother, stopped playing with his blocks on the floor, and looked at the door as if expecting a visitor.

“What do you mean, mamma ? I don't hear anything,” said Dora.

“Have you forgotten, my daughter, that there is a door to your heart ? You have opened it once this morning, and let in an evil, hateful thing. No picture that could be made of it would be too dark to represent what is now in your heart.”

Dora hung her head, for she began to understand her mother.

“And now, if you will listen, you will hear One, your best Friend, at that door. He is knocking gently. Dear little daughter, let him in. He has a message for you, and it is, “If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses ;” and that word ‘men’ means everybody, even Freddy, who, you think, has offended you so much.”

Dora's heart was softening. The tears came into her eyes. She opened the door of her heart a little way. Willie, who had been listening, came, and putting his chubby arms round her neck, kissed her, but said nothing. Her heart's door swung wide open now, and Jesus entered.

“Yes, mother, I will forgive Freddy,” sobbed Dora. “I was as much to blame as he, and I know I spoke spitefully, or he would have felt sorry when he did it.”

“Then, my darling, thank that dear Friend who has found the way into your heart with his love, and go now to Freddy and make up with him.”

Dora laid away the fragments of the sofa, and went out with sunshine in her face and joy in her heart, for its door was closed again, and her Friend was within.

THE TREASURY PULPIT.

A SIGHT OF THE SAVIOUR.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"Behold the Lamb of God."—JOHN I. 36.

BORN without taste, as others are without an ear for music, some have no sympathy with nature. In them, the earth "sown with orient pearl," bush and tree hung with sparkling diamonds, the snow-crowned hills, valleys gaily robed in flowers and smiling in sunshine, the spacious sea, the star-spangled sky, breed no admiration. They are as unable to appreciate the beauties of a lovely landscape, as the cattle that browse on its pastures. Yet scenes there are that may disappoint those who have the keenest enjoyment in nature—the liveliest sympathy with what is grand or lovely. Such a man travels far, and, climbing rugged crag, or steep mountain, toils hard that he may feast his eyes on some famous prospect. His expectations are raised to the highest pitch. At length, panting, exhausted, he arrives at the summit; and, at the cry, Behold! looks round to be disappointed—it does not repay the trouble—it was not worth the toil. Such disappointment awaits none who, to the call, "Behold the Lamb of God," turn on Christ eyes that his Spirit has opened. Who ever said, He is not worth looking at! Here, heaven and earth, angels and men, to use Paul's words, are perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment; to quote the language of an old, holy song, Jesus is declared to be "the chiefest among ten thousand, and"—what none else are—"altogether lovely."

Accustomed from childhood to see the starry host come forth, night by night, marching in silent grandeur above our heads, the scene attracts little attention; many walk, the whole year through, beneath that sky, nor turn a look of wonder on it. And in us, born by its sandy shores, familiarity with the ocean, whether its waves sleep in summer sunshine or foam in wintry tempests, breeds a measure of indifference.

But who, for the first time, has seen the Almighty's hand in the snowy Alps, or heard his voice in the thunders of Niagara, without dumb surprise? Our emotions are strange, new, and inexpressible; and we say of such sublime and surpassing grandeur, words cannot describe it—nor colours paint it—nor fancy imagine it—to appreciate, you must see it. And if the brightest colours, if prose, or even poetry with its glowing language, do no justice to these scenes, what words can set forth the graces and matchless merits of the Saviour? Put an angel—a seraph in the pulpit; and give him Christ for his theme! The subject is greater than his powers—the flight beyond his wing—the song above his compass. He would be the first to say, when called to describe the glories and beauty, the majesty and mercy that meet in Jesus, Who is sufficient for these things?—to appreciate him, you must see and know him. Yea. You might sit there, and listen all your life long to no other theme, you might hear every sermon that had been preached, you might read every hymn that had been sung, you might study every book that had been written about Christ, and after all, on arriving in heaven, you would stand before the throne to lift your hands in rapt astonishment,—to say, borrowing the words of Sheba's queen, "I had heard of thee in mine own land, of thy acts, and of thy wisdom; howbeit the half was not told me. Happy are thy men—happy thy servants"—and happy I to be allowed to take rank with them.

Any view of Christ which the greatest preacher in the highest flight of his genius ever set before an audience, must be as feeble a likeness as paint and canvas give of the hues of a rainbow, or of the beams of the sun—representations so poor as in many instances to excite contempt, and in all astonishment, that any artist could attempt what far exceeds the powers of cold, dull paint. Nay, what is the most glowing, glorious, and ecstatic view that the highest faith, that a soul hovering on the borders of another world, ever obtained of Christ, compared to the reality? It is like the sun changed by a frosty fog-bank into a dull red ball,—shorn of the splendour that only eagles' eyes can look on.

In directing your attention, therefore, to Jesus Christ, I do not pretend to do him justice; I only attempt to do you some good by directing your attention to one or two aspects of Christ's life and character. May these, with God's blessing, awaken true faith in unbelievers, and deepen the love of his own loving, chosen people.

I. Behold Christ before he came to this world.

The measure of our Lord's humiliation is the measure of his original exaltation. We cannot know how low he stooped to save us, till we know the height from whence he came. Came? Did he not come of humble parentage? was he not born in a stable? That may satisfy those who have no higher idea of Jesus than as a man of rare perfections—the pattern and paragon of every human virtue. But we know better—see further “into the mystery of godliness.” God manifest in the flesh, he had a higher origin than Bethlehem—he was of a nobler descent than Mary—of an older and more royal ancestry than Judah’s kings. The lowly spring that wells up among the willows of the valley, draws its waters from above; their source lies in those lofty, eternal snows whose spotless bosom bears no stain, nor print of human foot. So was it with Jesus.

To be sprung of humble parentage puts no shame on us. No man need blush for his mother, because, treading life’s lowly paths, she had to spin, or weave, or toil, to rear him. Who does so has cause to be ashamed, not of her, but of himself. His pride is meaner than her lot could be. Though our Lord claimed the highest ancestry, he was not ashamed of Mary. She was his mother, and mother was a word as dear to him as to us. He honoured her; he met her wish with miracles; he owned her on his cross; as with other sons, his dying thoughts turned to his mother; and though family relationships do not subsist in another world as here, in heaven he would acknowledge her his mother. Not that Mary is, as Papists call her, the mother of God, or queen of heaven, to whom we are to address our prayers, and pay an inferior worship. Still, while we shrink from this profanity, with angels we pronounce her blessed. Honour be to Mary’s memory! She was, and she shall ever be, the mother of the man Christ Jesus—the man of the cross that redeemed the world—the man of the throne that rules the universe.

But it is to an older and higher than this mediatorial throne we are to look, if we would see the heights from whence Jesus came. There are many thrones in heaven. Unlike an earthly palace, the palace of the Great King is crowded with them. They are filled by the saints; among whom, if Christ’s, we shall take rank,—kings and priests to God for ever. Amid these, though not far removed, rises the throne of the Mediator—spanned by a rainbow, and encircled by angel hosts, and occupied by Him on whose glorious form all eyes are centred, to whose praise all harps are tuned, and at whose feet, once nailed to a cross, the glittering crowns are cast, as the purchase of his blood and the gift of his grace. There Jesus sits among his saints, King of assembled kings. Above all these, high and lifted up, in the unscaled heights of Godhead, casting its shadow, or rather its glory, over the boundless universe, stands the throne of the Ancient of days—days that had no beginning, and years that shall have no end. Now, ere the Son of God assumed our nature, and descended to save our world, he was there—there before Mary bore him, or Mary herself was born—there before Adam was made—there before there was sin, or death, or life—there before worlds had begun to roll, or time had begun to run—there before sun ever shone, or bright angel sung. Here we are at the fountain-head; if we can ever speak of having got to that which stretches away, far out of sight, into the mysteries of eternity. Hear how our Lord speaks of himself,—

“I was th’ Almighty’s chief delight
From everlasting days,
Ere yet his arm was stretched forth
The heav’n and earth to raise.

Before the sea began to flow,
And leave the solid land,
Before the hills and mountains rose,
I dwelt at his right hand.

When first he rear’d the arch of heav’n,
And spread the clouds on air,
When first the fountains of the deep
He open’d, I was there.

There I was with him, when he stretch’d
His compass o’er the deep,
And charg’d the ocean’s swelling waves
Within their bounds to keep.

With joy I saw th’ abode prepar’d
Which men were soon to fill:
Them from the first of days I lov’d, Unchang’d, I love them still.”

There are dark depths of ocean man never dived in; there are heights in the blue heavens that were never stirred by an eagle’s wing; and there are regions of truth which angels never explored, which their eye never scanned, and their feet never trode. And such—the deepest of all doctrines—the profoundest of all mysteries—the strongest of all our confidences—is this, that He who expired on Calvary was not the creature, nor as men and angels are, the created, but Eternal Son of God. In this truth I discover the love of God; by this line I measure the love of Christ. It was this, that he was co-equal with the Father—the brightness of his Father’s glory, and the express image of his person; that he was not less God than man; that under the garment of humanity, so rudely rent, divinity lay concealed; that the brow wounded by thorns, had worn the crown of heaven; that the hand nailed to the tree, had held the scales of fate, and sway’d the sceptre of the universe;—it was this that struck Paul with such astonishment, and called from his lips an expression that finds a ready echo in every believer’s heart, “The breadth, and length, and depth, and height of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge.”

II. Behold Christ on earth—in his humiliation.

Follow him from heaven on his mission of mercy. What a descent! Who has looked into a gulf so dark, profound? Philosophers expatiate with wonder on the distance of the fixed stars; and we attempt in vain to fancy the space that stretches between our world and orbs so remote that, notwithstanding its speed, light takes six thousand years to perform its journey between some of them and us; and thus, marvellous to tell or think of, the rays of the star which we saw last night left it at the period when man was made, or our world was shaken by the Fall. Still, that distance, though not to be conceived, may be measured. You can express it by numbers; but how immeasurable, as well as inconceivable, the distance between the throne of the Eternal and the stable of Bethlehem—the bosom of God and the breast of Mary!

People are fond of tracing rivers to their sources; and Bruce, the traveller, pronounced it the proudest moment of his life, when he stood, as he fancied, at the lofty fountains of the Nile. But when we trace the waters of life to their earthly source, how lowly the spring where they well up into light! Would you see it? Bow thy head; enter this stable; and in this stall, whence beasts have been turned out to accommodate a woman in her hour of sorrow, look into the manger; gently raise this rough swaddling cloth; and there, in a feeble creature that, disturbed, raises perhaps an infant's cry, behold the Lamb of God—the Love of God—the Saviour of the world!

Look again! When times were hard, and work was scarce, and men had to leave their homes to seek about for bread, did you ever meet a houseless family; and see the mother, as they trudged along the wild moor, trying with scanty coverings to protect her infant from the pelting rain and storm? In some such plight behold the Lamb of God! The holy family are flying to Egypt. Mary has seized her child; and, pressing it to her bosom, has rushed into the tempest, and the dark night, and on untravelled paths, to save its infant life from the massacre of Bethlehem—the bloody sword of Herod!

Look again! On some stormy night, when the wind howled in the chimney, and the rain beat on the window, and the wild beast was driven back to his lair, and mothers that had boys at sea, trembling for their fate, betook themselves to prayer, did you ever, hastily summoned to the bed of the dying, pass some outcast crouching in the shelter of a doorway, or lying with weary head pillowed on a cold stone step? Whatever you may have felt, Jesus had a fellow-feeling for that houseless man. Lord of Glory! he had been such an outcast—an outcast from human sympathies—every door he sought, shut in his face. Did man ever utter a more touching plaint than this: “The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head?” Behold the Lamb of God—stretched on the cold ground—no roof to shelter him—his locks wet with the dews of night. He is an outcast from man, that man, that you, might cease to be outcast from God!

These sorrows were but the muttering thunder, the first big drops that precede the bursting of the storm. It came roaring on; and would you see the Lamb of God in the great work of sacrifice, look here! Pass into this garden: draw near with reverent step; he prays in an agony; he is sweating great drops of blood,—prostrate on the ground, “see thy lover lowly laid, and hear the groans that rend his breast.” Follow the prisoner to the judgment-hall: blood streaks his face, trickling from a crown of thorns—the wreath sin wove for his royal brow—“the crown with which his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals.” Go out with him to the street:

he faints; louder now the wail of women, deeper now the curses of raging men; disfigured with blood and dust, his blessed head lies on the hard stones—but not so hard as pitiless hearts. With the procession, pass on to Calvary: they cast him roughly on the ground; they nail him to the tree; and now it rises slowly over the surging crowd that rend the astonished air with shouts and yells of triumph. See the blood of redemption streaming; see the cloud of desertion deepening; see the tide of life departing as the glaze gathers on his eyes, and the sword in a Father's hand is passed deeper and deeper into his heart! Hark to the awful cry that rises, loud and clear, in the stillness of the darkness, “Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani!” “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?”

And when Death has done his work, and kind hands have taken down the body, and borne it slowly to the tomb,—look there! You have looked on the face of the dead, but never on one that loved you half so well. You have kissed brows as icy cold, but death never stilled a heart so warm and true. No lips ever prayed for you like these; nor hand ever wrought for you like that; nor eyes ever wept for you like those that are there closed in death. Behold the Lamb of God, slain for your sins! Mary bends over the dear body, kisses the cold feet, and washes the bloody wounds with a flood of tears. Well she may! He had been a kind Lord to her; but not kinder than he will prove to any, to all who kneel with that blessed woman at his feet—weeping, longing, loving suppliants for saving mercy. Behold, and believe! Herein is love indeed; not that we loved him, but that he loved us, and gave himself for us; suffering for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.

III. Let this Lamb of God be the supreme object of our desires, and the sole object of our faith. Be this our language:—

“Jesus, my Lord! I know his name,
His name is all my boast;
He will not put my soul to shame,
Nor let my hope be lost.”

To a sinner's ear there is no music on earth, nor in the golden harps of heaven, like the name of Jesus. Music in its sound, there is ointment in its meaning. Fragrant as the spikenard of the alabaster box, “his name is as ointment poured forth.” If his name be such a blessed thing, what must the sight of him be! To see Jesus clearly with the eye of faith, is to see the deep opening away from Egypt's shore,—is to see the water gush, sparkling from the desert rock,—is to see the serpent gleaming on its pole over a dying camp,—is to see the life-boat coming when our bark reels among foaming breakers,—is to see a pardon when the noose is on our neck and our foot is on the drop. No sight in the wide world like Jesus Christ, with smiles on his face, and a heavenly crown in his hand! This is worth labouring for; praying for; living for; suffering for; dying for. You remember the prophet's servant, and how he climbed the steeps of Carmel. Three years, and never cloud had dappled the burning sky,—three long years, and never a dewdrop had glistened on the grass, or wet the lips of a dying flower; but the cloud came at last. A white speck appeared like a ship's sail on the rim of the sea; it rose—it spread—and as he saw the first lightnings flash, and heard the first thunders roll, how did he forget all his toils! and would have climbed the hill, not seven, but seventy times seven times, to hail that welcome sight!

It is so with sinners so soon as their eyes are gladdened with a sight of Christ—when they have got Christ; and enjoy peace in believing. Be it that they have to climb the hill of prayer, not seven, but seven thousand times—such a sight more than rewards all their toil. Pray on; for it is not on their feet, but on their knees, that men climb to heaven. What though, like good old Simeon, we have to wait for “consolation” till our eyes are dim and our hair is grey?—a sight of Christ will light up the dull eye, and warm the cold blood of age. Are any here who have been long looking, waiting, praying, and cannot yet confidently say that they have found the Lord? Let them draw comfort from the case of the good old man who waited in the temple for the “consolation of Israel” till his eyes grew dim, and his head turned white with age. Be assured that your prayers are not forgotten. Your prayers are in God's book; your tears are in his bottle. The vision may tarry, but it will come. The Saviour will come; hope will come; peace will come. The happy day shall come when, as Simeon took the babe in his aged arms to kiss it, and blessing, worshipping, rejoiced over it, thou also shalt throw thy arms around thy Saviour, to exclaim, “Jesus! thou art all my salvation and all my desire. Whom have I in heaven but thee? there is none on all the earth whom I desire besides thee.”

May Christ be so revealed to us that we shall long to be with him; and cry, as if we were exiles on earth, Oh, to be where Jesus is! Not impatient, yet finding little to detain us here, may the old man's wish hang on our lips: “Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.” When the sand burned their feet, and the hot sun scorched their heads, and the desert's howling wastes lay all around them, how did the Israelites, who saw the purple clusters of Eshcol, long to be where the vine-trees grew! And see, so soon as Simeon holds the babe in his arms, how he wearies to leave the earth, and ascend to heaven! Till his eyes were gladdened with a sight of Jesus, perhaps he was afraid of death, and with his old palsied hands clung to the world—afraid to let go, and drop. But on him with the babe in his arms—and on a man with Christ—the hope of glory in his heart, what a change! In the Saviour's presence Death drops his dart. As Jesus puts on his crown, Death puts off his; as Jesus arrays himself in his glories, Death disrobes him of his terrors, till the saint, transported with the view, feels as if he could spurn the earth, and soar to heaven on eagle's wings—his opinion Paul's: that to be absent from the body, and present with the Lord, is far better.

THE STORY OF THE NEW ZEALAND MISSION.

As Captain Cook approached for the first time the islands of New Zealand, and while he was yet a quarter of a mile from the shore, he was awake, he tells us, by the singing of birds, which he compared to the sound of exquisitely hung bells. The concert of sweet sounds, like the fragrance wafted from the spicy groves of Ceylon, was an invitation to the weary navigator to seek the land. Imagination in such circumstances has an ample wing. It could scarcely fail to accredit the natives with some touch of the harmony with which their own forests rung. If the illusion for a moment played about the mind of the great navigator, a brief experience corrected it. In all lands man's only harmony is consistency with himself. In the islands of the Pacific or Atlantic he is true to one law, till a higher rules him. He lives “hateful and hating one another.”

When Captain Cook landed, after his pleasant morning serenade, he found the population living in fortified villages. War was their trade, prosecuted for plunder in slaves and revenge. The harmony that stole upon his ear, as he hovered along the shore, was but a voice from the choristers of the forest. It had no echo in the soul or life of the New Zealand man. His land of song, and of rich, deep floral beauty, could not tame his savage heart. While war was his game, Captain Cook was not long in discovering it was war with horrors such as have seldom accompanied the hostilities of the most savage tribes. When satiated with the slaughter of their vanquished enemies, he found the New Zealand victors rested only to feed on their dead bodies, as their most delicious repast—that for several days they gorged themselves, like serpents, with human flesh, insulted the wounded, tortured them by applying blazing kauri gum to the skin, and cooked them while life still quivered in their limbs.

And yet, amongst this people Captain Cook found no excuse for their frightful cannibalism. Hunger had not driven them to devour each other. Their temperate climate yielded fruits in abundance. They were skilful in rearing the taro, the sweet potato, the karaka fruit, the berry of the hinau, the cake made of which was in such estimation that it had passed into a New Zealand proverb, “When you awake, may it be to eat the berry of the hinau.” Each family had its patch of cultivation for its own supplies, whilst the fern root, the bread-fruit of the country, which overran the entire northern island, could be gathered in almost unlimited abundance. The sea yielded its ample stores of fish. The eel, the dog-fish, the mackerel, the seal, that swarmed on their coasts, supplied them with a plentiful table, whilst numerous rivers and lakes added to the supply of small fish suitable for food. Want was not the provocative to cannibalism. Even after Captain Cook's first visit in 1769, when he largely added to the dietary resources of the islanders, by the introduction amongst them of new grains and esculents, as the maize, the wheat, cabbage, and turnip, and new animals, as the sheep, goat, pig, and cow, the horrors of cannibalism remained unmitigated. In one of his own subsequent visits a boat's crew of his ship was overpowered in a quarrel with the natives, murdered, cooked, and eaten. And down to a period as recent as 1836, it is on record that during the Rotorua war of that year, sixty human beings were cooked and eaten in two days. Revenge and hatred, stronger, more enduring and invincible than hunger, were the provocatives to the horrid feast. The feast after the victory struck, they supposed, terror into their enemies, and cast perpetual disgrace on the person eaten.

"Out of this eater to bring forth sweetness," would indeed be a moral triumph! To change the "vile affections" of the New Zealander, to curb his horrid appetite, by converting the revenge and hatred, from which it sprung, into brotherly forbearance and love, were an achievement worthy the highest philanthropy. It was a work that challenged the extreme resources of Christianity; and the Christian missionary did not decline the arduous attempt. The problem was beyond the daring of an earthly philanthropy. The Christian missionary alone works with an instrument of the power of which he never despairs. He dares to do where earthly philanthropy stands paralyzed and appalled before the magnitude of the evil.

The change wrought on the New Zealander has been so great, and accomplished in so brief a period, that its narrative recalls to our mind the age when the gospel, like the Roman eagle, flew to conquer. Its history repeats in a nation the miracle of the demoniac, whom no chain could bind, brought to sit at the feet of Jesus clothed and in his right mind. We are faintly indebted to the recent intelligent and able volumes of Dr. Thomson, "The Story of New Zealand, Past and Present,"* for the materials of the following sketch:—

Our early reading has acquainted us with the story of the blooming countenances and fair complexion of the Anglo-Saxon youths attracting Gregory the Great in the market-place of Rome, and the consequent mission of St. Augustine for the conversion of England. The noble form of the New Zealander had a like influence in determining the rise of missionary efforts for his conversion. Struck by the appearance of several chiefs, whom he accidentally saw in the streets of Sydney, the thought entered the mind of Mr. Marsden, then colonial chaplain, Why should a settlement not be formed in New Zealand for the civil and religious improvement of its people. His proposal he submitted without delay to the Church Missionary Society, and to the honour of its zeal and mission intrepidity, its deliberations issued in 1810, in its sending twenty-five agents, lay and clerical, to found a mission settlement among the New Zealanders. Unfortunately for the prosecution of the mission, the news had reached Sydney contemporaneously with the arrival of its agents, of the massacre by the natives of the crew and passengers of the ship Boyd at Wangaroa—an atrocity in revenge for the dishonour done to the son of a chief, who, serving aboard, had been twice flogged at the gangway. The Sydney community were filled with the horrors of the new tale. No ship could be hired to convey the mission agents to their destination. The Governor of New South Wales was more inclined to send a ship of war to punish the recent atrocity, than missionaries to preach peace. The very thought of Christianizing such savages was pronounced an extravagance, and the risk of missionary life in the attempt madness. "A bullet for each New Zealander," according to the saying of an old whaler, was still the doctrine in ascendancy for the subjugation of the natives. The time had not come for the trial of the power of all-conquering truth and love. Arrested at New South Wales, the twenty-five missionary agents found employment in the colony; and the New Zealand Mission was declared to be hopeless by all save Mr. Marsden. To his mind the work was only delayed. He acquiesced in his disappointment, but waited his opportunity to renew the favourite purpose of his life—his great appointed work. Nor had he to wait long. Four years after the failure of the first mission, one of those men that are given to nations to conduct them through an era of change, and to open to them a new history, appeared in New Zealand, Hongi Hika, a scion of the famous Ngaputri nation. For his genius in war he has been called the Napoleon of New Zealand. Unlike to his countrymen, he was small in stature; but he had a large, broad, and high forehead, with quick, piercing eyes. He was endowed with an undaunted constancy of purpose, and with great acuteness and quickness of judgment. Yet, in spite of an intelligence that placed him far ahead of his countrymen, and an ambition that often swallows up other passions, a savage spirit of revenge ruled him through life, and identified him with the worst characteristics of his race. This man proved the instrument of introducing Christianity into New Zealand, and threw the shield of his name and power over its first missionaries. On a visit which he paid to Sydney (1814), after his name had become famous for his warlike exploits, he was received and hospitably entertained by Mr. Marsden. Ruatara, a brother chief who accompanied him, had a like welcome. The opportunity had come for which the colonial chaplain had longed and prayed; and it was not to be lost. He soon found that Hongi's views rose far beyond those of a savage warrior. He had marked in his travels the superiority of the white man, deeply reflected on its source, and was prepared to aid in the introduction amongst his countrymen of those arts that would start them in the race of civilization. By his kindness, Mr. Marsden secured the confidence of the cannibal hero; and when at length he opened to him his plan for the instruction of his countrymen, he obtained from Hongi and his brother chief the promise that they would welcome to New Zealand, and protect in their labours, all future missionaries,—a promise faithfully kept, save in the instance when the Wesleyans were driven from their station at Wangaroa, through the hostility of his followers, which at the time he was unable to restrain, and which, on his death-bed, he deeply regretted. It would have been pleasant to have told of this man, whose name must ever stand associated with the introduction of Christianity into New Zealand, that amongst its first conquests it numbered himself. But Hongi opened a door into which he never entered. He was the cannibal hero to the close of life. Some years after his return from Sydney, when he had subdued every foe, and grown restless from idleness, he announced his intention of visiting England, “to see King George and bring back missionaries, carpenters, blacksmiths, Europeans, and twenty soldiers.” When there, he charmed the religious world by acting the part of a devout Christian; but more sincere than his delight in the Church Liturgy was the passionate interest with which he listened to the stories of the sieges and battles of Napoleon, surveyed the household troops, its weapons of war, and the armory in the Tower. The great subject at the period of his visit being the Queen’s trial, he never could comprehend how so illustrious a chief as King George could not manage one wife without calling in the assistance of all his lords, seeing that he himself ruled without difficulty over five. Returning to Sydney, the savage reawoke in his breast on learning that, during his absence, his son-in-law had fallen in battle on the banks of the river Thames. He hastened home to revenge his death in the slaughter of thousands. War became again his delight. The curbed cannibal broke his chain. On the battle-field of Kaipara, where his favourite son was slain, he scooped out and swallowed the eyes of several of the prostrate wounded on the battle-field. Yet when dying of a wound received in action, and when decked out on his bed with instruments of war, true to his promise to Mr. Marsden, he exhorted his followers to protect the missionaries, and not allow them to leave the country, “For,” said he, “they have done good, and have done no harm.”

Under the shield of this remarkable man Mr. Marsden, in prosecution of his long-cherished hopes, embarked for New Zealand in November 1814, in a brig navigated by convicts, accompanied by Messrs. Kendall, Hall, and King, their wives and several mechanics, Hongi and Ruatara being of the party. On arriving at the Bay of Islands they were received by the natives as friends of the great chief. For twelve acres they purchased two hundred acres of land near the chief’s residence, and founded the first mission station of New Zealand. There the missionaries hoisted a white flag, on which were painted a cross, a dove, an olive branch, and the word “Rongopai,” or “Good tidings;” and contemporaneously with the building of their houses, addressed themselves to the study of the language, to preaching to the people through interpreters, and to the education of their children. Though Hongi himself never became a Christian, he educated his children at the mission schools, and laid the foundation of their rapid prosperity by his example. Other stations quickly followed the rise of the parent one at Rangihu. When the tidings reached England of Marsden and his associates having actually dared to transfer themselves from Australia to the land of the cannibal, fresh pioneers hastened to this heathen outpost. Its post of danger became the post of missionary honour, and new settlements multiplied through the northern island. In 1819 a station was formed at the Kerikeri. Three years afterwards the Wesleyan mission was established at Wangaroa, among the tribe rendered infamous by the massacre of the Boyd. Other stations arose at Paihia, in the Bay of Islands, at Waimate, and at Kaitia; and subsequently, in the prosecution of the mission work, stations were formed in the interior, and planted as far south as Cook’s Straits and the middle island. But, amidst this active organization of missions, the work of native conversion went slowly forward. The missionaries were well received. The patronage of Hongi was a shield thrown over them; their own faithfulness in yielding to the natives a return in axes, blankets, shirts, and other articles, for the food they accepted and the labour they employed, rendered their characters respected, and made their residence in the country an obvious worldly advantage. Any anxiety or danger to which they were subjected, was in consequence of wars, in which they suffered from the common calamities of the country. The blood of no European, even in that land of cannibalism, that was connected with the missions, was spilt.

But notwithstanding this comparative freedom from outward calamities, the faith of the early missionaries was deeply tried. The night was long that preceded the faintest trace of the morning that ultimately broke. For fifteen years they described themselves as men crying in the wilderness. They compared themselves to sowers casting their seed on a rock. In 1825, the Rev. Henry Williams wrote that the natives were “as insensible to the necessity of redemption as brutes;” and in 1829, the Wesleyan mission contemplated withdrawing its establishment from want of success. Human impatience demands that a nation should be born in a day. It frets at the slow rooting of the oak for its life of centuries. It measures the divine work by man’s day of an hand-breadth; and counts that long which, in the life-time of a nation, is but as a moment.

When Christianity at length took root its growth was rapid. During the years of missionary despondency the new thoughts of Christianity had been leavening the native mind, its truths had been forming a conscience, and missionary life a new visible moral code. In 1830 the sowing in tears was exchanged for a reaping time of joy. The missionaries could then speak to the natives in their own tongue; the children of their earlier schools had grown to adults, some of them were able to teach others to read and write; the Sabbath had partially established itself as a day of visible rest; and many of the offensive customs of savage life had given way before the example of European civilization and their intercourse with the missionaries. It needed but the touch of a higher hand, the breath that puts spirit into the dead frame, to quicken these elements into life. When that breath blew, the icy torpor that had chilled the heart of the missionary melted, and his song of praise mingled with the converts who, in 1830, began to fill the churches, offer themselves for baptism, and press the acceptance of their children upon the missionaries, that they might be taught in their schools the religion of Christ, and trained in their learning. The Bible, which had been previously neglected, rose in value, and as at that time there were but few copies in the country, natives who could write transcribed and carried home such portions as they could thus obtain. A few years later (1835) printing presses were added to the Church mission, which struck with awe the natives as they beheld sheet after sheet of white paper issuing from the hand of the printer, impressed, as if by magic, with black letters, and speaking to them in their own tongue. In the Wesleyan and Roman Catholic missions printing presses were also established, from which religious books were issued. And to supply the demand which had arisen, the British and Foreign Bible Society presented the noble offering, to the infant New Zealand Church, of 60,000 copies of the New Testament in Maori, which had just been completed by Bishop Williams, besides 10,000 selections from the Old Testament. The work that had so long been spreading in seed now showed itself in a rapid upward growth and visible fruit. The season of missionary despondency passed away, that of confidence and holy joy succeeded. Before the end of the year 1838 the Church Missionary Society, which has been the peculiarly honoured agent in the conversion of New Zealand, numbered its 54 schools, with their 1431 scholars; its 2476 persons regularly attending church, and 178 communicants. The Liturgy was translated into the Maori dialect with singular success and beauty. The missionaries of the time wrote with transport of the effect of large native congregations uttering the responses, as something indescribably impressive. At the same period the Wesleyan mission numbered its 1000 scholars and church goers.

Yet even these numerical results conveyed no correct idea of the progress which Christianity had made since its first introduction by Mr. Marsden and his devoted band. The fame of a small body of unarmed men, the professed teachers of a new religion and new mode of life, taking up their abode in Hongi's territory, had spread far and wide. It found its way to the natives of Poverty Bay, and to the banks of the Mōkan and Wanganui rivers. New Zealanders passing to and from the north brought with them religious books of the missionaries, and always news of their sayings and doings. Masters of whalers reported that the aborigines, far away from the mission stations, prayed night and morning in nasal psalmody, and chanted Christian psalms to heathen tunes. The tidings passed from hamlet to hamlet that the missionaries were a different class from the whalers and the Pakeha Maoris (strangers turned into natives),—that they kept schools, instructed persons to write on paper words which others seeing understood, gave books for nothing, performed a ceremony called baptism, opposed wars, promoted peace, cultivated new sorts of food, preached against cannibalism, and of a God who did good, and not evil. Rauparaha's son and Rangihēata's nephew, hearing in Cook's Strait of the reformation now at work, passed through hostile tribes to the Bay of Islands, in 1839, and prevailed on the Rev. Mr. Hadfield to return with them to Otaki to teach God's word to their kindred and clan. Shortly afterwards Rauparaha's son visited the Middle Island, preaching himself the gospel of peace to men who had suffered from his father's wars. Even the captured slaves who, on the persuasion of the missionaries, were liberated and allowed to return to their kindred, carried with them the tidings of the gospel they had heard, and the strange report of the change that was passing over their New Zealand countrymen in the Bay of Islands. As the Germans were converted to Christianity, as Dr. Thomson remarks, by the serfs brought from the Roman empire, the diffusion of the cross in New Zealand was materially assisted by manumitted slaves. The arts of civilization largely assisted in advancing the same work. It was not all the result of simple gospel teaching, or of the zeal of the converts, or of a special divine influence. Worldly motives and interest gave impulse to the transition. Though the influence of the civil power was not put forth on its behalf, as Hongi died in the creed of his forefathers, and many of the leading chiefs were at first its fierce opponents, the natives were not slow to perceive the personal advantages that were reaped from instruction in the arts and learning of the missionaries, and to place themselves under their rule. In connection with its mission, the Church Missionary Society had not only its five ordained clergymen and twenty catechists, but its farmer, surgeon, printer, wheelwright, stone mason, and assistant teachers,—a staff who could exemplify the arts and represent the visible blessings which Christianity carried in its bosom. A Rotorua chief observing, during a visit to the Bay of Islands, that the missionaries had temporal as well as spiritual blessings to bestow, begged and obtained a missionary to reside with his tribe. In his "Voyages of a Naturalist," Mr. Darwin tells us that in 1835 he saw at the Church mission station of Waimate a well stocked farm yard and fields of corn, a thrashing barn, a winnowing machine, a blacksmith's forge, a water mill, and ploughshares; and at the mill a New Zealander, white with flour, like his brother miller in England, and several working on the farm dressed in shirts and trousers.

Before these combined influences a priesthood, that presented in all points a contrast to the solid, compact phalanx of Hindu Brahminism, speedily gave way. It was a priesthood without discipline, without idols, without even a temple where zeal and devotion could be kindled by a common worship. The most serious obstacle the mission encountered for a season was its own success. With its expansion the sectarian spirit of rival missionaries awoke. Repressed during the period of common trial and despondency, it revived in the day of prosperity, like the frozen serpent in the warm bosom of the countryman. Episcopalians embroiled themselves in contests with Wesleyans, questioning the validity of their baptism and ministry; while the Roman Catholics were vehement in denying the ordinances of both, and claiming for themselves the attributes of the true Church. On Bishop Selwyn's arrival, fresh from the Oxford school, and whilst yet untaught in the wisdom and charity of the true bishop, he treated in his lordly claims Wesleyan baptism as the act of laymen, and fanned the flame of controversy amongst the converts of the different missions. To such an extent did the dissentients proceed, that in the district of Taranaki, one set of Christians erected a fence, and lined it thickly with fern, that the other might not see them. Even Europeans were denied hospitality by the natives, till they confessed their religious belief. On one occasion a traveller arrived at a pah, in which one religious denomination disputing with another had got possession of the gate, which, to his astonishment, he found shut. On urging his admission, the first question asked was, "To what Church do you belong?" The traveller, perceiving that his supper and night's lodging entirely depended upon his answer, after some hesitation replied, "To the true Church;" which satisfying the party who held the gate, it was instantly opened, and a feast prepared for the traveller and his followers.

Whilst these unseemly contentions hindered, they did not arrest the work. Christ was still preached, and missionary effort prosecuted, with a zeal that was warmed, if not purified, by the struggle of parties. In its results the spiritual revolution accomplished is amongst the greatest that modern Christianity has to record. If still only about one-fourth of the New Zealanders have been baptized, the entire population have partaken of the new social life that has passed into their country with the introduction of the gospel. The unbaptized are not the heathens their fathers were. Many of them are amongst the regular attendants on the teaching and preaching of the missionaries—all of them are changed in their moral and social habits. In the words of Dr. Thomson, written after a close observation of every phase of New Zealand life for eleven years, "Christianity has conferred on New Zealand civilizing influences and blessings which cannot be weighed in the scales of the market. Like musk in a room, it has communicated a portion of its fragrance to everything in the country. It has broken the theocratic principle of the tapu, and other superstitious; it has put an end to cannibalism, and assisted in eradicating slavery; it has proved a bond of union between the races, the native Christian and the settler feeling themselves members of one federation; it has led the way to intellectual development, industry, peace, contentment, regard for the rights of every class, and progressive civilization." The completeness of the conquest, we may add, over its inveterate cannibalism, is tested, and under the most trying ordeal to the New Zealander, by the war unhappily now waging in the northern island. While the native chief, Wirima Kingi has led on his troops with intrepidity, and fought with a skill and courage that have obtained the commendation of his English enemy, the dead on the battle-field have been left untouched, to be consumed by the wild-dogs or the myriad insect host, or quietly buried by their companions in arms. To put the crown on this great work, not only has New Zealand for herself received the gospel,—she has become the seat of a mission to the islands of the south! As Dr. Selwyn annually visits, in his mission ship the Southern Cross, the islands of the Pacific, he brings back with him to Auckland, as Dr. Thomson informs us, heathen youths, that, instructed in company with the New Zealand converts in the principles of Christianity, they may return to their homes to spread its truths amongst their countrymen. The islands once the abode of cannibals are thus assuming the place and discharging the high functions of the Iona of the southern hemisphere.

And this work of "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace," has been accomplished within the lifetime of a single generation. Before the eyes of Mr. Marsden, by whom its foundations were laid, were closed in death, he saw the structure rise. "He had the reward, among the greatest that God vouchsafes to man on earth, to witness the realization of his own idea."

"THOU KNOWEST THAT I LOVE THEE."

WHEN heavenwards my best affections move,
How sweet the thought,—my business is to love,—
To love, with all my soul, and heart, and might,
Him who for me endured life's toil and sorrow,
And death's dark night.

He ever loves;—how full the proof he gave,
Coming the lost of earth to seek and save!

He loves the captives whom he died to free,
He loves the Church, he loves the little children,— Loves even me.

He felt, as we can feel, when heart with heart
In truest, deepest sympathy has part.

Loving with all, but with a favoured few—
O Mary! John! how blessed was your portion!
How he loved you!

And wilt thou love me also, gracious Friend?
Love me, like him who on thy bosom leaned?
Then with the weeping Magdalene the while
I will embrace thy feet, in hope awaiting
One word, one smile!

Weeping, when thou art absent, as a child
Left by its mother lonely in the wild.
Oh, when thy Spirit's voice no more I hear,
Nor feel thy presence, all beside is sadness,
All dark and drear!

Long this poor sinful heart thou must have known,
By many a longing sigh and mourning groan.
Thy gifts of faith and hope may brightly shine,
But Love is more,—it seems to bring possession,—
It makes thee mine.

And how am I thus blest! thy grace alone,
Thy wondrous mercy, chose me for thine own.
I sought thee not, when thou wast seeking me;
Thy love went forth, the helpless wanderer finding,—
Who loves like thee!

ELUCIDATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

WHY CHRIST CHIEFLY LIVED AND LABOURED IN GALILEE.

MATT. IV. 12-16; JOHN IV. 43, 44.

THE fact that our Lord spent the chief part of his active ministry, not in Judea proper, but in the comparatively remote district of the country called Galilee, is familiar to every reader of the gospel-history—though the reasons which led to it may with many be little known, and the proofs it afforded of divine wisdom and foresight scarcely so much as thought of. When rightly contemplated, it is one not of the least instructive portions of the evangelical record. But let the circumstances of the case be distinctly noted. The first three evangelists, who are by much the fullest in the accounts they give of our Lord's more public and active ministry, record only what took place in Galilee, and in the course of Christ's last journey to Jerusalem, and temporary sojourn there. St. John almost reverses the process; he says comparatively little of the labours of Christ in Galilee, but dwells chiefly on what occurred during a few occasional visits to Jerusalem and its neighbourhood, and the memorable circumstances connected with the last and more prolonged visit. But it is as clear from his narrative as from that of the others, that Galilee was the great scene of our Lord's public labours, and that what he did elsewhere, however important as regards the higher ends of his mission, stood in a somewhat exceptional relation to his regular ministerial agency. His thus peculiarly identifying himself with Galilee is the more remarkable, that his immediate disciples, after his departure, by his express direction, became equally identified with Jerusalem and Judea, while Galilee entirely drops from the scene.

The passages of Scripture pointed to at the head of this article are so far alike, that they both assign a reason for the commencement of Christ's regular ministry in Galilee, though they differ in the precise reason assigned. After recording the circumstances connected with our Lord's interview with the woman of Samaria, and the results which grew out of it, St. John briefly notices his march northward, and his selection of Galilee as the proper field of ministerial labour,—“He departed thence, and went into Galilee; for Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country.” By his own country here is plainly meant Nazareth, where Jesus had been brought up; and the evangelist tells us, he did not halt and continue his residence there, but went further north still, into Galilee, where the people were ready to receive him as a prophet; which those of Nazareth, from their early acquaintance with him, were indisposed to do. A favourable opening was presented to him in the one quarter, which he knew well enough would be denied him in the other; and this alone was sufficient to determine his choice. But it was not the whole; and, indeed, Nazareth itself was within the bounds of Galilee. John could not be ignorant of that, though he speaks of Jesus quitting his native region and passing into Galilee; what he means is, that he now fixed his residence in the heart of the Galilean territory, instead of staying at Nazareth on its southern border. The limits of the territory were never very closely defined, but it mainly included the regions which stretched to the west from the Sea of Tiberias, and around its northern shores. Capernaum, which stood on the north-west side of the lake, might be regarded as its centre; and there, accordingly, Christ fixed his head-quarters during the period of his public ministry.

St. Matthew, in the account he gives of the matter, recognises Nazareth as a part of Galilee, but tells us simply that Jesus preferred Capernaum to it as his place of residence: “Now when Jesus heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee; and, leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea-coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim.” The reason he presently assigns for this is found in the requirements of prophecy; it was done, he says, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah regarding the land of Zabulon and Nephthalim, by the way of the sea, namely, along the shores of the Sea of Tiberias, and about its extreme limits, Galilee of the Gentiles—the region where Jew and Gentile held a kind of disputed sway,—“The people that sat in darkness saw a great light,” &c. (Isa. ix. 1-3.) Even if Nazareth had been disposed to favour the claims of Jesus, it was not a convenient site, as the centre of operations which were to illuminate with the light of heaven the still more northerly and sea-board regions of Galilee, which were specially mentioned in the prophetic chart of gospel times. Capernaum was more favourably situated—itself also a little sea-port on the lake—and was, therefore, according to Matthew, chosen. It is a different reason from St. John's, but no way inconsistent with his—additional merely, not contradictory. And with these two a third may also be named, though not noticed in the Gospels, but not less influential than either. Nazareth stood within a few miles—an hour's ordinary travel—from Sepphoris, a common residence of the Herod who was at the time tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, and who had recently added to his other sins the horrid crime of putting the Baptist to death. In the immediate neighbourhood of such a person, it was obviously not to be expected that Jesus should find standing-room for the wonderful agency he was now going to exercise; the less so, as he plainly wished his ministry to be regarded as the continuation, though after a higher style, of that of his martyred forerunner. Common prudence required him to withdraw to a more remote field; necessity might even be said to be laid upon him to do so.

Now, while Nazareth and the southern parts of Galilee were thus virtually excluded from our Lord's choice, the region of Judea proper was equally excluded. Not the regal, but the priestly and Pharisaical influence was there so strong, that he could have had no freedom to act in the way he intended; a vigilant, envious, and constraining agency would have borne in upon him continually while he was performing his mighty works, and pouring forth his profound and searching utterances. This is rendered perfectly certain by the violence which soon beset him, whenever for a brief season he transferred his ministrations to the city and neighbourhood of Jerusalem; the work even of a few days was more than his adversaries were willing to tolerate; and long before his ministerial course was run he found it impossible to walk any more openly in Jewry (John vii. 1; v. 16; viii. 59, &c.). It appears, therefore, that no sphere of any extent, where the bulk of the population was Jewish, remained open to him but the middle and northern districts of Galilee; there alone could he find scope for the exercise of his wonderful ministry among the Circumcision; and had no regard been had but to present action and duty, the choice, to all appearance, must have taken the direction which it actually did.

The singular thing, however, is, that ancient prophecy had more than seven centuries before fixed upon that very region as the district of Palestine that was first to be irradiated with the dawn of gospel light; the more singular that there was nothing in the historical relations of the region, less than nothing in its actual condition, to render it in the eye of reason entitled to such peculiar honour. As originally described by Moses, in connection with the tribes who were to inherit it, natural fatness and fertility are ascribed to the district; but in later times, and as seen by the spiritual eye of the prophet, it seemed all overshadowed with gloom—the region most peculiarly depressed and afflicted; partly, no doubt, from its comparative richness, which provoked the cupidity of spoilers; partly also from its position as a sort of border territory, which was more than others exposed to the incursions of Syrian and Chaldean invaders; but, most of all, from its sunk spiritual condition. In this respect its inhabitants were disadvantageously situated, both on account of their distance from the temple, and their proximity to such heathen neighbours as the corrupt states of Tyre and Sidon, and Damascus, from whose manners and population a pernicious influence was ever pressing in upon them. Hence, doubtless, more especially, it was called "Galilee of the Gentiles,"—as if it were an outlandish fully as much as an Israelitish territory. And for the same reason it was held in a certain degree of contempt by the Pharisaical Jews of our Lord's time, and was considered too low in position and character to allow of any prophet being expected to arise out of it (John vii. 52). But God's judgment is not after the manner of man's; and this very region, relatively so unpromising, so dark, so depressed, was the one chosen out of all Palestine for the breaking forth of the glorious day-spring of grace,—chosen, and written down for it in ancient prophecy, ages before the bright era had come. Who but He, who sees the end from the beginning, could have so traced out the boundaries of coming events! And the lettered Jews, who lived when the events were taking place, how, but from judicial blindness, should they have so completely overlooked the requirements of one of the most striking passages in their prophetic Scriptures! Later rabbis have discovered what their prejudiced and misguided forefathers failed to perceive; for in one of their books the remarkable statement occurs, "The Messiah will manifest himself in the land of Galilee" (Sohar, in Schoettgen Mes., p. 524). Happy, if they would but change the future into the past, and confess that what the prophecy required to be done, has in reality come to pass! He who was to be the great Enlightener of Galilee, who was to pour around its benighted dwellings the radiance of a divine glory, has already appeared, and appeared as he never can do again; for the relation has for ever gone, which the Galilee of the prophet held to the covenant people on the one side, and the higher purposes of God on the other.

We have still, however, only adverted to the historical and, along therewith, the prophetic reasons for the selection of Galilee as the field of our Lord's ministerial agency. Spiritual considerations, also, concurred with these, and rendered this part of Christ's procedure in closest harmony with the great ends of his mission. While the low and depressed condition of Galilee made it little likely, in a human respect, to be the region whence light and blessing were to issue forth to the world, it was on that very account the more appropriate field for the beneficent and regenerative working of Him who came especially to seek the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to call, not righteous men, but sinners to repentance,—an instruction which he by-and-by rendered still more definite and express, by freely mingling with publicans and sinners, and finding among them those who should be members of his kingdom. Then, by laying the foundations of this kingdom in such a region, and deriving from it the men who were to be its representatives and ambassadors to the world, the great lesson was taught at the outset,—taught in the very home and nursery of Christianity,—that it came not by the will of man, nor stands in man's wisdom or goodness, but in Him alone who is the Lord from heaven, as having in himself all that is needed to enlighten the ignorant and restore the fallen, to make even the base and weak things of the world confound those which are esteemed honourable and mighty. Finally, by having the first beginnings of the gospel in Galilee, and its second in Jerusalem, and so meeting in its earlier stage a less, in its later a more firmly organized and formidable opposition, an example was set for all times respecting the necessity of wisdom as well as boldness in the mode of propagating the gospel of Christ,—teaching especially the fitness and propriety of endeavouring to get a footing for the truth in those places first, where it is most likely to gain a measure of acceptance, and then from there as a vantage-ground to advance to others which are more difficult of conquest. Neither our Lord nor his apostles consulted with flesh and blood in the course they pursued for the establishment of the truth; but as little did they needlessly set them at defiance, or encounter more than was meet of the enmity and malice which they are ever ready to direct against the cause of heaven.

“OUR SAINTS.”

BY MRS. H. B. STOWE.

THE “prayers of saints”—ah yes, indeed,
I well believe they pray,
Whose ministry is ever sweet
About our earthly way.

The saints—have we not known them here
In days of earthly care,
When they were one with us in hope,
In labour, love, and prayer?

Have we not seen their dying eyes,
Like morning stars at dawn,
Look through the golden gates of day,
To hail the eternal morn?

Hath not each common household thing,
That once of old was theirs,
Been gifted with a holy charm
To aid us in our prayers?

Sweet fragrance from the heavenly land
Falls softly from the skies,
And fills the common household room
Once hallowed by their eyes.

The book, the chair, the pen, the glove,
To us are more divine
Than crucifix or rosary
Brought from the holiest shrine.

The curl of hair, the faded leaves,
The ring, the flower, the gem,
Speak with a tender, warning voice,
And bid us follow them.

High thoughts, brave deeds, and firm resolves,
And zeal that never faints,
Come to us by these simplest things—
These relics of our saints.

OUR DORCAS MEETINGS.

HOME DUTIES—FAULTS OF TEMPER.

I HAD been endeavouring for some time to visit my young friends at their own houses, and become better acquainted with their parents as well as themselves. Though chiefly in humble life, they were all of respectable families, and I met with little appearance of real poverty. But in too many cases I could not help observing an evident want of much family affection, and a degree of discomfort and unhappiness; and several of the girls, as I gained more of their confidence, came to me in private, with tales of domestic sorrow, asking counsel or consolation. This state of things did not surprise me, for, alas, I had too often met with it before; but it grieved my heart, and made me desirous if possible, by the divine blessing, to suggest some remedies.

So, at our next meeting, when all were quietly settled at work, I asked,—

“Where is the place where each of us ought to feel most happy?”

The answer I believe will ever come, as if by instinct, from all Scottish lips,—

“At home.”

“But are we always happiest there?”

There followed a moment's silence, and some looks of surprise, but several answered together,—

“Not always.”

“That is a sad truth. Can you tell me the reason of it?”

After some hesitation—“Want of religion.”

“That is indeed the real root of all unhappiness, and in many cases the plain, indisputable cause. But the answer will not quite do in this case. I have known persons whom I believed to be Christians, who yet did not live happily at home, indeed, I grieve to say, less happily than others whom I had no reason to think were half so sincere in their religion. Now, what could be the meaning of this? What could make the home where God was really feared and Jesus loved less happy than the other, where the things of heaven were but little regarded?"

It was a minute or two before I got an answer.

"Bad tempers."

"Yes, that is the great secret. Even religion, without good temper, will not make a family truly and steadily happy. This is a most important subject, which I am very anxious to make you seriously consider. It is sadly true, that a person of an easy, cheerful, amiable disposition, without much religion, may be more loved and valued, in a domestic circle, than a real Christian, who has a peevish, passionate, or otherwise faulty temper. And nothing brings a greater reproach on religion than this. I shall never forget the question asked by a young friend, who had been employed for some time in the family of one whom I highly esteemed and honoured. 'Ma'am, do you consider Mrs. — a Christian?' 'Surely,' I replied; 'indeed an eminent one.' 'But how can that be, when she has often such a bad temper at home?' I was much grieved, and though I endeavoured to say that we must make allowance for natural infirmity of disposition, and that doubtless the faults seen by others were deeply bewailed before the Lord, still I could not but feel the justice of the censure, and the stumbling-block which might thus be cast in the way of those who, not yet themselves decided for Christ, are judging of the benefits of his service by the conduct of his professing followers. There is truth in the old saying, The Spirit of God may dwell where neither you nor I would like to dwell; but it is a humbling truth; and another one ought to be ever before us, If religion has done nothing for your temper, it has done little for your soul.

"Now, as I have already said, youth is the time when those habits of all kinds are formed, which generally influence the whole character and history afterwards for good or evil. This is especially true in regard to the subject before us. It is hard work, indeed, to overcome faults of temper, when they have been allowed to go on unchecked until late in life. Now is your time, by the grace and help of God, to discover and resist those tendencies which will cause misery to yourselves and others, and to cultivate the amiable, Christ-like dispositions which will bring peace and happiness to your own bosoms, and make you a comfort and blessing to all around you.

"Let us first look at this matter in the light of Scripture, where the histories of those of like passions with ourselves have been written by the Holy Spirit, for our warning or encouragement."

I then asked for scriptural instances of family discomfort and unhappiness, arising from the indulgence of sinful tempers, even among the people of God. We found the cases of Sarah and Hagar—Rachel and Leah—Joseph and his brethren—Miriam and Aaron against Moses—Hannah and Peninnah, &c. While in other instances we found the same passions resulting in the commission of darker crimes, as in the case of Cain, the sons of Israel, Saul, Haman. Then the sin and suffering which individual believers brought upon themselves by giving way to hasty impatience, resentment, or envy, as Moses and Aaron, Miriam, Jonah; and how narrowly David was saved in similar circumstances, by the prudence and faithfulness of Abigail, for whose interference, under God, he was so truly thankful (1 Sam. xxv.).

We then turned to the all-perfect example of our Lord. I dwelt on this at some length, showing how what we call the passive graces seem if possible the most conspicuous in the character of Him who is "altogether lovely"—who, "when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, threatened not." I read the twentieth chapter of Luke as a specimen of the constant trials of temper, as we would call it, to which he must have been exposed by the capitious, ensnaring, questioning of his enemies and persecutors, and the marvellous patience, no less than divine wisdom, with which he replied. Even his hours for solitary devotion were not undisturbed, and how meekly the interruptions were borne! (Mark i. 35-39.) Well may the apostle say, "I beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ." How sad, how strange, that those who call themselves his disciples, his followers, should so often indulge in tempers and frames of spirit the most opposed to the example they profess to imitate, or at least not be engaged in a perpetual struggle against these temptations.

We next considered the variety of characters and dispositions, no one person, in this respect, being exactly like another. I endeavoured to point out how this arrangement, in the wise providence of our heavenly Father, greatly adds to our enjoyment in social intercourse, besides being a most important source of discipline, and means of calling into exercise the graces of the renewed soul. "Indeed, my young friends," I said, "I believe with the most of us, the Christian warfare, the good fight of faith, principally consists in striving against our own inward enemies, the temptations to pride, impatience, peevishness, envy, and so on, which 'most easily beset' ourselves, or which are called forth by the infirmities of our fellow-men. Few of us may be tempted to great or open sins, but each one has daily cause to mourn over those failings of temper, which alike hinder our own happiness, give pain to others, and grieve the Holy Spirit of God. Those faults are generally most apparent at home, and do most harm there. A little reflection will make you see this. And one great cause of their constant recurrence, with all the vexation and discomfort which they occasion, is just that we are not sufficiently impressed with their sinfulness on the one hand, nor on the other with the truth, that by the help of God it is in our own power greatly to correct and avoid them. I need say little to make you sensible how much happier you would be, could you but overcome those sad failings to which conscience bears witness. But I may be enabled to show you the way towards this, and if so, I shall be doing you a greater kindness, a more real benefit, than if I were filling your purses with silver and gold.

"But let us come to particulars, look our enemies freely in the face, and see what we have to encounter."

I then asked what were the principal faults of temper, which bring sin and sorrow into the heart and the home where they enter. A melancholy list was easily given.

I tried to classify them, and mentioned a remark of Hannah More, which in early life had made a strong impression on my own mind. "Every temper," she says, "is naturally inclined, more or less, to one of three faults: passion, peevishness, or obstinacy." There is much truth in this observation, yet I should now be disposed to extend the list. I should arrange the most frequent sins of this nature under six heads, and add to Miss More's list other three: pride, capriciousness, and jealousy. We went over them separately.

1. A passionate temper. When carried to an extreme, its consequences may be terrible. How many have lamented in vain, for long years, or all through life, the effects of one fit of passion, expressed in words or actions! Anger, as the proverb says, is short madness. How dreadful to think of any rational being, far less any Christian, being exposed to such an influence! Yet it is often found along with a warm, generous, loving disposition, ready to repent and make reparation when the angry impulse is over. But do not deceive yourselves in this way, or think lightly of your sin or your danger, if you feel that a hot, passionate temper is your fault. None can be more unlike the character of Him whom you profess to follow. If you are not earnest, and in some measure successful, in the effort to overcome your tendency to give way to angry and violent emotion, you have no reason to think that the work of grace is begun in your heart. Patience and meekness are the graces for which you must most earnestly pray.

2. Peevishness. A fretful, dissatisfied, complaining spirit, always ready to find fault, and make the most of little evils and annoyances. This is perhaps most common in advancing years, when the temper has got soured and chagrined by the trials or disappointments which all must expect to encounter on earth. But its seeds are sown in youth, and must then be watchfully noticed and plucked out of the soil, if you wish to escape much unhappiness yourselves, and avoid being a torment to others. I believe a peevish, fretful member in a family is often a greater cause of discomfort than one of a passionate spirit. Yet it is sad to think how I have seen even real Christians indulge this disposition without appearing to be aware of its sinfulness. Dread the first risings of discontent; recollect it was the first sin to which the enemy tempted Eve, and ever since that day, has been what the old divines call a mother-sin, giving rise to many others. Beware of murmuring; remember how the people of Israel suffered for it. If you feel that this is the fault of your natural disposition, think often of your sins, and "number your mercies," and pray for the graces of Christian thankfulness and cheerfulness.

3. Obstinacy. Firmness and decision are most important elements of character, without which it has no strength or stability. But an obstinate, unyielding temper is something very different, or at least is good perverted and carried to an extreme. I would include under this head that sullen, sulky, dogged disposition, which we express by the Scottish word dour. This shows itself in very early life, and nothing is more difficult to deal with and overcome, as every teacher or thoughtful observant parent can testify. Children or older people under its influence will appear as if "possessed by a dumb devil," and I have heard of obstinate silence as to all social, friendly intercourse, being actually maintained for days, during an attack of this kind, which perhaps took its first rise from some trifling cause. Can anything be more annoying in a family, or make the guilty member less loveable? If any of you are sensible that it is your temptation, study much the character of the gentle Redeemer, and pray earnestly for more conformity to himself. Compel yourself to yield often in appearance at least, if not in heart. Or if you feel that the enemy has prevailed at the time, make confession afterwards to man as well as to God, and the very effort and humiliation of this will be a help for the future. Resist and check the first symptoms of a dour fit coming on; you will here especially find prevention easier than cure.

4. Pride. It would seem at first sight incredible that this should be one of the most common sins of fallen, ignorant, weak beings like ourselves, were it not so constantly alluded to in the word of God, and proved by experience. There is no fault which assumes a greater variety of disguises, or is more difficult to keep under. The world speaks of "proper pride," and self-respect, &c., and some Christians seem, by their actions at least, to think that if they are humble before the Lord, there is no sin in allowing a naturally proud or haughty disposition to appear in their ordinary "walk and conversation." But deeply will the child of God be made to suffer, who does not watch and pray against this temper. Take your Bibles, and spend an hour in searching out what God says of pride, its sinfulness and its punishment, and you will see how truly, as a Christian friend once wrote to myself, we may find the explanation of many of what we are ready to call "mysterious chastisements" in this, that "the Lord must have his people humbled, at whatever cost." But even setting this aside, though pride is one of those sins which the world thinks lightly of, it is much against even our worldly happiness. A proud character is seldom a loveable one, and is perpetually meeting with disappointments and mortifications which the gentle and lowly know little of. And when trials of various kinds occur, they bring with them, to such a mind, a peculiar bitterness, which the humble sufferer is altogether spared. Others may not be so much annoyed by this fault of temper as by passion or fretfulness, but you will pay dearly for it in your own bosoms. Strive and pray for humility, were it only for selfish advantage. "The meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

5. Caprice. This may perhaps be better defined by calling it an unequal temper. It is a peculiar temptation, which many of you may happily not know in personal experience, but which most of you will have met with in others. A person whom you can never depend upon; who is all kindness one day, and coldness the next. If you meet to-day, there will be a cordial greeting and kind inquiries,—to-morrow perhaps hardly a passing recognition. You think you have given offence, and it may be so, for such characters are very ready to take it from trifling causes; but in all probability you have nothing to do with the change of manner. This occurs repeatedly, and you are troubled and perplexed, till you begin to perceive that it is in the individual a radical fault of temper and disposition. You may be brought to feel true regard and even affection in spite of it, but it will ever be a sad hindrance to comfortable intercourse, and acquaintances in general cannot have patience with it. I need not say what discomfort such a person must occasion to dependants, or to the family circle. It is a most unfortunate fault, and I believe must be detected and conquered in early life, if it is overcome at all.

6. Jealousy. I am inclined to think this the darkest name on our list, productive of greater misery to the individual who indulges it, and to all within his or her influence, than perhaps any other of the faults we have mentioned. It is a kind of temper which begins to appear early, and is easily discovered. Your own consciences will tell you at once if it is your snare,—if you are envious and uneasy when you see others admired and successful beyond yourself, and above all, if you are jealous and suspicious as to the affections of your friends and relatives, and cannot bear the thought that they should love another better, or even as well as you. Beware of what poets have called the "green-eyed monster," as truly as if he were a real dragon in your path of life. Once allowed entrance, this spirit of evil will be like a very canker, consuming your own happiness, and surely in the end alienating the very affections you are so anxious to secure, so afraid of losing. For what love can long stand out against continual suspicion and distrust? At first, indeed, there may be something flattering in the idea of our affection being so highly valued, so watchfully guarded, but this will not last long in any sensible, independent mind. Dreadful are the crimes on record of which jealousy has been the cause, but how many a sad tale of family and personal misery, from the same source, remains unrecorded, except in the book of God's remembrance, and the sorrowful memories of some broken hearts! Yes, if you feel this temper rising within you already, I repeat, start from it as from a serpent, and rest not till by prayer and effort you are enabled to crush it under your feet. The struggle may be hard, and you may often through life have to renew the conflict; but by the help of Christ you shall succeed, and the reward will be such as only those can understand, who have felt the bitter consequences of non-resistance.

We talked at some length over these various faults, and I tried to point out how they might be detected in different degrees, and different combinations, in our own hearts, or observed in others. But I felt the subject too important to be concluded at once, and so dismissed my young friends for this evening, begging that each, during the next fortnight, would endeavour, watchfully and prayerfully, to discover her own besetting sins among those we have been considering.

"For recollect," I said, "that though some tempers are by nature, and by the grace of God, much better than others, yet all are imperfect, and each of us must feel that in one or more of the points I have mentioned we are ready to fail. And in some respects our sin is then the greater, if our temptations are less strong than those of others. Ask the help of the Holy Spirit to look within, and discover your peculiar danger, each for herself. And so you will be better able to understand and apply what further remarks and friendly counsels I may have to offer at our next meeting." c. c.

DEVOUT NATURALISM.

WE freely confess the fascinating charm which devout naturalism throws over much of our current literature. Its language is a fair counterfeit of genuine devotion. Neither an outright contempt of revelation nor a total irreligiousness of life forms any barrier to the realizing, the expressing these sentiments,—tender, and thoughtful, and inspiring as are the strains they breathe. We listen, and it is almost as if an angel-voice were hymning its adoration before the throne. Many an earnest, holy heart has poured out the fulness of an accepted worship in words like these, never asking whether an Isaac Watts or a Thomas Moore was their author:—

"O Thou who dry'st the mourner's tear,
How dark this world would be,
If, pierced by sins and sorrows here,
We could not fly to thee!

Oh! who could bear life's stormy doom,
Did not thy wing of love
Come brightly wafting through the gloom,
Our peace-branch from above?"

To the child of God these have been, as they are and will be, the expression of his trust in the love, his leaning on the arm of a Divine Supporter. He takes them as companions of his closet-hours, and they rise in praise to his lips as by faith he enters more deeply into the securities of the everlasting covenant. We cannot spare them from our hymn-books. Hardly could our truest Christian life give itself utterance more fitly than in some of these lyrics, as passing up to the higher Pinnacles of hope and assurance, the pearly gates of the Jerusalem above gleam purely on the vision through the clear, spiritual atmosphere. So properly do such effusions belong to experimental piety, that it inflicts a pang of sadness to remember that they are the offspring of unrenewed, unsanctified affections. Not that we charge them with a hypocritical pretending, a mere feigning of unfelt fervours. We regard them as the birth of some mood of passing melancholy, or excited ideality, destined, it may be,—like many a transient pulse of purer feeling,—to be speedily followed by a congenial, familiar indulgence in the dissipations of folly and sin. It is a strange phenomenon, and it seems more strange the longer we think of it, that pilgrims heavenward should be chanting the words of those who are plainly bound in the contrary direction. Shall we solve the mystery by admitting the dictum, that “everybody is good sometimes”? Nay,—except in a general sense of “natural goodness,” which does not touch the centre of this inquiry. The imagination has its hours of intenser summer-light and warmth. The constitutional religiosity of some is excessive and easily moved. Moore could throw off stanzas fit for the praises of a white-robed choir of “the just made perfect,” and finish the evening, just as spontaneously, with a bacchanal chorus reeking with sensual heats. So Byron could come down from his serious and almost prophet-like musings in Alpine solitudes to revel in the vice of Italian cities with only a yet keener zest. So the bird sings its sweetest song from out the blossoming tree-top, and the next moment is picking up its dinner of earth-worms from out the oozy mire. We are reminded of another of the modern Anacreon’s “Sacred Songs:”—

“The bird let loose in Eastern skies,
When hastening fondly home,
Ne’er stoops to earth her wing, nor flies
Where idle warblers roam;
But high she shoots through air and light,
Above all low decay,
Where nothing earthly bounds her flight,
Nor shadow dims her way.

So grant me, God, from every care
And stain of passion free,
Aloft through Virtue’s purer air
To hold my course to thee!
No sin to cloud, no lure to stay
My soul, as home she springs,—
Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom in her wings.”

The allusion is delicate; the prayer is inimitable, if the artist-hand be more visible than the burning heart.* Even more winning upon our sensibilities is the “Come, ye disconsolate,”—though we must doubt if the poet’s disconsolateness had anything to do with that “sorrow which needeth no repentance.” But the melodies which genius inspires, graceless though it be, will linger around the heart, and in nights of loneliness and sorrow, and in mornings of returning joy, will help the confidence and the thanksgiving of the faint yet pursuing follower of the Lamb. Natural taste and sensibility the most exquisite we readily concede them. In a Christian soul they become the censer of a holy offering. What we deny is, that they are this in their originating source; that they express any piety which is genuine, or can be the vehicle of any true devotion when associated with impure desires, vicious sympathies, an irreligious life. A chord is struck which gives forth, with surpassing pathos, a subdued, a melting harmony. An indescribable charm breathes through the deep, impassioned music. We turn to its creator, and the illusion vanishes. No worship “in spirit and in truth” can ascend from the altars of unregenerate nature. No priesthood of Mammon or Belial, or any of the gods of flesh and sense, can consecrate an offering at the shrine of the Holy One of Israel.—Boston Review.

INDIVIDUALITY AND RESPONSIBILITY.

In these bustling times, not a few live so much in public, or so occupy their minds with the links that bind them to society, that momentous matters of a purely personal character do not receive due attention. The Bible adjusts self and society by conjoining the personal responsibility of every man to God with a law that requires and a gospel that kindles a generous love to others. In one place (Gal. vi.) the two come so near, and in a form so antithetic, that they sound like a contradiction: “Bear ye one another’s burdens;” and again, “Every man shall bear his own burden.” Let us endeavour to realize—

OUR ISOLATED INDIVIDUALITY.

“Enter into thy closet, and shut the door.” Meditate as well as pray. Alone with God you will deeply feel what a solemnity there is in your being and destiny. Nowhere, perhaps, will you feel it so impressively except, as a stranger in a crowded city, you mark as thousands pass you the individuality stamped on each and you—alone!

That infant of days has just entered on an endless career. Mother, think of its individuality, and pray. A destiny is before it through time into eternity—a line to which no other lie parallel. It will have a history all its own.

See these two venerable men crowned with silvery locks, and wrinkled with care. These were twin brothers, so like and so loving for many years, that it seemed as if for once two immortals were to go side by side inseparably. In manhood their lots were far apart, and now in age, when the emigrant returns to his fatherland and his brother's home, and there the two review their personal histories, and see how in character and countenance they are like twins no more—how deeply they feel that "every man must bear his own burden!"

* Colein’s seal had engraven on it a hand holding a burning heart, with the motto, “I give thee all! I keep back nothing for myself.”

Survey your own life, my reader—your sins, your sorrows, your joys. In all that is most important how intensely personal! Take, for example, your trials. Each "heart knows its own bitterness." God seems to have a new place for every man to restrain, or subdue, or guide, or train him.

In "the great congregation" the song is one, and the voices are in harmony. The assembly prays and listens to the word as one; but how varied the movements of these minds and hearts! The abiding results flow from the transactions in these pews of individual souls with God.

Are you a real believer? If so, whilst linked in love to myriads in earth and heaven, all one in Christ, your convictions, your conversion have been, and your spiritual conflict will be your own—peculiar and alone.

See that death-bed—the husband and the father "passing away." We take no extreme case where death finds his victim in solitude. Here wife and children are around the dying man. All that tender sympathy can do to soothe his last moments is done. Gentle hands, familiar voices, loving eyes are there, and yet the man dies alone. See that face! He bids or looks farewell; but a strange abstraction is already there. Dear ones seem near, and yet he feels all alone in the valley. The moment comes—he crosses the dark river—he enters the world unseen—ALONE!

Vast will the gathering be before the great white throne; but no man will be lost in the crowd. "Every one shall give account of himself" in that solemn day.

Of heaven and hell we know little, but enough assuredly to awaken the sinner's fears and brighten the believer's hopes. In neither will our individuality be lost. In hell each one will, like Judas, have "his own place;" and in heaven, whilst all will be truly blessed and reflect the same glorious image, there will be a beautiful variety as in the features of our family circle, the flowers of the fragrant garden, or the stars that adorn our sky, yet "differ in glory."

Such rapid glimpses may introduce us to the more definite subject of—

OUR PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Here two topics demand notice—namely, the General Rule, and the Gospel Exception.

THE GENERAL RULE is, that responsibility is not transferable—"Every man shall bear his own burden." Divine law lays its demands on men individually. "Thou shalt," or "Thou shalt not," introduces precept upon precept. It is all for thee, and the responsibility of a personal obedience is thine. If sin be committed, it is a stain upon thy soul that oceans cannot wash away—a burden upon thy conscience that thou cannot shake off. Guilt and the guilty man are inseparable.

Such is the general rule. No created hand can sever sin and the sinner; and God himself has but one way in which even he can do it.

To illustrate: You are seated a thoughtful spectator in a criminal court. You somehow feel a deep interest in the prisoner at the bar. The trial proceeds, and he pleads not guilty. One witness follows another. No one's proof is clearly sufficient, but the parts fit into each other. They are mutually supplementary, and together complete. You see that dark deed fastened to the prisoner. The verdict of the jury and the sentence of the judge close the scene; but in prison and in exile the crime cleaves to that man, and to him alone; and even if set free from the penalty, the stain is on him in his own consciousness, if not in the circle in which he moves.

Reader, you may never have stood at the bar of an earthly judge; but in the court of your own conscience you have been often found guilty, and these numerous preliminary and private convictions, in accordance with the General Rule, form the ample and ever-growing materials for the dark indictment on the final and public day of trial, unless you come under—

THE GOSPEL EXCEPTION. The only being in the universe to whom our guilt can be transferred or imputed is the GOD-MAN—the Lord Jesus Christ. "He bare our sins in his own body on the tree." It was a real transference. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all." He bore the penalty as well as the guilt, for "he was wounded for our transgressions." "It pleased the Lord to bruise him." His atonement is all-sufficient. It was finished and accepted by God long ago. At the cross of Jesus sin was expiated, justice satisfied, the law honoured; and there sinners are now set free—pardoned, justified, saved!

Believing reader, rejoice! Your guilt is cancelled, and you stand clear in Jesus. You have come under the glorious gospel exception; and now with a grateful, loving heart you return, in some respects, though not in all, under the general rule. You are not divested of responsibility. Far from it. The very grace that has made you an everlasting debtor has laid on you a weight of obligation unknown before. Live for him who died for you; and if you feel that you are not able to bear such a weighty responsibility as this, take courage, for whilst it cannot be transferred to another, grace sufficient is provided for you.

Doubting, hesitating, unbelieving reader, there is a message here for thee. There thou standest, a sin-laden one, and the gospel reveals JESUS the SIN-BEARER. God has given his full sanction to the transference, and it awaits your consent. Mark the alternative. The burden, the sin is yours. You may keep it if you choose—keep and love it now—keep it and bewail it for ever—but Jesus is ready and willing to relieve you—to relieve you at once; "for God hath made him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be the righteousness of God in him."

THE TREASURY PULPIT.

"THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD, I SHALL NOT WANT."

PSALM cxlii. 1.

BY THE REV. CHARLES STANFORD, AUTHOR OF "CENTRAL TRUTHS."

THE man who uttered these words has now spent thirty centuries in heaven. Thirty centuries have taken their flight since the lips of "the sweet singer of Israel" trembled, and mouldered, and mingled with the dust of death. Ages upon ages have elapsed since even the last relic or trace of his material life vanished from this earth, and since it was possible to touch the harp from whose strings his fingers swept celestial melody; to grasp the tattered banner which he was wont "to lift up in the name of the Lord;" to see the book of the law which "he made his meditation day and night;" to mark the rift in the palace wall where once hung and quivered Saul's javelin, aimed at David's heart; or to stand in a time-worn chamber at Jerusalem, and say, Here his beautiful and holy spirit passed away from earth to join the "harpers harping with their harps," amidst the mighty thunderings of music within the veil!

Yet, child of God, although this hymn is old, and was old even when Homer wrote his poetry, or Solon gave his laws, like the creation around you, it is always new. You will not say of a single sentence it contains, "It is out of date, it is unsuited to the life of an Englishman in the nineteenth century; and besides this, all its meaning is now known to the uttermost, all its vital spirit spent, and it has no longer power to move me." Had it been inspired this very morning, it could not have had the charm of more dewy freshness; it could not have been more quickening, nor could it have been more exquisitely fitted to express your own best and deepest life. The solid facts of true theology, and the effect they have upon the heart, can never become antiquated; and because it sets forth some of the most gladdening of these with brevity, yet in perfection, it has an immortal novelty—it is a poem "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away,"—we may apply to it, and for the same reasons, the epithet applied to the praise of the glorified, and call it through all ages, "a new song." O sing unto the Lord this new song!

The fundamental idea of the psalm is contained, and its key-note struck on this sentence, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want."

Lord, and Shepherd. Who is he? We ought to know him; and if we live and die not knowing him, we must live and die among the lost. Let us enter "the House of the Interpreter," and ask Jesus Christ. If we do, we shall hear him say, "I am the good Shepherd, and I know my sheep, and am known of mine." The term Lord points to divine perfection; for it would be high treason to call any created intelligence Lord of the Spirit. The term Shepherd points to mediatorial relationship, for it describes the office of a Saviour. Only when we know "God in Christ," do we know him as at once Lord and Shepherd.

The Lord—the holy, holy, holy Lord, before the burning beams of whose omnipotent holiness no sinful thing can stand, and at the dazzle of whose enthroned perfections the very seraphim of glory do bow and veil their faces—could not, without a mediator, admit to the participation of the joys that flow from his presence, a race like ours,—creatures who by disobedience have forfeited all claim to their possession, and by pollution all capacity for their enjoyment; therefore, in the fulness of time, he whom we call Jesus Christ came forth from the divine essence,—came forth divine, yet visible in human form, to minister as the one mediating agent between holy divinity and fallen humanity; the Root, yet the offspring of David; the Lord, yet the Shepherd of the soul. These truths, which we know in the form of history, the psalmist only knew in the form of prophecy. The Gospels and Epistles were not in David's Bible, and we must not ascribe to him that precise knowledge of the Mediator which was impossible in his day; but he was mysteriously moved to utter words that ring with rich evangelical music, words adapted to express the joy of his own confidence in Jehovah, yet also fraught with meanings, some of which perhaps he only dimly saw, and which could only be fully known in after ages,—words intended to fit the thoughts of Christians when speaking of Christ, for we, explaining these words of the Old Testament by the discoveries of the New, know that the Lord our Shepherd is not the Father, "dwelling in the light unapproachable," but the Son, "God manifest in the flesh."

Let us next seek to understand the mediatorial office which this statement sets in view. What is meant when the Lord is represented as a shepherd? Forget yourself and your surroundings—live with David and look into his spirit,—try, by sympathy, to find the most natural and likely processes of the train of thought which led him thus to speak of God, and you may thus be best assisted to find the true import of his expression. He had himself been a shepherd, and though now he was a king, he still loved the simplicities of a shepherd's life. For the moment he often fancied himself a child again, singing among the hills of Bethlehem; he lived once more in the old times of his life, and looked wistfully back on the old scenes—scenes so soft with peace, so bright with spiritual sunshine, and so clear from weary care, that they seemed like a dream of heaven. Recollections of those bygone days would refresh his fainting nature more than the breath of morning or the sound of falling streams. Tender visions of the past would mingle with his thoughts in the tented field, on the harassed march, or amidst the troubles of his stormy throne. He looked back upon his adventures when a shepherd boy. He thought, for instance, how he saved the life of his sheep. "Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion and a bear and took a lamb out of the flock; and I went after him, and delivered it out of his mouth, and when he arose against me, I caught him by the beard, and slew him; thy servant slew both the lion and the bear." He thought over the days when he "led the sheep out," calling them by name, feeding them when hungry, healing them when sick, guiding them over the hill paths and through the gloomy hollows until they were safe in the village fold. One day, when rapt in thoughts like these, suddenly, at a flash, they were lit up with new meaning, there came a rush of inspiration over his soul along with this stream of familiar memories, and he cried in ecstasy, "The Lord is my shepherd!" All that I was to the flock he is to me!

Sanctify this image yet further. Pour your thoughts of Jesus into the mould of David's poetry, and they will seem yet more clear and glorious. Jesus has saved the life of his sheep. "All we like sheep have gone astray; . . . and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." It is iniquity for conscious, reflective, intelligent natures to go astray from the great Spirit; and we have thus gone astray. Iniquity is distinct from infirmity. Iniquity is in-equity. Iniquity is open to penalty, and the penalty for departure from God is death. Nothing can be more evident than this. Nature gives the decision even before revelation speaks. If you go astray from Him who is "the Life," you must die; if you go astray by your own choice, you deserve to die. Death is, therefore, at once the natural effect and the penal end of all spiritual wanderings. But Jesus, from his throne, saw the wanderers, and "was filled with compassion on the multitudes, for they were as sheep without a shepherd." He saw death impending, and he came down to save them. He bowed his head to the stroke of law. That stroke was no fiction, no ceremony, no merely figurative expedient. "Awake, O sword, against my Shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts. Smite the Shepherd!" These words breath earnest truth, and point to a tremendous reality. God be merciful to us, if we are not alive to that reality, if we ever sink into the mere mechanical speakers of customary phrases when we speak of the doctrines revealed in that awful hour in which "the good Shepherd laid down his life for the sheep!" By his representative obedience; by his death, and by his life; by his sacrifice consummated on earth, and by his eternal ministry in heaven; by his work as the Saviour from death, and his work as the Preserver of the life which he saves, feeding it and guiding it until brought from the perils of the wilderness and folded amidst the felicities of paradise, Jesus has achieved the right to the title of "Shepherd."

Let us now mark the language of appropriation conveyed in this statement. "The Lord is my shepherd." Distinguish between the knowledge and the appropriation of a fact. "A child is dying," said a stranger, passing by the house of Jairus. "My child is dying," said another voice; "Lord, my little daughter lieth at the point of death!" Oh, the difference between the feeling of the speakers! "I know every inch of this noble estate," says some homeless wanderer over the fields in search of a shelter from the pitiless tempest. It would be a different thing to say, "This estate is mine." In religion, the difference between mere power to use the language of theory, and the power to use language of immediate, proprietary application, is an infinite difference; it makes all the difference between the saved and the lost. "God is love"—"God is love to me;" "God is light"—"The Lord is my light and my salvation;" "God is a shepherd"—"The Lord is my shepherd;"—a demon might say the first, the second could only be said by a child of light. As the knowledge of law is not obedience, the knowledge of religion is not religion. You may know the gospel, and yet refuse it. You may know all its truths in all their due proportions and manifold connections; you may see beneath its separate statements a high and perfect scientific unity: you may speak of its promises in words that tremble with tenderness, or flame with grandeur, or flow with pictured eloquence, and yet perish for want of the warrant to claim them as your own. Even if, like Thomas, you saw the Saviour in the clear daylight of reality, and had every doubt removed by evidences offered to your very touch—could "put your fingers into the print of the nails, and thrust your hands into the side,"—still you must perish, unless you could cry out "My Lord, and my God"—"O ye daughters of Jerusalem, this is my beloved, and this is my friend!"

Jesus, with all his divine fulness of mercy, is only waiting for appropriation. All he asks of his creature is that they shall receive him, and "to as many as receive him he gives power to be the sons of God, even to as many as believe on his name." Are you a stranger, wandering from the fold of God, yet just beginning to feel unspeakable sorrow and astonishment at the thought of your sin, along with a sense of helpless desolation, which makes you cry, "Alone! alone!" You are not to feel as if alone amongst the mountains. Look up, and you will see the Son of man bending over you. "He came to seek and to save that which was lost," and at last he has found you. Trust him, throw yourself on his mighty love, and though you are helpless as a lamb on the shepherd's shoulder, he will surely save you. Fear not, and you will soon be able to sing, "The Lord is my shepherd."

II. This sentence not only records a fact, but the inference drawn from it,—"The Lord is my shepherd;" what then? "I shall not want." With regard to this inference, you are requested to study, first, its argumentative value. Not as a believer only, but as a reasoner does the psalmist speak, and his language is that of fair logical induction.

Our wants may be numerous as are the faculties of our intricate nature. The eye, the ear, and all the parts of our organic life may suffer from want, but the wants of the soul must be the greatest wants of all. The powers of temptation, taking advantage of our weakness and unbelief, frequently threaten us with want. "A storm of trouble is coming, and you will want shelter; a trial of principle is coming, and you will want courage; a change in your circumstances is coming; you will be taken from the circle of your present mercies, and want bread for your family, or from the scene of those spiritual ministrations which you feel to be essential, and you will want bread for the soul." There are two ways of reaching that spirit of confidence, which will make you reply to all such suggestions, "I shall not want." One way is by faith in a promise. "God hath given to us exceeding great and precious promises." "Every promise being ratified by God's oath, than which nothing is more immutable; sealed by the blood of Christ, than which nothing is more precious; testified by the Spirit, than which nothing is more true; delivered by the hand of mercy, than which nothing is more free, and received by the hand of faith, than which nothing is more sure."* You search the treasury of the promises, you light on one fitted to the exigencies of the moment, and taking care to know that yours is the believing heart for which it was intended, you find it instinct with a strange virtue, it fills you with a secret stream of strength, an intense repose of peace, and you say, "Back, black thoughts, trouble me no more," "I shall not want;" every sorrow will bring its companion mercy, and there will be supplies for "every time of need," for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

There is another way of arriving at this result, and that is the way found by David. "The Lord is my shepherd." Is this true? Then, although my case may be so original and solitary that I can find no promise clearly meeting it, I can, without a promise, trust a silent God. Before he has uttered a word, I will trust him. Though he had not left a line upon the leaves of revelation with distinct reference to a trial like mine, I know the fact that he is my shepherd, and draw the inference that I shall not want. Instances of such reasoning abound in the inspired histories of the Spirit. "The Lord is my portion," said one; there is the fact. "Therefore will I hope in him;" there is the inference. "The Lord is my light and my salvation;" there is the fact. "Therefore will I not fear;" there is the inference. "This God is our God, for ever and ever;" there is the fact. "He will be our guide even unto death;" there is the inference. By such steps of reasoning do we think our way out from the fact that the "Lord is our shepherd," to the inference which the text proclaims.

To one of the "little flock" of Galileans, only half enlightened as to the true lordship of his Shepherd, and who only clearly knew him as "the Son of man, not having a place where to lay his head," this inference might not have been so obvious; but to us who know that, as the result of his sufferings, he has received "all power in heaven and earth," and has been "declared both Lord and Christ," the inference ought to be irresistible. We are not to understand that this new dominion is anything less than divine. From its very nature only a divine power could govern it. When we assert its existence, we simply mean that in virtue of the new arrangement of grace that he has effected, law now empowers him to exercise all his own divine rule for mediatorial ends. Think, then, fainting Christian, of the empire over which your Shepherd reigns. Think of the million million wonders that invisibly surround you; think of the worlds that glow beneath the microscope,—he is Lord of these; think of the worlds which the night reveals—their spacious sweep, their mystic flight, all their grand phenomena, all their "numbers beyond number, numberless," and all their possibilities of life and history,—he is Lord of these; think of the innumerable companies of spirits embodied and disembodied,—he is Lord of these; think of the gifts, and means, and ministries of grace,—he is Lord of these. Rise yet higher, and think of the infinity hinted in the Hebrew word for "Lord," which the psalmist here employs,—the word written with four letters, yet comprehending in its meaning the past, the present, and the future of the verb to be, and telling of One "who was, and is, and is to come, the Almighty;" think of his holiness, his faithfulness, and his love, all passing knowledge, you will then have some conception of what is meant by his great name, "The Lord." Since he is yours, all things are yours, for if you have the Sun, you have the rays; if you have the Fountain, you have all the living stream. He stands in the relation of Shepherd to your spirit; and you do not really believe that the Lord is your shepherd, if you believe that you can want.

ment to the facts of actual life. The psalm is full of notes to help your memory and guide your line of thought. If you can use David's words of trust for the future, in all their first meaning, you mean to say,—

"I shall not want for appropriate food." This is the main idea of the first verse. Hard times, perhaps, are trying you, and they suggest many misgivings as to the supplies for the future of your physical life; but, known only to the Shepherd, there is a certain fixed and definite time for the course of that life on earth. "You are immortal" on earth till that time is ended; the moment that ends it is infallibly sure to be the best for you, and the best for every holy interest, and until that moment strikes, you will not want food even for the body; the means of ornamental existence may fail, but the means of essential support, never; bread will fall from the clouds and water gush from the sand, rather than one word should break which assures you that for every emergency "the Lord will provide." But the highest truth in the sentence you now appropriate,—the truth on which all its other truths depend, is truth in relation to the soul. The soul shall never starve. The new life of the soul,—the life that loves, the life that trusts, the life that is holy, has its own peculiar hunger and thirst, and its necessities will all be met. It is said in old story, that the Duke of Alva, having given some prisoners their lives, they afterwards petitioned him for bread, and his answer was, "I promised to spare your life, but not to grant you food." Not so does the Saviour answer the cry of the life which he has spared. He did not sacrifice himself to save it from the sentence of justice, that he might afterwards abandon it to the death of starvation. No! He preserves that which he bestows. Hour by hour, and moment by moment, he continues the supplies of assimilating grace, the nutriment, the secret food of the soul, and thus fulfils his promise, "My sheep shall never perish."

"I shall not want for needful rest." "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the waters of rest." The flock is travelling to a distant fold, but even on its way is to enjoy needful intervals of rest,—rest, not as the end of its present existence, but rest enough to refresh its power of onward motion. You may feel half inclined to doubt this statement. You are ready to think it disproved by your own experience. The busy thought, the burning brow, the toiling hand, the weary foot, the overstimulated faculties never seem able to find rest. There is no rest in the day, for life is full of cares and crosses; there is no rest at night, for the eyes seem to see more sights when shut than when open. Ten thousand thoughts, ten thousand vexing fancies wake up to sting the nerves, and to drive across the brain in a rush of wild phantasmagoria. So you think, and so you are tempted to complain. There may be such passages even in a Christian's history, but they are the exception, not the rule; and even if you sometimes suffer thus, such suffering should cast no discredit on the promise. You might find, on searching, that the suffering comes from some chosen course of your own,—not from the natural, unobstructed course of God's own appointment; or you might find that, if such wearisome days are indeed appointed by him, they are appointed in the discipline of love. In all cases the principle holds good, that although you have, at certain times, needful disturbance, you have, upon the whole, needful rest,—the rest that is requisite for the highest purposes of life. The sheep are not always travelling up the mountain pass, or over the fire of the bright and burning sand. They are made to lie down in green pastures, and are led beside the still waters, that by this temporary rest they may be fitted to travel again. The ancient hosts of God were not always at the bitter springs of Marah, not always in conflict with Amalek at Rephidim; they were at intervals permitted to rest in some green camping ground, where they could see trees softly wave, and waters brightly sparkle, that they might be thus fitted to renew their march and fight their foes once more. You are not always weary,—not always in "a great fight of afflictions." Though passing trials may, for the moment, blot out the sunny memories of past repose, you still have them to record. Believing in Jesus, you have had, and may have, all needful rest. Rest imparted by his presence—the rest whose suffusion you feel when the words of some sweet promise are shot like "silver shafts of song" into your soul—rest from the reflected peace of that rest to which you and all the people of God are hasting—rest through books, through bright faces, bright voices, and through the pure, refreshing love you find at home,—all these means of rest are given in sufficient measure to nerve and brace the spirit for its path, and to keep you from sinking down exhausted before you reach the end. Amidst innumerable mercies, soft and grateful to your nature,—as are the "green pastures" and "still waters" to the nature of the sheep,—"He whom your soul loveth maketh his flock to rest at noon."

I shall not want for restorative mercy. "He restoreth my soul." There is a straggler at a little distance from the flock. It looks faint and lifeless, it refuses food, and, contrary to its natural instinct, it turns from its companions and tries to get alone. The shepherd keenly glances after it, sees that something is wrong there, and is soon on the spot with all healing appliances to "bind up that which is broken and strengthen that which is sick." The memory of such a simple incident, once so common in David's life, slept in his mind for years, until, touched by inspiration, it sprang up, kindled into metaphor, and became this declaration of God's healing love. Our state when the Good Shepherd came to us was one, not of jeopardy only, but of sickness, and he came to make us not only safe but sound. Directly we were pardoned the healing work began, but it will not be ended until we have reached the "land of everlasting health."* The health of the soul is often weak and precarious now, and though strong for a time, it often suffers a relapse. The Shepherd is ever watching all its symptoms with those eyes "which are as a flame of fire, and which strike into burning distinctness the secrets on which they look. That soul which he watches will not be suffered to pine and die for want of restorative care. This is no encouragement to thinking lightly of sin, and if you think thus lightly, never did consolation come to you so strangely shaded with alarming thoughts. Brother, has your soul ceased to prosper? are you drooping in the ways of the Lord? are you sooner tired than you used to be? have you lost your love to him and his people? your first spiritual sensitiveness, your first keen hunger and thirst after righteousness, and are you thus remaining with only a feeling of indolent regret? Then, sure as God loves you, he will afflict you; this is the common method of his Spirit's restorative ministry: he strikes to heal, he wounds to bless; by some sharp experiment of discipline, by some bitter medicinal mercy, by some trouble that will wrestle with your soul and rouse it into action, will he seek to do it good and make it strong; but if you have still a tender conscience, if you mourn for sin, if at the same time you are broken down by some great mystery of trial, you will find this text alive with an animating charm. That pressure is only the hand of the Physician upon you; that bitter cup is filled with healing love; and in all those sorrows that crowd around you, you only see the Shepherd in the very act of restoring your soul. Soon you will be able to sing, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits, who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases, who redeemeth thy life from destruction, who crowneth thee with lovingkindness and tender mercies."

"I shall not want for guidance in the right paths." The flock is on its way home. "He leadeth me," says one of the travellers, "in paths of righteousness, for his name's sake." We have just spoken of a right state; we are now speaking of a right course. Provision is secured for both. Stripped of all figure, "paths of righteousness," or "right paths," mean right ways of thinking, of believing, of speaking, and of acting. Left to ourselves we should never have found these paths; left to ourselves, even though we may be in them now, we shall lose them again. Amongst all the varied tribes of nature, there could not be selected a more perfect type of a life liable to wander than that which the psalmist has taken. The passage bird is never lost. High over the waves of the Atlantic it strikes a right path to its home a thousand leagues away. With unerring certainty the creature of the forest finds a right path to its cave; but the sheep has no such sure accuracy of self-direction,—it is in its nature a helpless and dependent thing, and but for its shepherd, would lose its path to the final shelter. Just as helpless and dependent is your soul. If you travel in the right path, it is not because you have an unerring instinct, or an unerring reason, or an unerring sense of right, but because you have an unerring Leader. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me . . . and a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him, for they know not the voice of a stranger." Dull, apathetic, amazed, bewildered by false lights and voices, Christ lost sight of, the word of Christ not read, the Spirit of Christ speaking to the conscience not listened for, to guide them through some particular mystery of faith or practice, they may with reference to that particular mystery in that unwatchful moment miss the road, but while the main principle of the life is trust in Jesus, they will not be left to err essentially, to err impenitently, to err for ever. Consult no human oracle, ask the advice of no casuist as your first authority in any strait, but look to Jesus, and while you have his word as your directory, and keep the mind in sensitive communication with his Spirit, he will "lead you in paths of righteousness for his name's sake."

"I shall not want for consolation in the valley of the shadow of death." On the way home to Bethlehem there was a sunless gorge, beasts of prey were heard in the woods that skirted it, robbers might be hiding among the rocks, and it was always a relief to the shepherd to feel that he and his charge were out safe beyond that haunted pass; but when he thought of his own Shepherd, even this recollection became a joyful parable, and was used to express his holy confidence: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Such a dark part there is in the path of every spiritual traveller,—a part worthy to be called by that dread name, "The valley of the shadow of death." "Over that valley hang the discouraging clouds of confusion; death, also, doth always spread his wings over it; in a word, it is every whit dreadful, being utterly without order."* The shadow shows that the reality is near that casts it, and that reality is death. It may be that all around is bright, and the soul alone is sorrowful. Weak in faith, and in heaviness with manifold temptations, even eternal death seems near, and you are already in its shadow. It may be that death has come into your family, bereavement has made you desolate, and you live in a shadow. Its terror stills all music, takes the light out of all beauty, a great wave of darkness rushes over all your life. It is dark in the starlight—dark in the moon-beams—dark in the day. You care for nothing, you can do nothing, you see nothing but one great sorrow. Returning unread the examination papers of a student, the bereaved Professor Wilson said, "I could not see to read them in the valley of the shadow of death;" and you can understand that sense of black distress. At last the shadow of your own approaching death will fall upon you, and you may even now be solemnly passing into it. But however deep and awful the various shadows thrown over your path may be, you never need feel absolutely desolate; for

* John Bunyan.

Christ has said, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you." He is not the less with us because the night hides his face. You may walk by faith when unable to walk by sight; and his grace through faith can make you stronger and more courageous than other men—stronger and more courageous than yourself. All must be well while you believe in Jesus; for he never can revoke his promise or resign his charge. He is ever saying, "Fear not, I am with you;" how can you therefore dare to fear? It is "the Lord" who has pledged himself to be your "shepherd," and therefore, knowing who your Saviour is, the very fact of your necessity should be to you a proof of his presence; for how could such a Saviour withdraw his presence or withhold his hand at the time when you most need him at your side? At least such a conviction might comfort you, if at present you are unable to rise to an ecstasy of gladness. "Comfort," the psalmist anticipated; comfort, you may feel even in the valley of the shadow of death.

Under the open sky, in one of the valleys of Wales, a preacher was addressing a vast congregation. His subject was the tempter and his devices. In a style vividly dramatic he pictured the spirit of evil traversing the earth to tempt the members of Christ's flock. To place after place he went, seeking rest and finding none. Christian after Christian overcame his tempting suggestions by the power of faith and the agency of Scripture. At night-fall he entered the chamber of a dying saint. The shadow of death was on his face, the awful moment of the soul's transit had nearly come. Attendants were waiting in the intensity of silence, for they almost thought that all was over. "I will dart a doubt of Jesus in that saint's mind," said the evil one, "and fill his last moment with fear;" but just then the lips parted, and the words came forth, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever." In a moment the spirit was glorified, and Satan was foiled! May such a victory be yours; it may be, it must be, if you can say with truth, "The Lord is my shepherd."

A GLANCE INTO DARK PLACES.

A FOREIGNER, taking his accustomed morning walk in a Bengali village, sees a crowd of men and women hastening towards a narrow passage-way, which, on approaching, he finds to be the entrance to a large, mud-walled, thatch-roofed dwelling-house. Wishing to learn the cause of so much excitement in the usually quiet village, he mingles with the crowd and enters the enclosure. He observes that all who come in proceed at once to the master of the house, and offering him a present, appear to be congratulating him on some good fortune. Everybody wears a smiling face; a band of music in one corner of the yard tax themselves and their rude instruments to the utmost, to increase the merry gladness. Children skip and jump from place to place with shouts of laughter. The company are regaled with sweatmeats, and everything indicates a festive occasion of more than ordinary interest.

The stranger inquires what happy event has produced all these demonstrations of joy; and is informed that a son is born to the master of the house. On hearing this, he proceeds to add his own congratulations to those already received by the happy father, and then resumes his quiet walk through the crooked streets, thinking within himself, these Hindus are certainly a very kind hearted and amiable people. They cannot, surely, be so very degraded in their moral natures, if they can appreciate so heartily the beautiful and joy-bringing influences of the presence of infancy and childhood in their homes!

Curious to obtain a further insight into the character of this strange people, our friend pauses at the door of several other houses in the village. Among them he finds a dwelling that seems to be clothed in mourning. A few sad-looking men and women are moving quietly about the court-yard, while the master of the house is sitting on the ground, apparently more sad than they. Few words are spoken; even the children hush their noisy shouts, and hasten away from the gloomy society at home, to more congenial companionship in the streets and bazaars. Our traveller would conclude at once that death had spread his black shadow over this household, but that he has heard that these Hindus practise the most wild and noisy demonstrations of grief on such occasions.

Unable to divine the meaning of this quiet sorrow, he ventures to make inquiries, and learns, with surprise, that the birth of a daughter is the sad calamity which has brought these few friends together, to offer their condolence to the afflicted father. If he could enter within the house, he would find the unhappy mother holding her infant daughter in her arms, with a mingled expression of maternal tenderness and mortified pride in her countenance, most pitiful to behold. The Christian stranger cannot do violence to his nature and education by joining in the universal expression of sorrowful sympathy; so he quietly turns away and proceeds on his journey, musing upon the mysterious power of that superstition which, under the name of religion, can thus trample upon the finest elements of humanity, and convert its purest joys into sources of sorrow.

Let us follow the life of this dark-skinned daughter of Eve, whose opening we have seen shrouded in such gloom, and see if, perchance, any brightness falls upon it, in its progress towards immortality.

Through the happy days of babyhood the little girl receives from her mother the needful care, together with no small degree of tenderness; for a mother's love will not be entirely fettered, even by priestly power. By the growing sprightliness and irresistible artlessness of infancy, she will often win from her father an outburst of affectionate caresses, while the faint sigh with which he turns away from the happy little face, reveals the unspoken regret that the sweet child had not been a boy.

As the little girl grows up, she sees her brothers daily sent to the village school, and looks, with wondering eyes, as they make strange figures on their palm leaves, and eagerly listens to catch the meaning of the mysterious sounds they repeat so rapidly while learning their daily lessons. With childish curiosity she asks what they are doing—possibly ventures to beg that she, too, may be sent to school. Her mother, shocked at the suggestion, hushes her into silence—"No, no, you are a girl; you must not learn to read; if you should, you would surely become a widow." What is the full meaning of that terrible penalty of possessing knowledge, she understands as little as do any of you who read this; but the manner and tone of its utterance make the desired impression, and the first budding of the innate desire for learning is nipped and blighted by the very hands which should have fostered and fed it. Forbidden to gratify childish activity with books and paper, she spends her first years in playing in the mud and running in the bazaars, until she is old enough to be taught useful occupations. We may find her often seated on the ground, in the square enclosure in front of her father's house, turning the simple machine by which the seeds are separated from cotton. By degrees she learns to spin, and then to weave the coarse cloth for her own and her brothers' garments. Sometimes, with a group of girls of her own age, she goes to a neighbouring pool of stagnant water, and, wading through it with a three cornered wicker net, scrapes up, from the soft mud at the bottom, a scanty supply of very small fish for the family dinner. In the spring she goes with her mother to the little patch of young rice, and carefully rooting up the little shoots, transplants them into the rice-field. As night draws on, she learns to assist her mother in cleaning the rice and cooking the evening meal. Her father and brothers come in and seat themselves on the mats she spreads for them, while she and her mother wait upon them. When they have eaten and left the house, the mother and daughter sit down to their lonely meal; they would be "ashamed," they say, to eat in the presence of men.

The history of one day in the life of this little Hindu girl is the history of many days. During all these years, when the young mind so readily draws both amusement and instruction from everything that comes in contact with it, and lays up stores for future use, her soul is shut up to the one thought, "What shall I eat, what shall I drink, and wherewithal shall I be clothed?" Never is an idea presented to her mind that leads it to look to a future existence, or to ask if she is a whit better than the cattle she daily tends. Indeed, the meagre religious instruction she receives places her below them; for the Brahmin says it is a greater sin to kill the sacred cow than to take the life of a woman. Occasionally she witnesses the ceremonies of worship at the village temple, and early learns to carry her daily offerings to present to the Brahmin; but even here the brand is upon her,—she must remain in the court outside the consecrated walls of the shrine, while her brothers may enter boldly the presence of the gods. She is allowed to prostrate herself at the feet of the Brahmin and crave his blessing, and to repeat brief phrases from the Shasters, in order to drive away evil spirits; and here her religion ends.

When she is about seven years of age, her father begins to seek a husband for her among the sons of his neighbours or friends of his own caste. Anxious to secure the best possible bargain for himself, and regardless of his daughter's happiness, he consumes many weeks in negotiation and intrigue. Rival suitors are sought, that the dowry or present to the father may be increased to the greatest possible sum; and the highest bidder secures the prize. Three or four cows, with a few silver ornaments and brass vessels, and a sum of money, varying according to the position and rank of the parties, are promised to the father on the day of betrothal. Not unfrequently, before the day arrives, a more wealthy aspirant for the position of his son-in-law induces the greedy father to break his first engagement, and pledge his daughter to the new comer. Hereupon a law-suit ensues. All this time the poor child is not consulted at all; with unquestioning submissiveness, the inheritance which has come down to her through centuries of oppression, she accepts the destiny her father marks out for her.

At length the preliminaries are all arranged; the family friends are called, a feast is provided, the betrothed parties eat tamul (betel-nut) together, and the engagement is sealed by the delivery of the promised presents to the father; perhaps, also, by a written agreement. The little girl remains still in her father's house, pursuing her daily round of duties, and acquiring a degree of importance in the household never before accorded her; the fact that she has brought her father some profit at last, apparently reconciling him to his mortification at having a daughter born to him.

Two or three years more pass over her head, and our little Hindu girl arrives at the period of her marriage. Again the family friends are called, the feast prepared, bands of music engaged, the priest sent for, and several days are spent in noisy merry-making. For once, our little protégé is happy. She is the centre of admiring observation—envied by her less fortunate companions who have not yet reached the marriageable age, and flattered by the old women, because of the gifts she has been the means of bringing to her parents. She thinks and cares little about the character of her future lord—she is only pleased that she has attained to what she was early taught to believe the greatest earthly good, and escaped a grievous curse—that of remaining unwedded.

She goes as thoughtlessly as the horse to the battle, or the lamb to the slaughter.

Her husband tells his mother, as he leaves her to attend the wedding ceremonies, "I am going to bring you a female servant." He brings her to his father's house with great rejoicings, with music and dancing. The days of feasting and merriment are soon past, and the one bright scene of her dark life closes. We would not shorten its duration a single second, or dim one ray of its swiftly vanishing brightness, though we know it to be but a flimsy tissue, through which the dullest eye can discern the shadow and the gloom!

Her married life is but the same routine of daily labour which she lived in her father's house, with generally more severity and less love to lighten it. According to Hindu custom, the sons remain on the family estate; and as they successively bring their wives home, additional houses are built; and thus we find several families living around the same central court-yard. Our young bride has now to assist her mother-in-law in the family work; and with our knowledge of human nature, even in Christian lands, we shall not think it strange if we see her often treated harshly, or if strifes and bickerings occur in the family, especially when we remember that she may not be the only wife.

Let me take you, my Christian sister, to visit our young bride in her simple home. As you enter the yard, she comes forward to meet you with a graceful salaam and a pleasant smile. She hastens to spread a clean mat on the hard, smooth-swept ground, and motions you to sit down. She cannot ask you to pass within the open door of the thatched hut, for your presence would be pollution to it. You see the simple spinning wheel and loom standing in one corner of the yard; you ask if she can weave, and she will show you with unaffected pride the fabrics she has made, pointing out the beauty of the bright coloured border she has wrought in the garments for her husband. Meanwhile, a group of women from the neighbouring houses have gathered round you, filled with curiosity to see the foreign lady.

Having gained her confidence by your kind interest in her pursuits, you seek to probe her inner nature, and find out something of her views of life. You tell her that these pursuits and employments will soon pass away—that she has a nature that will not die—that she has sinned against the Being who made her—and that the penalty and curse of his broken law rests upon her. She admits it all. "Do you not desire to know how you can escape this penalty, and be restored to the favour of God?" you ask. "If I do, how can I?" she says. "I have no money to give the Brahmin that he may make prascit (atonement) for me. I cannot leave home to go on a pilgrimage. What can I do?" With tearful eye and loving heart, you open to her and the listening crowd around her, the great and precious "mystery" of redemption, and reveal the hope which comes to those who are justified and sanctified by the blood and Spirit of Christ. As you tell them they can obtain this without the Brahmin's "atonement," and without the weary pilgrimage and self-torture, the light that kindles in their dark eyes tells you that their nature is akin to your own, and you feel that you would love to spend a lifetime in leading their awakening souls out of the darkness, into the light of that gospel that was preached to the woman of Samaria and to Mary Magdalene.

Suddenly our young friend starts up, saying, "I must go and cook my husband's rice." "Stay a moment—promise me that you will come to my house, and learn more about this salvation." "Oh," she replies, "I have no time to attend to religion; men can learn about the gods and go to the temples, and go to heaven when they die—but it is not for a woman; I am only a cow. I must work for my husband till I die, and then, who knows what I shall be? Only God knows; ámáksi shá náí, for me there is no hope." And with these sad, but too true words upon her lips, she turns away to her work.

Sorrowful, but not despairing, with a promise to call and see her again, you go on your way to visit other villages. After a few weeks you return and seek your old friend. She does not come forward to meet you as she did before. You find her sitting on the ground, with dishevelled hair, stripped of all her ornaments, the red mark which all married women wear on the forehead washed away, and her bright coloured clothing exchanged for plain white cotton garments. You scarcely recognise her, so great is the change. With the deepest sympathy you inquire what has happened. She tells you, with a look and tone of utter despair, that she is a widow. That fearful doom which casts its "shadows before," even upon her earliest childhood, when she essayed to pry into the mysteries of knowledge, has too soon come upon her. As you try to speak words of comfort to her, she tells you you do not understand her country customs. By these customs she is never allowed to marry again—never again to put on her ornaments or her gay clothing. She can eat but one daily meal, and that of the simplest kind. She must search the muddy pools to bring up fish for the family of her husband, but not a morsel must she put to her lips. Two days in every month she must fast entirely. She is more than ever before the slave of her husband's relatives, and is compelled to do all the menial work, while they continually heap upon her the most taunting and insulting epithets, until her life becomes a wearisome burden. Never may she attend a festive scene or village merry-making. She would be avoided at such a place as though she foreshadowed the curse under which she suffers. In a deeper sense than Christian women can possibly realize, "the light of her life has gone out." As you look upon the picture she presents to you of her future life, do you wonder that thousands of women shrink back appalled, and choose joyfully to perish on the funeral pile of their husbands?

Here we leave the life whose beginning we saw so darkly shadowed, in whose development we have looked in vain for light and hope, and on which, at the early age of thirteen, a pall like that of death has settled, with no chance, no possible chance of its removal. Leave it here, did I say? Christian woman, are you willing to leave that girlish widow in her despair and wretchedness—to leave the thousands upon thousands who, like her, are cut off from every source of enjoyment in this life, and are utterly hopeless concerning the life to come! Christianity alone can show to those mistaken fathers and brothers of wronged and insulted women, that the God who made them demands no such self-immolation of bereaved wives, and no such cruel exactions by the stronger sex, of toil and service from afflicted, heart-broken women. If you would relieve your suffering sisters from these heavy burdens, you must give the gospel to their country.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

STOCHAR, SAMARIA, AND THE PLAIN OF JEZREEL.

Our tents were pitched close to Nablous, in a quiet place under the shade of trees, amidst the sound of many streams, fountains, and brooks that sprang out of valleys and hills.

Our slumbers were often broken that night by the dreary cries of the jackals, shrieking as they hunted over the hills, like children in pain.

The delight of remembering when we awoke the next morning that it was Sunday, and that we had nothing to do but to be quiet, and feel ourselves in the city of the woman of Samaria, was great.

The clergyman in our party read the English service. Never did the lessons and the old comprehensive prayers seem more touching and appropriate than on those Sunday halts on our journey through Palestine.

A few peasants and towns'-people collected near us, and seated themselves on the ground at some little distance, during the service. We knew the feeling of the mob of Nablous was very excited just then against the Christians, but as we stood or knelt, and listened or responded, they offered us no interruption in any way, but quietly and contemplatively watched our proceedings.

In the afternoon we started for a walk, intending to reach the summit of Mount Gerizim, but our dragoman involved us in an unintentional call on the Keimakan, or governor of the town, which occupied us otherwise.
